The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Lawton) reports, "The news increases the spotlight on Dell's reporting methods and could spell more trouble for chief executive Kevin Rollins. … When Dell disclosed the SEC investigation in August, the Round Rock, Texas, company said it didn't think the investigation would materially affect its financials; now Dell isn't ruling out needing to restate prior results. The subpoenas from the U.S. attorney, which has requested documents related to Dell's financial reporting from 2002 to the present, hadn't previously been disclosed." The Journal adds, "Dell was also forced to take two other embarrassing steps yesterday. … It suspended its share-buyback program until further notice. The company spent $7.2 billion to repurchase 204 million shares in fiscal year 2006, which ended in February. In addition, Dell canceled its financial-analysts' day for the second time this year; the meeting with Wall Street analysts was to have taken place in New York tomorrow."

Bloomberg (9/12, Guglielmo) reports, "Dell said the investigations indicate possible errors related to so-called accruals and reserves -- estimates of future company obligations -- reported in previous financial statements. The company said last month that the SEC started requesting information in August 2005 relating to revenue recognition. … Analysts also raised concerns about the delay of Dell's financial day, which already had been postponed from April. It will be rescheduled to a later date, Dell said Monday. The company still plans a meeting with reporters today, which will be held by Michael Dell and Rollins." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. attorney requested documents related to the company's financial reporting dating back to 2002, Dell said. The company said it plans to file its latest report as soon as possible and it is cooperating with the investigations."

The AP (9/12, Slagle) reports, "Dell first disclosed the accounting probe in last month's quarterly report, in which revenues plummeted 51 percent. … At the time, Dell officials played down its significance and said they didn't expect it to have any material impact on the company's bottom line."

DOJ Drops Freddie Mac Probe. The Washington Post (9/12, O'hara) reports, "After laying dormant for two years, the Justice Department's criminal probe into accounting transgressions at Freddie Mac is apparently over, according to company officials. … 'The U.S. attorney's office has not initiated contact with us in well over two years, and it is our understanding that the matter is inactive,' said David R. Palombi, a spokesman for the McLean-based mortgage finance company. 'Accordingly, we expect no further action in this matter.'" The Post continues, "The inactivity at the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria also extends to investigations of several former Freddie Mac executives, including chief executive Leland C. Brendsel, president David Glenn and chief financial officer Vaughn A. Clarke. Sources familiar with the investigation, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they did not want to be seen as speaking for the department, said lawyers for the ousted officials have not been contacted by the Justice Department since 2004." The Post adds, "Palombi's statements appear to resolve one of the final issues that have been dogging the company since its accounting problems became public in 2003. … In 2003, Freddie Mac admitted it had improperly managed its earnings through a series of transactions that smoothed out earnings growth. The company reduced its reported earnings by $5 billion between 2000 and 2003, hoping to defer those earnings to later years. … Freddie Mac is still working to produce an up-to-date and accurate set of books. But the company has cleared itself of most of the liability from the matter in the past three years. It has paid a $125 million fine to federal regulators, more than $400 million in shareholder lawsuit settlements, and $3.8 million in civil fines to settle Federal Election Commission charges of improper political fundraising. … But the possibility of a criminal action remained. In recent weeks, the company sought clarification from the Justice Department over whether its long silence meant the case was closed -- particularly after the department issued a statement in August that it had closed its criminal investigation of similar accounting problems at Freddie Mac rival Fannie Mae."

Financial Times Blasts DOJ Policy On Corporate Cooperation. The Financial Times (9/12) editorializes, "Corporate America has had a rough ride since Enron: between Eliot Spitzer, New York attorney-general, and the Sarbanes-Oxley act, US companies have paid a high price for their pre-Enron bad habits (not to mention the bad behaviour of others). … But corporate America's problems have come not only from the scourge of Albany, and the new regulatory burden imposed by Congress. The US Department of Justice has made white-collar crime (rightly) one of its top priorities. But in its zeal to catch corporate criminals, the DoJ has used some dubious tactics that arguably violate the US constitution and may even defeat the whole purpose of its corporate crime crusade - to create a new culture of compliance that encourages companies to do the right thing without having to be prosecuted." The Times continues, "Later today, the powerful Senate judiciary committee will open its own inquiry into the department's hardball tactics, particularly the practice of forcing companies to waive the privilege that normally protects communications with lawyers - including those between whistle-blowers and in-house lawyers. … The crux of the problem is a 2003 policy (known as the 'Thompson memorandum') that says prosecutors should decide whether to indict a company partly based on the company's co-operation with the government; and the best way to prove co-operation is to waive attorney-client privilege, and give the government all the information it needs to make its case. Companies have little choice but to turn over the information: an indictment is tantamount to a death sentence. … This is the wrong way to fight corporate crime. Companies need legal advice to be able to obey complex laws; if they cannot get it - without the risk that what they say will be revealed to the government - they may not try to obey the law at all. … The DoJ should rewrite its policy on waiver of attorney-client privilege - before Congress does so for it."

Former NYSE Head Grasso Seeks New Judge For Trial. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Lucchetti) reports, "Former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso is seeking a new judge for his pending trial on civil charges brought by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer." The Journal continues, "Mr. Grasso's lawyers last week filed a motion to have the case reassigned to a new judge. New York Supreme Court Justice Charles Ramos has been handling the pretrial stage of the case and is set to preside over a trial that may start as soon as October. … Mr. Spitzer's civil lawsuit against Mr. Grasso alleges that his $187.5 million pay package was excessive for the head of a New York not-for-profit company, which the NYSE was before it went public in March as NYSE Group Inc." The Journal adds, "Lawyers for Mr. Grasso at Williams & Connolly LLP filed papers arguing for a new judge on the grounds Justice Ramos held settlement discussions with the parties in which he made statements that could be interpreted as 'impairing Mr. Grasso's right' to a fair trial. The filing also stated that -- before the case was filed -- Justice Ramos twice unsuccessfully approached the Big Board to be considered for a board seat."

Former ITXC Executives Accused Of Bribing African Officials. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/7) reported, "Two former executives of a Princeton international telecommunications company approved more than $250,000 in bribes to officials in several African nations, securities regulators charged in a lawsuit filed yesterday." Steven Ott and Roger Michael Young "while at ITXC violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, the Securities and Exchange Commission charged in the complaint filed in federal court in Trenton. Ott, vice president for global sales, and Young, managing director of the Middle East and Africa, approved $267,468 in bribes to phone company officials in Nigeria, Rwanda and Senegal between 2001 and 2004, the lawsuit alleged." The AP (9/7, Hughes) noted, "The Justice Department said it had charged Amoako and unnamed co-conspirators with arranging for ITXC to pay $166,000 in commissions to a foreign official at Nitel, a Nigerian government-owned company; $26,000 to Rwandatel, owned by the Rwandan government; and about $74,000 to an employee of Sonatel, partly owned by the Senegalese government."

Retirements Of Sarbanes, Oxley To See Shake Up Of Finance Panels. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, A4, Mullins) reports, "The retirements of Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D., Md.) and Rep. Mike Oxley (R., Ohio) spell changes next year in the House and Senate committees that regulate Wall Street, banks and finance. … The broader change will come in the House, which will see a new committee chairman regardless of whether Republicans or Democrats control the chamber after the November elections. On the other side of the Capitol, Sen. Chris Dodd (D., Conn.) will succeed Mr. Sarbanes as the senior Democratic member of the Senate Banking Committee. Should Republicans, as expected, retain a majority in the Senate, the panel's chairman will remain Sen. Richard Shelby (R., Ala.)." The Journal notes, "Things are more complicated in the House, where as many as five lawmakers could win the top spot on the Financial Services panel. If Democrats win majority control in November, the liberal Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.) would inherit the gavel. If Republicans keep their majority, a contest is shaping up between Reps. Spencer Bachus of Alabama and Richard Baker of Louisiana. Two other Republicans, David Dreier of California and Deborah Pryce of Ohio, have outside chances to succeed Mr. Oxley."

DOJ Leads Alaska Corruption Probe. The Anchorage Daily News (9/12, Mauer) reports, "The federal influence-buying case that erupted with fury 10 days ago with searches of a half-dozen Alaska legislative offices is being managed independently of the Alaska U.S. Attorney's office, a U.S. Justice Department official said Monday. … 'The whole office is recused,' Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said." The News continues, "Instead, the wide-ranging investigation is being overseen by attorneys from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, Sierra said. … The Public Integrity Section has about 25 attorneys, a team that often lives out of suitcases in pursuit of corruption cases as far away as Guam. They've prosecuted petty thefts by sheriff's deputies, the massive frauds of Enron and the high-profile corruption case of Jack Abramoff." The News adds, "Sierra wouldn't say why the Alaska office wasn't allowed to participate in the case or how many lawyers from Washington were assigned to it. But the case is even off-limits to Nelson Cohen, the new U.S. Attorney for Alaska who just arrived last month from Pittsburgh, he said. … Sierra said it's not unusual that the local U.S. Attorney's office will recuse itself from a sensitive corruption case and wall off its legal, public relations and even clerical staffs from the investigation and prosecutions. Sometimes one or two assistant U.S. attorneys might still be assigned to work with the Public Integrity attorneys, but Sierra said he didn't know if that was the case in Alaska. … FBI agents from Alaska are lead investigators, working the case alongside the prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section, said Eric Gonzalez, spokesman for the FBI in Alaska." The News notes, "Dozens of extra FBI agents were brought in from Outside to execute about two dozen search warrants when the first raids started at legislative offices and elsewhere on Aug. 31. After the initial round of searches and interviews, the Outside agents were sent home, Gonzalez said. … While officials say little, the warrants target the relationships between legislators and the oil-field service and construction company Veco. The company, which has long been generous with campaign donations at the state and federal levels and lobbying in Juneau, has gone so far as to hire sitting legislators, including Senate President Ben Stevens, R-Anchorage, the son of Alaska's powerful U.S. senator, Ted Stevens."

Lawmaker Denies VECO Contribution Influenced Pipeline Vote. The AP (9/12, Volz) reports, "Days before an ailing Rep. Carl Moses flew from Anchorage to cast the deciding vote on a contentious oil and gas tax bill, six VECO Corp. executives contributed $3,000 to the Unalaska Democrat's campaign. … Moses, contacted Monday…denies the VECO campaign contributions had anything to do with his vote and his name has not previously been connected with the FBI raids. 'Don't worry, I'm squeaky clean,' Moses said." The AP notes that VECO "typically supports Republican candidates. The contributions to Moses are among the only donations company executives have given to a Democrat this election year."

Corruption Trial Of DC Developer Begins. The Washington Post (9/12, B5, Weiss) reports, "Despite his reputation as a maverick wheeler-dealer whose projects helped revitalize the city, prominent developer Douglas Jemal was 'little more than a common thief,' prosecutors said yesterday at the start of his trial on bribery and fraud charges." The Post continues, "Government lawyers said Jemal and his company, Douglas Development Corp., used bribes and fraudulent documents to keep an overextended real estate empire alive in the years before the boom in District property prices. … Jemal, his son Norman, who is the company's vice president, and leasing director Blake Esherick went on trial in U.S. District Court in Washington yesterday. They are charged with conspiring to bribe a former D.C. government official with cash, fine meals, trips to Las Vegas and a Rolex in exchange for 'sweetheart' contracts with the city. Prosecutors said Jemal's company received inflated profits for leasing property to the city from 2001 to 2004." The Post adds, "All three defendants have pleaded not guilty and vowed to fight the charges in a trial that could last up to six weeks. The defense painted Jemal, 63, as a 'visionary,' and previously said that its witnesses could include Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and Washington Wizards' owner Abe Pollin, who built a sports arena in an area of downtown that is home to many of Jemal's retail properties. … Most of the allegations involve dealings with Michael A. Lorusso, a former deputy director of the D.C. Office of Property Management. Lorusso, who was fired from his city job in January 2003, pleaded guilty to bribery and agreed to aid prosecutors. Lorusso, who is expected to be the key witness in the trial, faces a prison term of 57 to 71 months under federal sentencing guidelines, but prosecutors have said they could seek less time depending on the value of his cooperation. … In his opening statement to the jury, Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark H. Dubester twice mentioned Lorusso's guilty plea to the jury. That drew calls for a mistrial from Jemal's defense attorney, Reid H. Weingarten, who argued that Dubester was trying to taint Jemal on the basis of Lorusso's guilt. … U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina rejected the motion for a mistrial but agreed to tell jurors that they should not take Lorusso's guilty plea to mean that Jemal also is guilty."

Son Of Key Gotti Prosecution Witness Disputes Witness Tampering Charges. The New York Daily News (9/12, Zambito, 729K) reports, "Trying to soften their client's image," John A. Gotti's "defense attorneys yesterday told jurors that the mobster -- along with a cellmate-turned-illustrator -- penned a kiddie book about a lovable pint-sized tiger and a fierce dragon." Meanwhile, "the son of the government's star witness -- mob turncoat Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo -- disputed witness tampering charges against Gotti. Prosecutors contend Gotti summoned DiLeonardo's then-teenage son to Ray Brook Prison in February 2003 to get him to persuade his father not to testify against the mob boss. Michael Ricci…said he and Gotti talked about 'school, girls and sports. How I was doing.'" Ricci "said he made the jailhouse visit after finding out his father was going to cooperate with the feds, meaning he probably wouldn't see him again."

Two Georgia School Contract Fraud Conspirators Sentenced To Prison. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/12, Montgomery, 399K) reports former Georgia schools superintendent Linda Schrenko "reported to federal prison Monday afternoon while her former lover and deputy superintendent, Merle Temple, was sentenced to eight years and one month in prison. Another conspirator in the case, Alpharetta computer executive A. Stephen Botes, received an identical sentence to Temple: eight years and one month. The three were charged as part of a scheme to defraud the government of $600,000 in federal funds earmarked for deaf and honors students." The AP (9/12) also reports on the sentencings.

Corruption Trial Of Illinois Secretary Of State Employee Gets Underway. The AP (9/12, Dennis) reports, "A former high-ranking Illinois secretary of state official helped three janitors pocket more than $150,000 in state pay for work they didn't do in exchange for special treatment by city trash collectors in his Springfield neighborhood, prosecutors said Monday. Cecil Turner received no financial kickbacks in the alleged ghost payroll scheme, U.S. District Attorney Patrick Chesley said during opening statements in Turner's trial in federal court in Peoria. Instead, Chesley alleged Turner aided in the scheme because one of the janitors - Dana Dinora - also worked for Springfield's public works department, arranging quick pick ups of junk ranging from water heaters to a dog house for Turner and his neighbors.

Defense attorney Michael Metnick told jurors Turner was unaware of the alleged five-year payroll scam he maintains was orchestrated by Dinora, one of three former janitors who pleaded guilty in the scheme and agreed to cooperate in the case against Turner."

Anti-Castro Exiles In Florida Plead Guilty To Weapons Plot. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/12, Anderson) reports, "A prominent Cuban exile who virulently opposes the communist government of President Fidel Castro pleaded guilty Monday to weapons charges arising from seizures last year of machine guns, a grenade launcher and thousands of rounds of ammunition." Santiago Alvarez, "a wealthy developer and key benefactor of jailed Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles, pleaded guilty to a single criminal conspiracy charge," and his long-time employee, "Osvaldo Mitat, also pleaded guilty. Their pleas came a day before jury selection was scheduled to begin for a trial before a federal judge in Fort Lauderdale." The AP adds, "Alvarez and Mitat were arrested in November after an informant tipped the FBI that a large cooler full of military-style weapons was being transported from apartments in Broward County owned by Alvarez to Mitat in Miami." The New York Times (9/12, Aguayo, 1.21M) notes that Alvarez and Mitat "would have faced up to 20 years in prison if convicted. But prosecutors reduced the charges in a last-minute plea deal, and the men now face a maximum sentence of five years. The men were arrested last year after the Federal Bureau of Investigation seized machine guns, a grenade launcher and thousands of rounds of ammunition."

The Miami Herald (9/12, Weaver, 310K) reports, "Francisco 'Pepe' Hernandez, of the Cuban American National Foundation, said of Alvarez's decision to plead guilty: 'He didn't have any choice after the judge ruled on the insistence of the government bringing this trial in Broward.' 'They realized their chances were slim,' Hernandez said, 'and they wanted to spare the community this commotion.' Jose Basulto of Brothers to the Rescue said, 'George Washington would have been proud of these two men as patriots.'" The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/12, Blum, 265K) adds, "One longtime friend and supporter said Monday's guilty pleas marked a 'shameful day for Cuban patriots.'" The Sun-Sentinel also notes that the FBI was tipped off by the employee Alvarez asked to transport the weapons to Mitat.

Judge Rules Posada Carriles Should Be Released From Custody. The AP (9/12, Caldwell) reports, "U.S. Magistrate Judge Norbert Garney issued a 23-page written ruling Monday that Luis Posada Carriles should be set free from the El Paso immigration detention center where he has been held since his arrest on immigration charges last year, Posada's El Paso lawyer, Felipe D.J. Millan said Monday. Millan said the ruling will now go to a federal district judge. If Garney's ruling is upheld, which Millan believes will happen, he anticipates that Posada could be set free in about 30 days. … A Department of Justice spokesman said Monday evening that the agency is reviewing the decision." The AP notes, "Eric Wingerter, a Venezuelan government spokesman in Washington, said Garney's ruling 'is exactly the wrong message to be sending' in time of an increased focused on fighting terrorism."

8th Circuit Considers Sentencing Guidelines In Light Of Booker. The National Law Journal (9/12, Maclean) reports, "An 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge warned recently that the appellate court may be creating unconstitutional sentencing precedents that violate the spirit of last year's Supreme Court decision in U.S. v. Booker, which gave judges discretion to shape reasonable sentences." The Journal continues, "Nationally, circuits have been grappling with how much leeway to give trial judges in fashioning sentences that are either more or less lenient than the traditional guideline range established by the U.S. Sentencing Commission. … The 8th Circuit overturned the 11-year prison term for repeat offender Jeffrey A. McDonald in a methamphetamine case because it was less than half the recommended sentencing guideline range of 22 to 27 years and just one year more than the law's minimum limit. … The court ordered resentencing without such an extreme variance. … This prompted Judge Kermit E. Bye to point out in dissent that, since the Booker decision, the 8th Circuit has reversed 25 sentences below the guideline range while affirming four, yet affirmed 16 sentences above guideline range while reversing just one. … 'If we fail to implement the promise of Booker and do not relinquish greater discretion to experienced district court judges whose proximity to sentencing renders them eminently more qualified to appreciate the subtleties of each case, we will find ourselves the architects of a new -- and equally unconstitutional -- de facto mandatory sentencing system crafted from the ashes of the last,' Bye wrote in U.S. v. McDonald, No. 05-1617." The Journal notes, "Around the country, six circuits have held that sentences within the guideline range are presumptively reasonable. Only the 2nd Circuit declined to create a per se rule on the reasonableness of any sentence within approved ranges. U.S. v. Crosby, 397 F.3d 103 (2005)."

FBI Investigating Ohio Woman's Disappearance From Cruise Ship. The Miami Herald (9/12, Robinson, 310K) reports, "Federal officials are investigating the reported disappearance of a passenger who had been aboard a cruise ship that returned to the Port of Miami-Dade on Monday. The 36-year-old Ohio woman was reported missing from Carnival Cruise Lines' Imagination as it was en route from Mexico. FBI officials in Miami spent Monday morning interviewing family members who were on the ship. … FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said the investigation is just beginning," but she noted, "It doesn't look like foul play at this time." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/12) notes that the "cruise line said relatives last saw the woman early Sunday but did not report her missing until Monday, when the ship returned to Miami." Orihuela "said, however, that she was not aware of any delay in reporting the disappearance." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/12, Naanes, Stieghorst, 265K) also reports on the story, noting the Orihuela said there appears to be no evidence of foul play.

Loaded Gun Found In DC Court Cellblock. The AP (9/12) reports, "Investigators were trying to determine how a loaded handgun got into a cellblock inside District of Columbia Superior Court." The AP continues, "A cleaning contractor found the .25-caliber semiautomatic pistol under a wad of paper in a cell toilet Friday, said Steve Conboy, the U.S. marshal for Superior Court. … It was the first time such a serious security breach occurred at the busy downtown courthouse in at least 10 years, authorities said." The AP adds, "Conboy, who oversees courthouse security, said he does not know how the small pistol was smuggled into the building. … All prisoners are patted down by deputy marshals before being taken into the cellblock -- whether coming from the D.C. jail, police headquarters or off the street. … But only people who are taken into custody in a courtroom after coming in off the street are scanned by a metal detector, Conboy said."

California Highway Patrol Probing Computer Breaches. The New York Times (9/12, Steinhauer) reports, "The California Highway Patrol is investigating outside breaches of a computer system used by aides to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to store downloaded audio files, a spokesman for the patrol said Monday. In those files, some of which were leaked to The Los Angeles Times, the governor was heard telling Susan Kennedy, his chief of staff, that Cubans and Puerto Ricans were naturally passionate because of their combination of 'black blood' and 'Latino blood.' … 'We are looking into the security of the governor's office computer system,' said Fran Clader, a spokeswoman for the Highway Patrol, which is in charge of policing state facilities." Clader "would not provide details of the investigation, but a person associated with the governor said that three times over the last week of August and the first week of September a person or group of people gained access to the governor's staff computers from outside the Sacramento offices. The person spoke on the condition of anonymity because the matter could become the subject of a criminal investigation."

Arizona Man Charged In Rape Case Linked To Phoenix Killings. The AP (9/12, Kahn) reports from Phoenix, AZ, "An ex-convict and construction worker was charged with 17 felony counts Monday in two sexual assaults linked to an investigation of a string of serial killings." The AP continues, "Maricopa County Attorney Andrew P. Thomas said that authorities are not calling Goudeau the 'Baseline Killer' and that he has not been named as a suspect in 22 other robberies, rapes and shootings that left eight people dead since August 2005. … For more than a year, a predator known as the Baseline Killer has terrorized the Phoenix area with killings, rapes and robberies. Police continue to try to understand how and whether Goudeau is connected, Thomas said." The AP adds, "The case is one of two serial-predator cases in the Phoenix area in the past year. Police have arrested two men in the other, dubbed the "Serial Shooter" investigation. … At a news conference, Thomas said Arizona's parole board was 'naive and misguided' when it granted early release to Goudeau in 2004. Goudeau had eight more years to go on a prison sentence for unrelated assault charges. … Goudeau is accused of attacking two sisters, who were 21 and 23, in September 2005 while they were walking in a park at night. Defense lawyer Corwin A. Townsend said that Goudeau plans to plead not guilty to the charges. And as soon as he gets the chance, Townsend said, he will independently test the DNA evidence that authorities used to arrest Goudeau."

DOJ Joins Probe Of Drug Maker Over Pricing Allegations. The AP (9/12) reports, "The federal government is joining in a whistleblower's lawsuit in Boston alleging a drug maker inflated prices for medications and defrauded Medicare and Medicaid." The AP continues, "The Justice Department said today it is intervening in the case against Dey (DAU) Incorporated, a California-based U-S affiliate of the German drug maker Merck." The AP adds, "The government is joining a complaint by a Florida pharmacy and provider of home drug-infusion services. Ven-a-Care also has brought complaints alleging drug makers defrauded government programs. … Officials accuse Dey of reporting prices for drugs that were more than five times the actual sales prices, costing the government more than 500 (m) million dollars in reimbursement."

United Press International/UPI (9/12) reports, "Dey LP, a California drug company, denied Monday that it engaged in wrongdoing in the pricing or marketing of its medicines. … The denials follow word from the U.S. Justice Department earlier in the day that it intervened in a whistleblower suit against Dey." UPI adds, "Justice's complaint alleges that Dey engaged in a scheme to report 'fraudulent and inflated' prices for several pharmaceutical products, knowing that federal healthcare programs established reimbursement rates based on those reported prices. … Dey's denial took aim at the method used by the government in developing its complaint. … 'When virtually an entire industry is sued -- as has been the case with the pricing lawsuits that have been filed around the country by dozens of attorneys general -- it indicates that the real issue is not the industry's conduct, but rather the government's own reimbursement system,' said John M. Kling, senior vice president-legal at Dey."

New Jersey Gets $500,000 From GlaxoSmithKline Settlement. The AP (9/12) reports, "New Jersey prosecutors say the state will get nearly $500,000 dollars from GlaxoSmithKline to settle claims it overcharged the government for two anti-nausea drugs." The AP continues, "New Jersey was reimbursed more than $472,000 from a $149-million national settlement with the Justice Department. … The government said Glaxo engaged in a scheme to inflate the price of Zofran and Kytril for the Medicare and Medicaid programs, which reimburse health care providers based on the manufacturers' prices." The AP adds, "The drugs are typically administered in doctors' offices or hospitals and are mainly used to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation. .. The Justice Department claims the company charged health care providers less for the drugs, knowing the providers would get to pocket the difference, and would be more likely to prescribe them again."

USA Today Doubts Big Tobacco's Reform Pledges. USA Today (9/12) editorializes, "Tobacco companies have spent years trying to look as if they've reformed their old deceptive ways. … But in just the past month, new information has come to light that strongly suggests they are still willing to sacrifice smokers' lives for profits:" USA continues, "On Aug. 17, a federal judge found that cigarette-makers marketed and sold their lethal products by deceiving the public about the risks of smoking for five decades. The duplicity and manipulation, she wrote, 'continues to this day.' … Two weeks later, the industry returned to court brazenly seeking a loophole that would allow it to continue the deception overseas. … On Aug. 29, Massachusetts health officials reported that the average nicotine delivery in scores of cigarette brands had increased by an average of 10% during seven years ending in 2004. Nicotine is the chemical that hooks smokers and keeps them hooked." USA adds, "These findings and the industry's own actions suggest that its recent show of good corporate citizenship is as ephemeral as a puff of smoke. They might also prove expensive. … Sadly, the public doesn't know what the industry is doing with nicotine or any ingredient. Thanks to industry lobbying and campaign contributions, there is no meaningful regulation. Never mind that tobacco kills 400,000 Americans a year. Until Congress gets serious about regulating cigarettes, Big Tobacco will have the last word."

Philip Morris Official Disputes Nicotine Findings. In an op-ed for USA Today (9/12), Michael A. Farriss, senior vice president of communications and government affairs for Philip Morris USA, writes, "The Massachusetts Department of Public Health recently issued a report based on data from 1998 to 2004 that concluded 'the amount of nicotine that is actually delivered to the smoker's lungs has increased significantly.' The MDPH report cites Philip Morris USA and its Marlboro brand. … The principal reason the MDPH report seems to show an upward trend for Marlboro is because it did not include the earliest reported data from 1997 and the most recent reported data from November 2005. We believe that when one looks at the Marlboro data from all the years reported to the MDPH (1997 through 2005), there are variations in nicotine yields, both up and down, in different brand packings, but there is no trend in nicotine yields, up or down." Farriss adds, "We do not believe that the MDPH's conclusions about the trends in nicotine yields for Marlboro are supported by the 1997 through 2005 data. Even so, there are some fundamental conclusions that Philip Morris USA and the MDPH seem to share: Cigarette smoking is addictive, cigarette smoking causes disease and death, and comprehensive federal Food and Drug Administration regulation of the tobacco industry would be good public health policy."

EEOC Seeks To Compel Testimony In Sidley Austin Age Bias Suit. The New York Law Journal

(9/12, Lin) reports, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has moved to compel testimony about recent conversations between Sidley Austin partners and a former financial director who signed a 1999 letter stating that the firm had a mandatory retirement policy." The Journal continues, "Sidley has denied having such a policy in the face of an EEOC suit claiming the Chicago-based law firm discriminated against 31 partners on the basis of age when it demoted them to counsel in 1999. The EEOC has claimed the financial director's letter 'flatly contradicts' the firm's position." The Journal adds, "The letter, dated Oct. 21, 1999, and addressed to the Social Security Administration in Chicago, states that 'it is the general policy of Sidley & Austin not to permit a partner of the firm to continue as a partner commencing the first of the year following the year age 65 is reached.' The letter is signed by William B. White, financial director." The Journal notes, "According to the EEOC motion filed last Tuesday in Chicago federal court, White testified at a July 26 deposition that he believed the letter to be an accurate statement of the firm's retirement policy at the time he signed it. But he also testified that, after conversations earlier this year with Sidley partners William F. Conlon and Theodore N. Miller, he realized the letter did not accurately state firm policy. … The lawyer representing Sidley at the deposition, Michael Conway of Chicago's Grippo & Elden, objected to questions about these conversations on the grounds that they were privileged. The EEOC is seeking to compel White's testimony about them."

9th Circuit Upholds Contempt Charge Over Videotaped Protest. The AP (9/12, Kravets) reports, "A federal appeals court on Monday upheld the contempt of court citation against a freelance journalist who is refusing to cooperate with a grand jury investigating an anarchists' protest he videotaped." The AP continues, "A federal grand jury subpoenaed Joshua Wolf to acquire the 30 minutes of unpublished material, but he refused and was ordered jailed Aug. 1. He was released a month later as he appealed his case. … The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Monday that a 1972 Supreme Court precedent requires everyone, including journalists, to appear before grand juries if they have been summoned. … 'The Supreme Court has declined to interpret the First Amendment to "grant newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy,"' a three-judge panel of the San Francisco-based appeals court wrote." The AP adds, "Wolf, 24, videotaped a July 2005 protest where anarchists allegedly vandalized a San Francisco police car and an officer suffered a fractured skull after being hit. The anarchists were protesting a G-8 international economic conference in Scotland. … Wolf sold some of the footage to San Francisco television stations and posted it on his Web site, but refused to turn over unpublished material. U.S. District Judge William Alsup found him in contempt of court and ordered him jailed."

The New York Times (9/12, McKinley) reports, "At the protest, timed to coincide with the Group of Eight Summit of world economic leaders in Scotland, a police officer was injured and an explosive device, a smoke bomb or a firework, was put under a police car. … Mr. Wolf sold some of his film to local television stations and posted parts on his Web site, www.joshwolf.net. Earlier this year, the government subpoenaed Mr. Wolf to testify and to turn over the remaining video, which prosecutors wanted to use to gather evidence for potential arson charges. Mr. Wolf has refused, and in an interview on Monday, he remained defiant. 'Nothing the government can do,' he said, 'will coerce me into submitting to their demands. I intend to appeal this through every measure possible.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Wolf remained free on Monday, and it was not clear if the decision would result in his returning to jail immediately. His lawyer, Jose Luis Fuentes, said he would ask for a rehearing before the entire court. … Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California, said his office was awaiting an order from the Ninth Circuit 'clarifying Mr. Wolf's custodial status.'"

Parties To Tennessee College Desegregation Case Call For Dismissal. The New York Times (9/12, Emery) reports, "In 1966, a young black woman named Rita Sanders, fresh out of graduate school, took a job teaching at a traditionally black college" in Nashville. In 1968, she sued the state for "maintaining an inferior system of higher education for blacks." Monday, Rita Sanders Geier, "stood alongside Gov. Phil Bredesen of Tennessee on Monday to announce that the state had met its obligations to desegregate higher education and that she, along with the other plaintiffs and parties, would ask a judge to dismiss the lawsuit." That "signified the conclusion of a significant civil rights case that sought to erase vestiges of segregation." All parties to the case entered mediation six years ago, "and a year later they hammered out an agreement that would result in the dismissal of the lawsuit after five years, if all the conditions were met. On Monday, the parties said the conditions had been met, including appropriating $15.5 million for the Tennessee State endowment, $19.8 million in capital outlays and almost $15 million in financial aid. All told, the state has spent $77 million since 2001 to increase equality and diversity at state colleges and universities."

Nebraska Law Dividing Omaha District Into Three Defended For Giving Minorities Greater Say. DeWayne Wickham writes in his column for USA Today (9/12) Nebraska state Sen. Ernie Chambers "never made it to the Congressional Black Caucus' annual legislative conference last week, but he was the elephant in the room when some of the attendees got together to talk about this nation's racial divide." Chambers is "the only black member of Nebraska's state senate" and "co-author of a law that divides Omaha's public school system into three smaller districts -- one mostly black, another largely white and the other predominately Hispanic." Chambers said that "his law will give black and Hispanic parents more control over the schools their children attend. More control, he believes, will translate into greater academic achievement." Wickham concludes, "In 1935, W.E.B. DuBois, the black sociologist and civil rights activist, wrote that 'the Negro needs neither segregated schools nor mixed schools. What he needs is (a good) Education.' Chambers thinks DuBois is right -- and so do I."

Parties Feud Over Voter ID Laws. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Wallsten, 918K) reports that a nationwide fight has erupted between liberal and conservative groups over "new laws that could determine who wins close elections in November and beyond." The dispute "concerns new state laws and rules backed primarily by Republicans that require people to show photo identification in order to vote and, in some cases, proof of citizenship and identification when registering to vote. … The legal battle reflects a deep partisan divide, with Republicans arguing that the new requirements are needed to prevent voting fraud and boost confidence in election results, and Democrats charging that they disenfranchise seniors, minorities, students and others who tend to vote Democratic."

Pentagon Hopes Improved Web Site Will Help Overseas Americans Vote. The Washington Post/AP (9/12, A21) reports, "The Pentagon is counting on an improved Web site to help an estimated 6.5 million Americans -- including US troops at war and others living overseas -- vote in the November elections, and to avoid the problems of the 2000 presidential election." According to officials, the site "now includes information on how voters can request and get ballots by fax and e-mail rather than rely on slower postal service. The Defense Department is responsible for the balloting process not only for troops but for all expatriate voters. The potential voters include all 1.4 million active-duty service members in the United States and abroad, about 1.4 million of their family members, and 3.7 million other Americans living outside the country, said Polli Brunelli, director of the voting assistance program. The total includes about 225,000 troops deployed in Iraq, in Afghanistan and elsewhere around the world."

ANTITRUST:

Monitor Urges Dismissal Of Bristol-Myers CEO. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Carreyrou, Martinez) reports, "Directors at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. head into a board meeting today facing heavy pressure to fire Chief Executive Officer Peter R. Dolan and the drug maker's general counsel after a federal monitor overseeing the New York company urged their dismissal last night." The Journal continues, "The board, which already was expected to discuss Mr. Dolan's fate at its meeting today after the latest in a long string of missteps, has little choice but to accept the monitor's recommendation. Bristol-Myers is operating under the terms of a deferred-prosecution agreement reached with the U.S. Attorney in New Jersey last year following a three-year investigation into a $2.5 billion scandal at the company involving 'channel stuffing,' or overloading wholesalers with inventory to meet quarterly sales targets. If the board refuses to fire Mr. Dolan, the company could face charges in connection with the probe." The Journal adds, "The Bristol-Myers monitor, former federal Judge Frederick B. Lacey, recommended to a special session of the company's board late yesterday that it terminate Mr. Dolan and Bristol-Myers General Counsel Richard Willard, according to a person familiar with the matter. The meeting was attended by the U.S. Attorney for New Jersey, Christopher Christie, who appointed Mr. Lacey last year in the settlement agreement."

The New York Times (9/12, Saul) reports, "The board appears bound to abide by the recommendation from Frederick B. Lacey, a former federal judge. Mr. Lacey is monitoring the company's behavior under the terms of an agreement the company reached with the federal government last year in hopes of avoiding criminal prosecution for an accounting scandal." The Times continues, "The only reprieve for Mr. Dolan could be granted by Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney in New Jersey who is the prosecutor in that case. He has the power to overturn Mr. Lacey's recommendation. But it appeared that Mr. Christie, who was present for Mr. Lacey's meeting last night with most of the company's 11 directors, supported the recommendation to remove Mr. Dolan, according to the participant."

Market Watch (9/12, Marketwatch) reports, "In June 2005, Bristol-Myers reached a settlement with the Justice Department for $300 million to end a long-running government investigation into its accounting. At that time, the company conceded that it had engaged in questionable practices, inflating sales by $2.5 billion and net earnings by $900 million between 1999 and 2001."

EU Takes Over German Antitrust Probe Of Intel. The Financial Times (9/12, Buck) reports, "European regulators have expanded their antitrust probe against Intel to include charges that the world's largest chipmaker tried to prevent retailers from offering computers powered by rival microprocessors." The Times continues, "The European Commission, which has been investigating Intel's business practices for more than five years, said yesterday it had taken over a probe that was started by Germany's Federal Cartel Office this year. … The investigation centres on allegations that Intel attempted to hurt Advanced Micro Devices, its rival, by cutting off the company's access to the Media Markt and Saturn retail outlets. Owned by Metro, the German retail group, the chains are Europe's biggest computer retailers."

CNET News (9/12, Kawamoto) reports, "Germany's antitrust agency, Bundeskartellamt, received a complaint from AMD alleging that Intel had abused its dominant market position by putting pressure on major electronics retailer Media Markt to not sell AMD's chips. Because the Commission found similarities with its existing probe into Intel, it took over the German investigation in late August, Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said." CNET adds, "Intel will cooperate with the EU investigation, as it has done over the past five years, said Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy, who added that the company believes its actions are 'fair and lawful.'" CNET notes, "Last year, the Commission raided several European Intel offices as well as offices of companies that manufacture or sell computers. … Other countries have weighed in with their own investigations into Intel's business practices. Earlier this year, the Korean Fair Trade Commission sought more documents from Intel relating to its antitrust investigation into the chip giant."

The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Jacoby, Echikson) reports, "If regulators decide Intel broke European antitrust rules, the commission would issue a 'statement of objections' outlining its specific concerns. Recent success in the marketplace by AMD prompted the commission's top antitrust civil servant, Philip Lowe to suggest the case had lost some urgency. … Yesterday, commission spokesman Mr. Todd said AMD's recent increased sales didn't augur an end to the probe. AMD spokesman Jens Drews said he believed regulators would disregard AMD's recent market gains and focus on whether Intel had used illegal anticompetitive practices."

Battle Over Software Patents Heads To European Courtrooms. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Jacoby) reports, "A proposal here to create a new European patents court has the support of Microsoft Corp., Siemens AG and many other giants of Western industry. But can it survive an attack from Hartmut Pilch? … A 43-year-old linguist from Munich, Mr. Pilch speaks Chinese, Japanese and an artificial language called Lojban intended to eliminate ambiguity and promoted by some programmers. He is the unlikely leader of a movement of self-styled computer geeks out to sink a patents plan they say would stifle software programmers. … 'Patents on software mean any programmer can be sued at any time,' says Mr. Pilch, a simultaneous translator who writes computer programs for his own use in his leisure time." The Journal continues, "In July last year, heeding appeals posted on the Web site of Mr. Pilch's lobbying group, about 200 programmers descended on the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France, waving signs demanding the right to freely exchange computer code. … The Parliament was poised to approve a law extending American-style software patents to Europe, the most lucrative consumer market outside the U.S. … A panicky Parliament suddenly backed off a law the industry giants had spent several years and millions of euros lobbying to enact. … The surprise winners: U.S. software companies Red Hat Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc., the only large companies that had taken public stands against the software patents law. …

Today, the battle has shifted to an effort to create a special patents court that would handle appeals cases from all over Europe. Companies like Microsoft support the idea in large part because many national courts currently reject software patents, bucking rulings by the European-wide patent office."

Industries Seek Share Of Ticket Reseller's Take. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Smith, Silver) reports, "Reselling sports and concert tickets online has become a multibillion-dollar business for eBay Inc., StubHub Inc. and other middlemen. Now the concert and sports industry -- and Ticketmaster, which sells the majority of seats -- are fighting to take back some of that money." The Journal continues, "A division of Barry Diller's IAC/InterActiveCorp, Ticketmaster is overhauling the way it sells tickets, embracing new methods that it long shunned. It is now running auctions to sell seats for roughly 30% of this year's major music tours -- including Pink Floyd's Roger Waters, Barbra Streisand, Madonna, B.B. King and Melissa Etheridge. Ticketmaster also is letting customers resell some seats at its Web site. Since that lets fans sell tickets far above face value, Ticketmaster has joined the fight against state antiscalping laws, reversing its earlier position." The Journal adds, "Concert promoters, performers and sports teams stand to win if the new methods at Ticketmaster reduce scalper sales -- and return some of the proceeds to their own coffers. … Ticketmaster, which for 15 years has held a near-monopoly over the market for ticketing major live events, is battling competition from online rivals that can easily resell tickets at whatever price the market will bear. The result is a marketplace in the throes of upheaval, confronting a pricing system that everyone agrees is dysfunctional."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Manure-To-Power Venture Spawns Fraud Suits. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Pugmire, Heisel) reports, "As he sold investors on an improbable plan for turning...cow manure into electricity, W. Patrick Moriarty...promised cutting-edge technology, a respected engineering firm and tax-exempt financing to extract methane gas from mountains of manure and use it to generate enough power to light a small city." What Moriarty and his business partner didn't tell investors, who put up more than $10 million, "was that their company, Chino Organic Power Inc., had no licensed technology, no equipment, no permits — not even a guaranteed supply of manure. Although manure-to-electricity plants have been used on a small scale to turn water-polluting cow waste into power, they are not particularly cost-effective and have never produced close to the amount of electricity Moriarty envisioned, documents and interviews show." The Times says, "the lofty energy plan has come crashing down, followed by a bankruptcy and accusations from angry investors, a number of whom have filed lawsuits alleging fraud ... ." However, Moriarty "said last week that he intended to keep fighting to build some version of a manure-based power plant in California."

Tribes Ask Senate To Block Jonker Nomination. The AP (9/12) reports, "Seven American Indian tribes in Michigan are asking federal lawmakers to block the judicial nomination of a lawyer who has represented groups opposed to the expansion of casino gambling." In letters to Democratic Senators Debbie Stabenow and Carl Levin, the tribes "wrote that Robert Jonker's work indicates a bias against Indian tribes and raises questions about his fitness to serve as a federal district judge." Jonker "was nominated in June for a vacancy on the U-S District Court for Michigan's Western District. His hearing before a Senate panel has not yet been scheduled."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Los Angeles Mob Figure Gets More Than 10 Years For Racketeering. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Mozingo) reports Hai Waknine, "an Israeli-born mob figure known for holding court at the hippest of Westside clubs" in Los Angeles, was sentenced to "more than 10 years in prison for racketeering." In June, Waknine pleaded guilty during "to using extortion and threats of violence to help an Israeli crime group launder nearly $2 million in embezzled funds. The case against Waknine stemmed from ongoing federal probes into Israeli rings that traffic the club drug Ecstasy and launder the proceeds. Several of Waknine's associates have been convicted of Ecstasy trafficking. Waknine and his older brother Assaf, who grew up in Van Nuys, have been on the Los Angeles Police Department's radar since they were teenagers."

Houston-Louisiana Cocaine Ring Busted. The New Orleans Times Picayune (9/8) reported, "Nine men -- including four from Metairie, two from LaPlace and one each from Kenner and Destrehan -- have been indicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine powder and crack cocaine, the U.S. attorney's office said Thursday. Among those charged in the Aug. 31 federal grand jury indictment, which was unsealed this week, was Henry Gloston, 25, of Houston, who is accused of running kilogram-size shipments of the drugs from Houston to William Lang, 32, also known as 'Tussy' or 'Hood,' of Metairie, one of the local defendants." US Attorney Jim Letten said Lang "would sell the cocaine powder and crack to other defendants for distribution in Metairie and nearby." DEA agent William Renton, said the investigation "has dismantled 'a significant cocaine distribution organization, from wholesale and street level distributors operating in Metairie and Kenner to the Houston, Texas, source of supply.' As part of the investigation, Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies made undercover drug purchases from an additional 24 people, resulting in state warrants for related drug-trafficking crimes, the U.S. attorney's office said. Twenty-two of the 33 defendants were arrested in a roundup early Thursday morning, the U.S. attorney's office said. It is unclear how many of the 22 were among the nine indicted on federal charges."

Tennessee Marijuana Runner Pleads Guilty. The Knoxville News Sentinel (9/12, Satterfield) reports "businessman-turned-convicted pot peddler" Scott West "faces as much as nine years behind bars when sentenced later this year." He pleaded guilty Monday "to charges he conspired with his older brother, James Michael West, and others to push more than a ton of marijuana along a pipeline that ran from Arizona to Tennessee, Georgia and North Carolina. He also admitted pumping millions of his brother's drug money into his Market Square ventures, using the dirty cash to buy several buildings on Market Square and launch businesses such as the Preservation Pub, Oodles Uncorked and World Grotto." West's wife Bernadette Trent West also "entered a guilty plea to conspiring to launder drug money. As a result of a plea negotiated by her defense attorney, David Eldridge, she faces a penalty range of 46 to 57 months."

Sentences Handed Down In San Diego Marijuana Cases. The AP (9/11) reports prison sentences were handed down for two San Diego-area defendants "convicted in unrelated cases involving marijuana cultivation, federal prosecutors announced Monday." Daniel Barton of Carlsbad, "who managed a substantial marijuana 'grow' operation at a residence in Valley Center, was sentenced to 37 months behind bars," while Christopher DeMatteis "was sentenced to 30 months in federal prison after pleading guilty to a conspiracy charge involving 555 marijuana plants. He admitted that he was the caretaker and operator of a substantial marijuana 'grow' operation in Oceanside, which was owned by his brother and co-defendant, Eric DeMatteis, who also pleaded guilty."

Ex-Armstrong Teammates Admit Doping During 1999 Tour De France. The New York Times (9/12, Macur) reports, "Two of Lance Armstrong's eight teammates from the 1999 Tour de France have admitted for the first time that they used the banned endurance-boosting drug EPO in preparing for the race that year, when they helped Armstrong capture the first of his record seven titles." The disclosures by Frankie Andreu and another anonymous team member "are rare examples of candor in a sport protected by a powerful code of silence. The confessions come as cycling is reeling from doping scandals, including Floyd Landis's fall in July from Tour champion to suspected cheat." Andreu said that he took EPO "for only a few races and that he was acknowledging his use now because he thought doping was damaging his sport. Continued doping and denial by riders may scare away fans and sponsors for good, he said." The other rider said, "The environment was certainly one of, to be accepted, you had to use doping products. There was very high pressure to be one of the cool kids." Neither rider "ever tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs, but both said they felt as if they had to take EPO to make the Tour team in 1999."

Salinas, CA, Seen As Site Of Organized Gun Trafficking. The Monterey (CA) Herald (9/12, Reynolds, Sánchez) reports, "For years, Salinas police have said that most of the guns used in local crimes in the city were stolen individually during residential burglaries. Police reports indicate that there have been no significant robberies of local gun stores, and most firearms acquired in the city are bought legally. … But over the last 20 years, the city has also had several notable episodes of organized gun trafficking, as the following cases show." The Herald continues, "One unexpected source of cheap handguns was the Santa Ana Police Department. In the 1990s, it was not uncommon for police departments to sell confiscated weapons to gun dealers. In 1993, an Assembly analysis found that most of the weapons sold were the type used for hunting or collection value and were not cheap 'Saturday Night Specials.' … But one exception was a sale by the Santa Ana Police Department through a Modesto broker of 25 small pistols to Justin Davis, proprietor of the now-defunct JKD Shooting Sports in Salinas for $30 each. Davis told a reporter he bought the .25-caliber pistols because a factory had temporarily stopped making them. … 'The police are just partners in the recirculating of these weapons onto the streets of California after these weapons have been taken away,' then-Sen. Tom Hayden, D-Santa Monica, complained at the time." The Herald adds, "Some of the weapons were used in bank robberies, convenience store holdups and shootings, an agent at the San Jose office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, told the San Jose Mercury News."

IMMIGRATION:

Putnam To Participate In Rally Urging Comprehensive Immigration Reform. CQ (9/11, Sandler) reported, "Rep. Adam H. Putnam was tasked last week with assembling a tough border security package that House Republicans hope will provide their party a boost leading up to Election Day. The Florida Republican will serve the 'security first' approach favored by his caucus, organizing a policy forum Tuesday that will generate ideas he will turn into legislative proposals designed to put political pressure on those who favor a broader Senate immigration bill. But on Wednesday, Putnam will share a platform with some of the very people his House leadership is looking to squeeze: supporters of the other chamber's version of an immigration overhaul. Putnam has accepted an invitation to join a coalition of business interests and Sen. Larry E. Craig, R-Idaho, at a rally outside the Capitol urging passage of the Senate's 'comprehensive' immigration bill this year. The groups Putnam will stand with Wednesday want a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants now in the country — positions that most of Putnam's GOP House colleagues oppose."

Morris, McGann Say GOP Punted On Immigration Reform. Dick Morris and Eileen McGann write in The Hill (9/12), "The decision by the Republican leadership not even to try to pass immigration reform before the election smacks of punting when they should have gone for a touchdown. America is begging for tough immigration reform and looking to the Republican Party to exercise its traditional role of leadership in law and order issues. But even without a real threat of a Democratic filibuster, the Republican Party has tripped over its own feet and given up its attempt to meet the needs of the country and of its constituents." Republican voters "are not likely to forgive GOP ineptitude and failure. With a 30-vote margin in the House and 10 in the Senate, they will find the lack of action inexplicable. … Whether or not the Republicans keep control of Congress in the 2006 election, their numbers will be reduced. The chances of a good immigration reform bill will decline proportionally."

Schwarzenegger Urges Civil Debate On Immigration Reform. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger writes in the Los Angeles Times (9/12, 918K), "By not finishing comprehensive immigration reform this year, Congress left behind a poisoned debate that will continue to fuel a growing anger in our country. … So it's up to the rest of us to tone down our rhetoric and listen to the voices on all sides." Schwarzenegger adds, "Unfortunately, we must wait for Congress to return next year to take up the critical issue of comprehensive immigration reform. Meanwhile, we must do all we can to stop the problem from getting worse and to maintain a civil debate about illegal immigration."

Analysts Watching Arizona Primary To See How Immigration Resonates With Voters. Arizona's primary election today coincides with the House's final field hearing on immigration. The Hill (9/12, Sherman) reports that "political analysts are watching the elections closely to see how immigration resonates with voters. In Arizona's open 8th congressional district, conservative GOP candidate Randy Graf and moderate Steve Huffman are squaring off to replace outgoing Rep. Jim Kolbe. Graf press secretary R.T. Gregg said House Republicans' immigration hearings over the August recess have helped focus attention on an important issue for the district."

TAX:

Glaxo Settles IRS Suit For $3.4 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Matthews, Whalen) reports GlaxoSmithKline PLC will pay the US "$3.4 billion to settle a nearly two-decade-long dispute over how to tax dealings between the British company and its American subsidiary, in a case that underscores" the IRS's "resolve to confront corporate tax avoidance." The settlement "covers taxes…Glaxo owed for 1989 through 2005 because the company's American unit improperly overpaid its British parent for drugs." It said "those overpayments reduced the company's profit in the U.S., thus lowering its U.S. tax bill."

The AP (9/12, Dalrymple) reports, "The disagreement concerned how much of the profits from certain drugs, particularly the ulcer and heartburn medication Zantac, should be attributed to U.S. subsidiaries of GlaxoSmithKline PLC and, therefore, subject to tax." The AP continues, "As part of the settlement, Glaxo abandoned its claim for a $1.8 billion tax refund. Glaxo spokeswoman Patty Seif said the IRS had rejected the company's refund claim and held that Glaxo owed $8.3 billion for taxes due from 1989 through 2000. … That case had been scheduled for trial at the U.S. Tax Court in February." The AP adds, "The IRS has been looking more closely at multinational tax practices and the complex transactions that cross borders in the globalized economy. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson this summer told a Senate committee investigating offshore tax abuses that the complexities of globalization and cross-border transactions 'create opportunities for aggressive tax planning.' … IRS Chief Counsel Donald Korb said Monday that a 'key focus' for tax collectors is transfer pricing, the issue involved in the Glaxo dispute, as one area where some multinational companies could take advantage of the global economy to move some profits to a country with lower or no taxes."

Former Tyco Tax Official Charged With Filing False Return. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Levitz) reports, "The former top tax official at Tyco International Ltd. was charged with filing a false tax return for the company that failed to report more than $170 million in income." The Journal continues, "Raymond Scott Stevenson, who was vice president in charge of taxation at the manufacturing-and-services conglomerate until 2003, pleaded not guilty before a federal magistrate in Fort Pierce, Fla., to a felony fraud charge. He was released on $100,000 bail." The Journal adds, "According to the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Florida, Mr. Stevenson, of Delray Beach, Fla., directed a 'series of transactions' designed to reduce Tyco's state tax liability, and in doing so triggered $170 million in capital gains under federal tax code. The capital gains would have added about $50 million to Tyco's tax bill, said Ellie Michaud, a spokeswoman for the Internal Revenue Service's criminal division. On Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return, Mr. Stevenson 'left off' the $170 million, Ms. Michaud said. … The transaction may have been related to one of the company's acquisitions, Tyco spokeswoman Sheri Woodruff said."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pelosi Calls GOP Ethics Reform Bill "A Sham." In a letter to USA Today (9/12, 2.27M), House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi writes that there are "real differences" between Democrats' and Republicans' ethics reform plans. Democrats "voted in favor of a true reform bill, the Honest Leadership & Open Government Act, which would ban gifts and travel from lobbyists and the organizations that retain them; prohibit official travel on corporate jets; extend the ban on former members' lobbying to two years; require greater disclosure of lobbyist contacts; mandate fair and open debate in the Congress; and impose tough new standards to end waste, fraud and abuse. House Republicans, in contrast, put forward only a sham of a proposal, which USA TODAY has rightly called an 'anemic excuse' for reform." Pelosi adds that Republicans "have turned this Congress into the most corrupt and closed in history. Democrats want to take Congress in a new direction, to make it the most open and honest in history."

Democrats Say They Would Run House In Less Partisan Manner Than GOP. CQ (9/11, Kady, Ferrechio) reported that House Democrats "are suggesting that they would run the chamber in a less partisan manner. Among the changes being floated in the heat of the campaign are allowing more floor amendments from the minority, negotiating conference agreements in public and enforcing time limits on roll call votes. Many of the ideas reflect the Democrats' complaints about 12 years of Republican rule. The public discussion of detailed proposals shows the confidence with which the party so long out of power is approaching the November elections."

Navy Was Moving To Fire Controversial Chaplain. The Washington Times (9/12, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "Internal e-mails indicate that the Navy was moving to fire an outspoken chaplain even before he was charged with disobeying an order. Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, whose court-martial is scheduled to begin today in Norfolk, yesterday said the e-mails given to his defense team prove that the Navy was plotting to fire him after he had complained publicly about a commander censoring his sermons." The Times quotes an email from Vice Adm. John Harvey, "the Navy's top personnel officer," to CNO Adm. Michael Mullen. Klingenschmitt is described as "a member of a small breakaway evangelical Episcopal denomination."

Government Accounting Said To Understate Federal Deficit. In his Washington Post column (9/12, D2), Newsweek Wall Street editor Allan Sloan says, "Next month, the White House and its congressional allies will be taking victory laps when the deficit for fiscal 2006 is announced. The stated deficit for the year, which ends Sept. 30, will be $260 billion or so. That will be down $58 billion from 2005 and a whopping $77 billion below what the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted in January. The White House says this is happening largely because tax revenues have surged, which they have. It sure sounds great." But the "dirty little secret" is that the "real federal deficit isn't $260 billion. It's more than double that. And when you calculate what I consider the real deficit -- hold on to your hats, it's $558 billion -- you come out with slightly more than last year's real deficit, which I put at $551 billion." The "stated deficit is the difference between the cash the government takes in and the cash it spends. That's $260 billion, the number most analysts use to measure the deficit." But the government will also "borrow almost $300 billion from federal trust funds: $177 billion from Social Security and $121 billion more from 'other government accounts,' such as federal-employee pension funds."

WSJournal Says Congress Should Enact Tort Reform. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) editorializes, "Cornerstone Research released a study this summer showing a huge drop in securities class-action suits, and a common explanation has been that this is a result of new rules designed to keep the corporate community on the straight and narrow: No wrongdoing, no need for lawyers. … Lawsuits are certainly down, but a closer inspection of the numbers shows that the drop-off directly correlates with the decline in filing by one law firm: Milberg Weiss. Long the nation's premier class-action generator, the entire firm and two partners were indicted in May of paying off their class-action plaintiffs." The Journal adds, "The numbers should also provide all the evidence Congress needs to conclude that the only real way to rein in America's runaway legal system is with tort reform that allows redress of genuine wrongs but limits the ability of lawyers to game the system. Milberg Weiss may be in the dock, but it's only a matter of time before other firms take up the slack."

Economists Predict Inflation Will Rise Even As Growth Slows. USA Today (9/12, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "Inflation will rise faster than previously thought through the end of the year while economic growth will be slower, a group of prominent economists said Monday, painting an especially hazy outlook." The National Association for Business Economics "said inflation expectations rose significantly in its survey of 50 members conducted in August from its last poll released four months ago. Instead of expecting so-called core inflation, which excludes often-volatile food and energy costs, to rise 2.3% in the second half of 2006, the economists' median forecast is for the index to rise 2.9% in the third quarter and 2.7% in the fourth quarter." At the same time, the group "lowered its forecast for economic growth and job creation through the middle of next year."

The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Blackstone, 2.03M) reports the group also said "an outright recession is unlikely." Gross domestic product "is projected by the 50 forecasters surveyed by NABE to expand 2.6% in the second half of 2006. For 2007, the NABE panel cut its forecast to 2.8% from the 3% rate it expected when last surveyed in May. The latest survey was conducted between Aug. 9 and 24." Productivity "will be less of a factor in limiting price pressures than it has been in the past, according to NABE. Survey respondents cut their 2006 productivity growth forecast to 2.2% from the 2.5% forecast in the May survey. Productivity next year is expected to rise just 2.1%. Meanwhile, unit labor costs are expected to climb 2.7% this year and 2.3% next year, up from the 1.9% rate expected for both years in the May NABE survey."

Trade Report Expected To Contain Good News. Under the headline "Trade Picture Brightens," the Wall Street Journal (9/12, Lahart, 2.03M) reports, "Today's trade report will probably show a whopper of a deficit for July, something that always gives investors a fright about holding U.S. dollar assets. But dig a little deeper, and it looks like a shift in the nation's trade is happening." Economists "polled by Dow Jones Newswires are looking for a July trade deficit of $65.5

billion, up from June's $64.8 billion and prospectively the third largest monthly deficit ever." Oil prices "have dropped sharply since July, which could bring the import figure back down. Meanwhile, away from oil, imports were already looking subdued in July. … Even as imports slow, continued growth in Asia should keep US exports strong, says Investment Technology Group economist Robert Barbera. Those exports will help boost economic growth, a plus at a time when other engines of growth seem to be slowing." The Journal adds, "Taken together, it spells a better trade picture in the months ahead, a silver lining for investors who worry about financing the mammoth trade shortfall. The dark cloud is that weary US consumers might be behind much of it."

Data On Unsold Homes Adds To Evidence Of Slowing Housing Market. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Hagerty, 2.03M) reports, "A continued rise in inventories of unsold homes in August is likely to put more downward pressure on home prices in parts of the US." Inventories of homes in 18 large metropolitan areas across the country "expanded by 4.7% in August from a month earlier, according to data compiled by ZipRealty Inc., a real-estate brokerage firm based in Emeryville, Calif. The data are based on single-family homes and condos included in local multiple-listing services of homes for sale."

Stocks Rise Slightly. NBC Nightly News (9/11, story 9, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The stock market also was up today. The Dow was up almost 5 points [to close at 11,396.84]. The Nasdaq gained 7 points [to close at 2,173.25]." The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Anand, 2.03M) notes the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index" rose 0.1%, or 0.62 point, to 1299.54."

Gasoline Prices Fall To Lowest Levels In Five Months. USA Today (9/12, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "Gasoline prices continue to tumble, almost free-falling toward levels not seen in five months. The nationwide average for regular was $2.618 a gallon, the Energy Information Administration reported Monday. That was 10.9 cents lower than a week earlier." USA Today says, "High prices of spring and summer attracted more imported gasoline than usual, contributing to the above-average supplies that now are keeping prices down. ... Falling prices are cheering gasoline retailers as much as motorists." The "EIA plans to issue a short-term energy forecast today that will predict gasoline prices. That will suggest how low prices will go and how long they will stay there."

OPEC Leaves Production Target Unchanged, But Sets Stage To Cut Output. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, A2, Levine, Bahree, 2.03M) reports OPEC "decided to let its production fluctuate rather than adhere to its formal quotas, allowing the cartel to curb output quietly should oil prices continue their recent swoon. As expected, the cartel didn't change its official oil-production target of 28 million barrels a day. More important, though, OPEC has effectively agreed to ignore those quotas for now." The Journal says, "Senior OPEC officials said oil marketers from member countries would base their sales of crude on demand from customers. The cartel will seek to avoid pushing more oil than needed by markets -- implying it would seek to avoid discounting, a necessary step to shore up prices should demand weaken." OPEC's "next gathering is scheduled for December, but the new understanding would allow members to trim output without a formal meeting."

The Washington Post (9/12, D7, Mufson, 748K) reports, "Crude oil prices continued their downward march yesterday as [OPEC] left its production targets unchanged and as Europe's foreign policy chief raised hopes of a peaceful resolution to the standoff over Iran's nuclear program." OPEC "says that it fears high prices will drive consumers to alternative energy sources or non-OPEC oil, and its president, Nigerian oil minister Edmund Maduabebe Daukoru, said yesterday that OPEC was pleased to see prices drop from their peak levels. But the ministers talked mostly of 'downside risks' to prices and asserted that they might move to trim output later in the year if prices continued to slump."

The Financial Times (9/12, Morrison, Hoyos) reports, "members of the cartel signalled they might reduce output later this year to limit any further fall in world oil prices." OPEC "ministers agreed to keep the cartel's official production at 28m barrels a day, even though the 10 members that abide by quotas are producing 500,000 b/d less. With the cartel producing below official limits, analysts said Opec may cut at its next meeting in Nigeria in December."

Blogosphere Increasingly Serves Government Oversight Role. USA Today (9/12, Wolf, 2.27M) reports on a recent trend in government oversight in which more light "is being thrown on Congress, not just by the media and public interest groups, but in the 'blogosphere' where Internet users meet." The blogosphere's involvement "is getting action: House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, has promised a vote this week on a rules change that would ensure the sponsors of individual projects are identified. And Republicans in the House and Senate say they will approve the national database this year." USA notes, "Advances in technology and communication now make it easier for average citizens to be researchers, reporters and muckrakers. The model for many watchdog groups is the Center for Responsive Politics, whose website, opensecrets.org, puts information about lobbying and campaign finance into accessible formats for Internet users."

LA Plans To Honor Prominent Muslim Generate Controversy. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Watanabe) reports that in a "public hearing spiced with accusations of Jew-hating and Muslim-bashing, nearly four dozen religious, ethnic and civil rights activists spoke out Monday on whether a prominent Los Angeles Muslim should be disqualified from receiving a prestigious humanitarian award because he has expressed some views critical of Israel." Maher Hathout, "chairman of the Islamic Center of Southern California, is the first Muslim chosen for the award from the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission. But some Jewish groups have vehemently objected to the selection, calling Hathout an extremist masquerading as a moderate, and are urging the commission to rescind the award before it is presented next month." Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles President John R. Fischel "told commissioners that Hathout's 'false and controversial' statements about Israel — that it is an apartheid state, for instance — had offended and angered many Jews." But Hathout's "supporters Monday were more diverse and outnumbered opponents 2 to 1."

Mehlman Says $47 Million Cash-Edge, GOTV Will Allow GOP To Keep Congress. Roll Call (9/12, Kane) reports, "Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman predicted Monday that the GOP would maintain its control of both Congressional chambers, using a $47 million across-the-board financial edge and a finely honed voter turnout program to overcome historical trends and public resistance to the Iraq War." Mehlman "refuted pundits' suggestions that this year's midterms would be a purely nationalized campaign on issues breaking against Republicans, arguing instead that the elections would be characterized by larger national issues transposed onto a localized, race-by-race battlefield." Mehlman "said it would be 'a dereliction of your duty' for his committee not to run a television air war attacking Democratic candidates for the votes taken by their party leaders, indicating his intention to highlight how a Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and her ranking-members-turned-chairmen would run the House."

Data On Contributions Suggests Republicans In Defensive Mode. USA Today (9/12, Lawrence, Locker, 2.27M) reports, "Top House Republicans are using almost all their campaign contributions to hold on to their 15-seat majority, federal records show, while Democratic House leaders are pouring money into campaigns to capture Republican seats." USA Today "examined contributions by leadership committees run by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, House Majority Leader John Boehner and House campaign chief Tom Reynolds, all Republicans, and their Democratic counterparts: House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer and House campaign chief Rahm Emanuel." The three Republicans "sent 85% of their donations -- $1.9 million -- to at least 70 Republican incumbents and candidates trying to hold GOP seats. The three Democrats gave $963,000, or 64% of their money, to at least 50 Democrats seeking Republican seats." USA Today adds, "The contrasting contribution patterns underscore the extent to which Republicans are on the defensive this year. Democrats, in hot pursuit of a House majority, are finding expanding opportunities across the electoral map."

Anti-Incumbent Sentiment Said To Be Widespread. The AP (9/12) reports that a widespread anti-incumbent sentiment can be heard "up and down the Ohio River Valley as it cuts through Republican-held congressional districts in Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio -- politically pivotal House seats in an election year in which Democrats hope to end 12 years in the minority." Voters in this region and nationally "are quick to voice their frustration with the GOP-controlled Congress, and their desire for more responsive replacements for the current crop of lawmakers. It's a general disgust that may lead to firings of some politicians on Nov. 7. People already have hinted as much in Republican and Democratic primaries."

Republican Aides Prepare For Worst. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/11) reported some Republican House aides "aren't buying the Administration's confidence in keeping control of the chamber and are beginning to shop around for jobs in advance of the fall elections. Trade associations and lobbying shops are the first target, according to K Street executives and association officials." A handful of GOP aides "said that they are preparing for the worst, when a Democratic majority would take over House committees and ax one-third to two-thirds of the Republican staffers and replace them with Democrats. One insider said that communications and scheduling aides would be the first to go, and that the minority would be left with only a handful of top aides on each subcommittee as Democrats moved to use the positions to build up investigative staffs." Another aide "however, said a staff cut would have the benefit of 'trimming some old deadwood' on committees. He added that some committee staffs have begun to draw up lists of staffers likely to get the ax."

Race To Replace Sanders Could Determine House Control. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Mehren, 918K) reports that in Vermont's US Senate contest, Bernie Sanders "boasts a commanding lead over a Republican challenger who has blanketed the state with venomous advertising. Richard Tarrant, a software magnate who has never held elective office, has poured millions of dollars into a campaign that has brought him scant 34% support, according to the state's most recent polls." As an independent, a Sanders victory "would not help Democrats or Republicans in the tight struggle for Senate control. By contrast, the contest for Sanders' congressional seat is important to both major parties. State Sen. Peter Welch is running unopposed in the Democratic primary; Maj. Gen. Martha Rainville, the former adjutant general of the Vermont National Guard, is the leading Republican candidate."

Democratic Poll Shows Welch Leading Rainville By 10 Points. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/11, 2.03M) reported, "A new Democratic poll obtained by The Wall Street Journal casts doubts on Republican claims that they've got a shot at capturing the Vermont House seat being vacated by liberal independent Rep. Bernie Sanders. A Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research poll shows Democrat Peter Welch leads Republican Martha Rainville by 10 points, 52% to 42%. A recently released Republican poll put the race within a closer margin."

Jefferson Faces Tough Primary. USA Today (9/12, Konigsmark, 2.27M) reports, "A bribery scandal has Congressman William Jefferson fighting for his political life following eight House terms in which he faced little opposition at election time. A dozen candidates are challenging Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who FBI agents say was found with $90,000 in bribe money in his freezer. Jefferson denies any impropriety." USA Today adds, "The Nov. 7 election is the first time Jefferson has been threatened with defeat since elected to the House in 1990." Jefferson "faces eight Democrats -- including two state representatives and a former city councilman -- three Republicans and one Libertarian."

Roll Call (9/12, Whittington) says that "as she builds support for her bid to oust" the "embattled" Jefferson, Louisiana state Rep. Karen Carter (D) "is getting help from several influential Louisiana Democrats, including former Sens. J. Bennett Johnston and John Breaux and former Rep. Chris John." Carter "is making effectiveness the central issue of her campaign, asserting that Jefferson's situation is both 'embarrassing and disappointing,' and the investigation is detracting from his Congressional work." Today "she is set to receive the endorsements of New Orleans City Council President Oliver Thomas and City Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge-Morrell."

National GOP Pushing For Chafee Win In Primary Election. The AP (9/12, Tanner) reports, "Moderate GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island faces a serious challenge Tuesday as the last big flurry of primary elections provides another test of the depth of anti-incumbent sentiment and the erosion of the political middle ground." Chafee has been "targeted by the Club for Growth, a Washington-based group that has tried, not always successfully, to force candidates to vote against taxes. The group is backing Steve Laffey, a former investment banker and mayor of Cranston, R.I." Chafee "has drawn a remarkable amount of support from national Republicans, especially for a senator who has often been at odds with the party, bucking the administration on tax cuts, civil liberties and the Iraq war. He has the distinction of being the only Republican to vote against the use of military force in Iraq." Polls "a month before the primary showed the two Republicans running even." Chafee "acknowledged that the race could hinge on turnout in heavily Democratic Rhode Island, saying a low turnout could mean his defeat. His campaign has encouraged Democrats to drop their party registration so they could vote for him."

The Financial Times (9/12, Yeager, Knight, Island) says National Republicans "are doing all they can to ensure that Mr Chafee wins his party's primary election in Rhode Island on Tuesday. If he loses to Stephen Laffey, the conservative mayor of Cranston, they fear the party has no hope of keeping the seat in November's general election, imperilling the Republicans' control of the Senate."

Meanwhile, says The Hill (9/12, Blake) reports the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) "has argued that Laffey cannot beat Whitehouse and the party has mobilized in support of Chafee, even though he has bucked them time and time again." The NRSC also "said last week that it would not support Laffey should he win the primary. Laffey said that the NRSC, the Republican National Committee and the White House have asked him to withdraw."

Analyzing the Rhode Island race, the Christian Science Monitor (9/12, Chaddock, 58K) reports, "Campaign 2006 is proving to be a scorcher for moderates of both parties, especially in the Northeast, where at least eight of the key races for control of the House and Senate will be decided. … Like fellow moderate Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D) of Connecticut, Chafee could lose the primary to a rival who's more aligned with the base." But "unlike the Connecticut primary, the Rhode Island contest is not just about Iraq or the candidate's ties to President Bush. It's about whether a politician can hold middle ground when the pull in both parties is to the extremes. It's also about contrasting candidate styles -- Chafee, low-key and reflective; Mr. Laffey, high intensity and no shades of gray -- in a state so small that one-on-ones with voters can still make a difference."

Tester Compiles Highlight Reel Of Burns Gaffes. Montana state Senate President Jon Tester, who is challenging GOP Sen. Conrad Burns, has compiled a "highlight reel" of Burns' gaffes, which has campaign will begin showing on the YouTube web site today, Roll Call (9/12, Duran) reports. Whether "he was accusing Virginia firefighters of doing a 'piss-poor job' or commenting about the 'nice little Guatemalan man' -- with uncertain immigration status -- who is doing work on his Virginia home, Burns spent most of August apologizing for his off-the-cuff remarks. Probably the most damaging incident came in late July when Burns reportedly stalked up to an elite group of firefighters from Augusta, Va., in the Billings, Mont., airport and accused them of not doing a 'goddamned thing' to put out a raging wildfire in Montana."

McCaskill Says Comments On Bush Were Reported Out Of Context. As it tried link GOP Sen. Jim Talent to President Bush, the campaign of Democrat Clair McCaskill accused Bush of letting poor blacks in Louisiana die during Hurricane Katrina. The Washington Times (9/12, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that McCaskill "has been under sharp criticism" since making the comment. Republicans, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, "immediately called upon Mrs. McCaskill to apologize for the remarks. … But Mrs. McCaskill told KMOX radio in Missouri the statement's context as reported by Pub Def Weekly is 'not exactly correct.' She said she was acknowledging the sentiment of many Americans, and national tragedies are the time when people need government the most."

Maryland Democratic Senate Primary Remains "Two Man Race." CQ (9/11, Spiegel) reported that polls indicate that Maryland's Democratic Senate primary campaign "is ending as it began: as a two-man race between Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and former Rep. Kweisi Mfume, who more recently served as head of the NAACP. The front-runners have remained competitive right up to primary day because each has significant political assets." Mfume "has stayed in the running, largely for two reasons. His dramatic life story of rising from a difficult youth on the streets of inner-city Baltimore and his personal charisma have enabled him to personally outshine the earnest but bland Cardin, and the longtime civil rights activist with the Africanized name — he was born Frizzell Gray — has a stronger connection than Cardin to an African-American constituency that makes up more than a quarter of the state's population and a significant portion of the Democratic primary voting base."

GOP Hopes Michigan's Troubled Economy Will Help Unseat Granholm. The Washington Post (9/12, A3, Slevin, 748K) reports that in Michigan, this year's election is likely to come down to whom voters blame for the state's troubled economy. According to the Post, "With unemployment higher than the national average and many residents frustrated with Democratic Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, Republicans see a chance for a swing-state victory." Republican Mike Bouchard "has kept within striking distance in his first statewide race. But as he works to cultivate an image as a seasoned lawman and a pragmatic politician, he is finding that many voters are unwilling to replace a Democrat in Washington with a largely unknown Republican. … The GOP draws hope from polls showing that two in three voters are dissatisfied with Michigan's direction. The jobless rate rose to 7 percent in July, compared with 4.8 percent nationwide. Given deepening troubles in the auto industry, economists expect the number to remain high even with seasonal hiring."

Daley Vetoes Chicago Living-Wage Bill. Chicago Mayor Richard Daley used his veto power for the first time in his 17-year tenure to reject a living-wage ordinance intended to force big retailers to pay wages of $10 an hour and health benefits equivalent to $3 an hour by 2010. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Hudson, 2.03M) reports, "Mayor Daley had to persuade only two aldermen to reverse course on the ordinance to ensure his veto isn't overridden. The aldermen had voted 35-14 on July 26 to pass the ordinance. The ordinance's sponsor, Alderman Joseph Moore, said an override of the veto remains possible."

The New York Times (9/12, Davey, 1.21M) reports, "The veto, praised by business leaders but condemned by labor groups and the aldermen who had pressed for the ordinance, set up the mayor for a rare political fight: Mr. Daley, who is up for re-election next year, may face an effort to override his veto at City Hall on Wednesday." An override "would require 34 of the 50 aldermen, and at least one Council member who had supported the ordinance told The Chicago Tribune that she now intended to vote against it. Another alderman who supported the measure is expected to be absent."

WSJournal Makes Case Against Living-Wage Bill. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) editorializes, "In his veto message, Mayor Daley, a pro-union Democrat, declared that the wage law would 'drive jobs and businesses from our city, penalizing neighborhoods that need additional economic activity the most.' Wal-Mart and Target have announced plans to cease expansions in the city if the law is enacted. … And of course if Wal-Mart, Home Depot and the others were to abandon the city, Chicago residents would be paying a great many millions more a year in higher prices. Still, the City Council has vowed a veto override vote later this week."

Survey Finds Americans Have Four Distinct Views Of God. USA Today (9/12, Grossman, 2.27M) reports, "A new survey of religion in the USA finds four very different images of God -- from a wrathful deity thundering at sinful humanity to a distant power uninvolved in mankind's affairs." Written and analyzed by sociologists from Baylor University's Institute for Studies of Religion, in Waco, Texas, and conducted by Gallup, the survey of 1,721 Americans "asked 77 questions with nearly 400 answer choices that burrowed deeply into beliefs, practices and religious ties and turned up some surprising findings: Though 91.8% say they believe in God, a higher power or a cosmic force, they had four distinct views of God's personality and engagement in human affairs. These Four Gods — dubbed by researchers Authoritarian, Benevolent, Critical or Distant — tell more about people's social, moral and political views and personal piety than the familiar categories of Protestant/Catholic/Jew or even red state/blue state."

The Washington Post (9/12, A12, Boorstein, 748K) reports that the survey, "considered one of the most detailed ever conducted about religion in the United States, found that one in 10 people who picked 'no religion' out of 40 choices did something interesting when asked later where they worship: They named a place. Considering that, Baylor researchers say, the percentage of people who are truly unaffiliated is more like 10.8 percent. The difference between 10.8 percent and 14 percent is about 10 million Americans."

Book Says "Daily Show" Makes Young People Cynical About Politics. Mary Zeiss Stange, an associate professor of women's studies and religion at Skidmore College, writes in USA Today (9/12, 2.27M), "In 'The Daily Show Effect: Candidate Evaluations, Efficacy, and American Youth,' Jody Baumgartner and Jonathan Morris, of East Carolina University, claim to have discovered that viewing Stewart's nightly satirical riff on the news causes college-age Americans to become cynical about politicians and the news media. … They reached this conclusion by contrasting the responses of students who had viewed 2004 presidential election coverage on The Daily Show to those of students who had viewed similar reportage on CBS' Evening News." Stange adds, "The cynical and potentially more apathetic Daily Show viewers also seemed to be 'more confident about their own ability to understand politics' than those who had 'consumed' the network news." Stange adds, "if the 'serious' national news media are irked at being called to account by a show whose lead-in is 'puppets making crank phone calls,' they have no one to thank but themselves."

Assassination Film Said To Devalue "The Difference Between Real And False." The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Morgenstern, 2.03M) reviews the film "Death Of A President," a fake documentary set one year in the future, which depicts the assassination of President Bush. The Journal reports that the film "is certainly artful in its deployment of tried-and-true documentary techniques to create an alternate reality. … By dramatizing the government's dependence on questionable forensic evidence, by manipulating images and flagrantly falsifying contexts (as in excerpts from a Cheney speech that are made to seem a eulogy for the fallen president), it reminds us of the undependable nature of supposedly objective truth." The film "ultimately, and paradoxically, does what it professes to deplore -- devalues the difference between real and false." It "takes on an unreal life of its own. The film itself becomes a riderless horse."

USA Today (9/12, Jacobson, 2.27M) also reviews the film, noting that it did not "score any huge critical success" at this week's Toronto film festival. The consensus "seemed to be that the political conclusions -- that American politics drives truth out the window -- didn't seem to be worth the artistic effort to pump up the volume. … The auditorium was silent during the film while viewers tried to follow the stream of political and forensic jargon. Audience response at the end was an unsure round of applause."

Edsall Book Depicts Democrats As "Hapless," "Unfocused." The New York Times (9/12, Kakutani, 1.21M) reviews the book "Building Red America," by Thomas B. Edsall. In the book, Edsall notes that Republicans hold "'a set of advantages, some substantial and some marginal,' that have enabled it to 'eke out victory by slim margins in a majority of closely contested elections' and that will probably give it an edge in the foreseeable future." Edsall depicts Democrats "as hapless, unfocused and reeling from self-inflicted wounds. … Unless the Democratic Party makes fundamental changes in its structure, tactical operations and long-range strategic planning, he writes, the odds are that the Republicans 'will continue to maintain, over the long term, a thin but durable margin of victory.'"

Gunmen Attack US Embassy In Damascus; No Casualties Reported. The AP (9/12 Aji) reports, "Gunmen apparently blew up a car outside the American Embassy and exchanged fire with Syrian guards in a bold attack inside Damascus' diplomatic neighborhood Tuesday, a witness said. … A Syrian who works at the US Embassy told The Associated Press by telephone that there were no US casualties." According to a witness, "two gunmen stopped a car on the street in front of the Embassy, got out and shot at the Syrian sentries in front of the building's entrance and then detonated the car. The security personnel shot back, and security forces in the area quickly rushed to the scene, said the witness who was in the area." The AP adds, "In Washington, the State Department said it had no immediate information and was looking into news reports of the attack."

In "Apparent Shift," Rice Open To Delay In Push For Iran Sanctions. The New York Times (9/12, Cooper, 1.21M) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in an ever-so-slight softening of America's stance, on Monday left open the possibility that the United States might suspend efforts to impose sanctions against Iran if it suspended uranium enrichment for two months. 'First of all, it would have to be suspension -- verified suspension,' Ms. Rice said. 'Secondly, it's suspension for suspension. We've said that if they suspend,' the United States would in turn halt its pursuit of United Nations sanctions against Iran and would join European talks with Tehran over its nuclear program." The "apparent shift in the American stance…reflects the hard realities that there are few good options on Iran, even if the Bush administration is able to get Russia and China to sign on to sanctions. Iran defied an Aug. 31 deadline set by the United Nations Security Council to halt production of nuclear fuel."

USA Today (9/12, 2.27M) reports, "Iran has told diplomats it may be willing to shelve its uranium-enrichment program temporarily, perhaps for two months, during negotiations with the United States and other world powers over the future and scope of the Islamic republic's nuclear program." Rice "said Iran has not put a formal offer on the table, but she did not reject the idea of beginning talks framed by an Iranian deadline. 'The question is: Are they prepared to suspend verifiably so that negotiations can begin?'"

The Washington Times/AP (9/12, Gearan) reports Rice "predicted, as other Bush administration figures have, that the Security Council would gradually ratchet up economic or political sanctions. The step-by-step approach is meant to offer Iran a way out as the pressure increases."

The Washington Post (9/12, A20, Kessler, Linzer, 748K) reports, "Rice's comments followed a round of private calls she had in the past day with European counterparts and came after positive meetings between European and Iranian officials. Two days of talks in Vienna between Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, and Javier Solana of the European Union went well, and both sides said they will meet again Thursday, according to diplomats from both sides who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the negotiations." France, Britain and Germany "have committed to push for sanctions against Iran if it does not halt its uranium-enrichment program, but the Europeans are also eager to find a route to negotiations."

Iran Closes Two Opposition Newspapers. The AP (9/12, Dareini) reports, "Iran closed down two opposition newspapers on Monday, one of which had recently poked fun at hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and the way his government has handled nuclear talks with the West." It was "a fresh show of determination by Iran's ruling clerical establishment to silence dissent over its handling of nuclear talks with the West and deny reformers a chance to air their views ahead of elections scheduled for Dec. 15." Iran's "most prominent reformist daily, Shargh, or East," ran a cartoon Thursday "depicting a horse and donkey facing each other on a chess board. The donkey — a symbol of ignorance in Iranian culture -- has his mouth open and light around him, while the horse shows no emotion. The Press Supervisory Board also "ordered the political monthly Nameh, or Letter, to be closed down, IRNA reported Monday. The paper's editor, Majid Tavallaei, said the reason behind the closure was the publication of a poem from dissident female poet Simin Behbahani. The text of the poem was not immediately available." The New York Times (9/12, Fathi, 1.21M) and Los Angeles Times (9/12, Pirouz) also report the story.

Sharansky Says Iran's Use Of Terrorism By "Proxy" Deserves International Action. In a Los Angeles Times column (9/12), Natan Sharansky compares the US' military action against the Taliban regime in Afghanistan after 9/11 and the lack of international action against Iran after Hezbollah's attack on Israel: "It is clear that Hezbollah is a proxy of Iran. It is public knowledge that Hezbollah receives more than $100 million a year from the Iranian regime, as well as sophisticated weapons and training. Yet Iran has paid no price for its proxy's actions" By "failing to hold Iran accountable for its brazen support of Hezbollah, the free world has undermined a central pillar in the war on terror and given the Iranian regime a huge weapon for achieving its ambitions. Now the mullahs know they can attack a democratic country with impunity. "

Kristof Makes Case Against Military Attack On Iran. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (9/12, 1.21M), "It is quite possible that President Bush will bomb Iran's nuclear installations over the next couple of years. Let's hope he looks at how Israel shot itself in the foot in Lebanon this summer and resists the siren calls of neocons who claim that a few air raids would make the Iranian nuclear menace disappear." Kristof adds, "The argument Mr. Bush is hearing in favor of an airstrike is pretty simple: Iran is a terrorist regime that has sponsored attacks on Americans and on Jews (as far away as Argentina). The president of Iran is a hard-liner who has used language that, while subject to debate among Farsi speakers, may mean that his aim is to wipe Israel off the map. A nuclear Iran would also have a devastating ripple effect around the region: Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Turkey might go nuclear as well. And considering how reckless Iran's foreign policy has already been, imagine if it felt emboldened with a nuclear weapon." Moreover, "if Mr. Bush doesn't strike Iran, there's a good chance that Israel will -- and the US would still get blamed (partly because the Israeli planes would fly through American-controlled airspace over Iraq)." However, "Iran's leaders are probably praying for such a strike; it may be the only way that they can stay in power for more than another decade. … We Americans are still paying the price for our involvement in the 1953 overthrow of the elected Iranian government of Mohammed Mossadegh; if we bomb Iran, we may cement the mullahs in power for another 50 years. Moreover, the military options are wretched."

Fatah, Hamas To Form Coalition Government. The AP (9/12, Hadid) reports, "Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas struck a deal Monday to share power with the militant Islamic Hamas, an accord that could restore international aid and could lead to contacts with Israel. The breakthrough compromise falls short of international demands that Hamas fully renounce violence, but Israeli officials still voiced cautious support for the accord."

The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Ellingwood, 918K) says "the pact may help bring a measure of calm to the Gaza Strip and West Bank, easing protests by long-unpaid public workers and strife between the two parties' gunmen." However, "it remained unclear whether a government reshuffle would go far enough to restart the flow of hundreds of millions of dollars in aid from foreign donors, including the United States." The Times adds, "Palestinian officials said Abbas would dissolve the Hamas government in the coming days and that a new governing coalition would be named, most likely under Hamas leadership but including other factions. Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman with Hamas, said the parties still needed to work out the makeup of the government. … Details of the agreement were not released. A key unanswered question was whether the proposed government would satisfy the three conditions laid out by the so-called quartet of Middle East intermediaries -- the US, the EU, Russia and United Nations -- in order to resume the flow of aid." Those conditions are: "recognizing Israel, halting violence and agreeing to honor past Israeli-Palestinians agreements." The Washington Times (9/12, Mitnick, 88K) reports State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos "said the Palestinian government must accept" those "three principles of peace."

The New York Times (9/12, Erlanger, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Officials said the new government would accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements, an implicit recognition of a two-state solution. It would call for the negotiation of an independent Palestine outside of Israel's 1967 borders, including Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem, on the basis of an Arab League initiative." The government is also "expected to recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization, which has signed all agreements with Israel, as the negotiating representative of the Palestinian people, and to acknowledge the right of Mr. Abbas to negotiate for the Palestinians."

The Washington Post (9/12, A18, Wilson, 748K) reports, "Mark Regev, spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, said that 'things are still fluid' concerning the terms of the political program." But "he said that 'it's clear that if the incoming government, assuming there is one, accepts the three benchmarks...as well as the release of Gilad Shalit, it could give new momentum to the peace process and put the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue back on track.'" Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, spokeswoman for the US Consulate in Jerusalem, "which manages diplomacy with the Palestinians, said the political developments would be reviewed before any decision on aid is reached. But, she added, 'if it's still falling short of the quartet's principles, then it's still falling short.'"

Blair Encounters Angry Protests In Visit To Beirut. The Financial Times (9/12, Adams, England) reports, "Several thousand angry chanting protesters gathered in central Beirut on Monday, leaving Tony Blair in little doubt about the hostility many Lebanese felt towards his fleeting visit to their country. … While hostile and vocal, the reaction reflects the country's experience of 34 days of Israeli bombardment that some argue Britain's prime minister bears a degree of responsibility for." The Times adds, "Many Lebanese accuse Mr Blair of supporting Israel in its war with Hizbollah, the Shia militant group, and he was widely criticised for refusing to call for an immediate ceasefire to the conflict. Some also deride him as a crony of George W. Bush, the US president."

The New York Times (9/12, Smith, 1.21M) reports "several ministers refused to meet" with Blair, "including the pro-Syrian speaker of Parliament, Nabih Berri. The front pages of most of the country's newspapers said he was not welcome. But Mr. Blair defended his policies in the 34-day war." Said Blair, "I could have gone out there and called for it all to stop, but it wasn't going to stop until there was a UN resolution that had a framework within which it could stop, in which the real problems could be dealt with." Blair "said Britain would send more than $75 million in aid to Lebanon this year and was ready to provide 'training, equipment, any help we can give' to Lebanese security forces that were filling the void left by Hezbollah and departing Israeli troops in southern Lebanon. He said he would use his remaining months as prime minister to work for peace in the Middle East."

Cameron Criticizes US Policies, Suggests Blair "Slavish" To US Interests. The Financial Times (9/12, Green) reports, "David Cameron, leader of Britain's opposition Conservative party, on launched an outspoken attack on the failures of American foreign policy, calling for a "rebalancing" of the close relationship between the US and the UK." In a speech in London on the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, Cameron said, "We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America." He added, ""I and my party are instinctive friends of America and passionate supporters of the Atlantic alliance," but "I fear that if we continue at present we may combine the maximum of exposure with the minimum of real influence over decisions."

The New York Times (9/12, Cowell, 1.21M) runs a similar report under the headline "Tory Denounces Blair's 'Slavish Tie To US," and says Cameron's remarks "showed just how far the British political spectrum has shifted since the end of the cold war and, particularly, since Mr. Blair's rise to power in 1997." The speech was "intended to draw a line under previous Conservative policy." Cameron himself "supported the Iraq invasion in 2003, but a senior Conservative, who spoke on the condition of anonymity under party rules, said: 'We don't want to have an endless fight about what happened three or four years ago. This is about the next 10 years.'" Cameron "said there had been mixed success by Britain and the United States in curbing terrorism since the Sept. 11 attacks. A terrorist attack on the same scale had been averted, he said, but 'across the globe, terrorists are being recruited in increasing numbers and are active in many more areas than before Sept. 11.' Anti-Americanism had taken hold, he said, 'not just in countries affected by war and instability, but here in the West, here in Britain.'" The Washington Post (9/12, Sullivan, 748K) also reports the story.

Rice Warns Sudan About Consequences Of Flouting Demand For Peacekeepers. The AP (9/12) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she told Sudan on Monday there is no chance of improved relations with the United States if it flouts the world's demand for UN peacekeepers in Darfur." Rice "gave reporters a brief account of her morning meeting in Washington with Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol." Said Rice, "I won't say that we made progress, but I will say that I delivered the strongest possible message in the strongest possible terms to the Sudanese government that any hope for bettering relations between the United States and Sudan rests on Sudan's cooperation with the United Nations Security Council resolution."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/12, A20, 748K) reports UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said yesterday Sudan's government "has violated the Darfur peace agreement with military attacks that are 'legally and morally unacceptable.'" Annan "said in a meeting of the UN Security Council that thousands of Sudanese troops have been sent to western Sudan, in violation of the peace accord, and North Darfur has been bombed. The violence has cut off food aid to 355,000 people in the northern part of the region, he said." Said Annan, "I strongly condemn this escalation." On Capitol Hill, Sen. Richard G. Lugar "introduced legislation that would authorize U.S. assistance to the 7,000 African Union troops in Darfur and call on President Bush to name a special envoy for the crisis."

US Servicewoman Refuses To Answer Questions About Kyrgyz "Kidnapping." Air Force Maj. Jill Metzger who reappeared after vanishing for three days has given confusing accounts of her absence and has refused to make any further statements after consulting with the US Embassy, a Kyrgyz police official said yesterday. The Washington Times/AP (9/12, Saralayeva) reports that Metzger "disappeared Sept. 5 while shopping in the city. She resurfaced Friday night when she knocked on the door of a house in Kant, about 15 miles outside Bishkek, and claimed she had been kidnapped. Maj. Metzger was flown out of Kyrgyzstan within a few hours of her reappearance and was admitted Sunday to a US military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany. There was no immediate word regarding what she was being treated for. Kyrgyz authorities have said her swift departure could impede their investigation, because they wanted to question her further to clarify her account."

Senators, US Embassy Deny Reports Codel Was Fired On In Georgia. The Hill (9/12, Heil) reports that although the Georgian Interior Ministry said a helicopter escorting a delegation of US senators on a codel was fired on, senators on the codel, including Sens. John McCain and Lindsey Graham, "said they heard of the purported missile fire only after they had returned home. It turned out the statement is inaccurate, and that the senators' helicopter was never under fire. The US embassy in Georgia on Sep. 5 released a statement setting the record straight."

US, EU Criticize China's New Media Rules. The Financial Times (9/12, Dickie, Dinmore) reports, "The Bush administration joined the European Commission on Monday in criticising Beijing's imposition of new restrictions on the distribution of foreign news in China, saying it viewed the rules with 'great concern.' A State Department official said Beijing's media policies in general were 'incompatible with China's aspirations to build a modern information-based economy' and were a breach of fundamental rights." The new regulations "require international news services...to censor information distributed inside the country. The rules also ban the agencies from selling directly to local customers, including banks and other financial services companies."

WSJournal Decries China's New Media Rules. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) says that China's new law on foreign news agencies "smacks of expropriation and may violate China's World Trade Organization commitments. The document asserts the Chinese government's right to broadly censor foreign news companies' content over a range of sensitive subjects, including 'sovereignty' (read: Taiwan), 'religion' (Falun Gong), or China's 'interests' (Iran, Burma, Sudan)." The Journal adds, "No self-respecting foreign news agency will allow the Chinese government to read an article before it's published on the mainland. For financial newswires that provide real-time pricing and market information -- such as the one owned by this newspaper's parent company, Dow Jones -- censorship would be literally impossible." Xinhua "is the Communist Party's mouthpiece, a symbol of what China really is. The reformers among Beijing's elites need to explain to their colleagues that returning to old habits of censorship won't protect their future."

Investment Firm CEO Decries US "Constant Criticism" Of China. James McGregor, CEO of JL McGregor & Company, a China-focused research, advisory and investment firm, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) that in a mid-August BBC interview Sha Zukang, China's ambassador to the UN in Geneva, told US politicians "to stifle complaints about Beijing's rapidly growing military budget. He noted that defense spending in China, with a population five times larger than the US, is a small fraction of the American military budget, which accounts for nearly 50% of global arms spending. … As Mr. Sha's comments indicate, after 25 years of economic reforms and more than a decade of nearly 10% annual growth, Beijing is weary of and angry about America's constant criticism." McGregor adds, "We can't afford to let the ignorant and insular in both China and America teach, tease and taunt our two nations into an unnecessary and potentially cataclysmic collision."

US, Venezuela Battling For Dominance In Uruguay. The New York Times (9/12, Rohter, 1.21M) reports that Uruguay is "one of the main fronts in the struggle between the United States and Venezuela for dominance in South America. The Bush administration and President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela are jockeying for position here, each trying to undercut the other by winning over Uruguay's left-wing government." The Times adds, "Uruguay's population and economy are small, with barely three million people and total trade with the United States amounting to slightly more than $1 billion last year. But the country is a member of the Mercosur customs union, which includes Brazil and Argentina, and a free-trade agreement with the United States would weaken the group and put pressure on Uruguay's two big neighbors to negotiate bilateral accords with Washington."

Sneider Says US, South Korea Must Define Basis For Long-Term Friendship. Daniel Sneider, associate director for research at Stanford's Shorenstein Asia-Pacific Research Center, writes in the Washington Post (9/12, A23, 748K), "The U.S. visit this week by South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun offers yet another opportunity to bemoan the crisis of confidence in our alliance. … As policymakers from both countries meet this week, they need to take a deep breath and remember that our alliance survived tremendous stresses in the past. The task before us is not to focus on our divergence but to pick up the challenge left unmet 30 years ago -- to define the basis for a long-term relationship that is durable and reciprocal and that finally sheds the shackles of dependency."

South Korea's Foreign Policy Said To Be Based On Appeasing North. Mary Kissel writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) that "Seoul's foreign policy is based on a deep-seated fear of the North's collapse and the prospect of China's military involvement in the ensuing turmoil. That's pushed the Roh administration to pursue an agenda whose chief goal is maintaining the status quo in the totalitarian North, where 23 million fellow Koreans eke out a rude existence in the world's most brutal regime. This foreign policy is based on an increasingly twisted rationale for appeasement of Kim Jong Il -- and is accompanied by a slow ideological drift away from the US, the nation which has kept the peninsula secure over the past 50-odd years." Kissel adds, "It will take more than a frosty summit this week -- a further U.S. troop drawdown, perhaps? -- to stimulate some real fear among the Korean people about who's protecting their interests and ensuring their security."

WPost Says Prince's Birth Allows Japan To Sidestep Debate On Female Emperor. The Washington Post (9/12, A22, 748K) editorializes that "the birth of a 5-pound, 10-ounce son to Japanese Prince Akishino and his wife, Princess Kiko, has been a cause for particular celebration there for a single reason: the baby's gender. The baby is the first boy to be born in the imperial household in 41 years, thereby allowing the country to sidestep, at least for now, an emotional national debate about whether to permit a female to ascend the Chrysanthemum Throne. … Our best wishes to the family, but it's too bad the arrival of the little prince is letting the country and its archaic system of royal succession off the hook. … Symbols matter, and in a country whose institutions and society remain pervaded with sexism, a female emperor could hardly be a better one."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Cheney, Rumsfeld Urge Americans To Persevere In War Against Terrorists. AFP (9/12, Mannion) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney called on Americans to stay united and persevere in an increasingly divisive war against terrorism five years after the September 11 attacks on the United States." Cheney "joined US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld at a memorial ceremony at the site where a hijacked American Airlines jet struck the Pentagon on September 11, 2001, killing 189 people, including the five Al-Qaeda hijackers." Said Cheney, "We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power." Cheney and Rumsfeld, "key architects of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, alluded only indirectly to the bitter divisions that have opened since the attacks on New York and Washington. Both, however, sounded themes of national unity and determination in their speeches, and broadly defended the administration's performance."

PBS' Newshour with Jim Lehrer (9/11, Ifill) reported, "At the White House this morning, Vice President Cheney and his wife, Lynne, were joined by former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher for a moment of silence. Later at the Pentagon, where 184 people died, a visibly moved vice resident spoke to victims' families." Cheney: "Surely men and women here and aboard flight 77 were in their last moments holding and comforting one another. And when we think of them, it will always be with a special feeling of empathy and sorrow. We will always understand the pain of their families. And our nation will forever look with reverence upon their place, this place where their lives ended. We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power. The war on terror has placed hard duties on our military and on the Department of Defense. You have done all our country has asked of you and more. And you know better than most that much hard work and sacrifice still lay ahead."

Fox News' Special Report (9/11, Goler) reported Cheney "defended the continuing response to the worth-ever attack on US soil." Cheney: "This nation has defeated tyrants and liberated death camps, raised the lamp of liberty to every captive land. We have no intention of ignoring or appeasing history's latest gang of fanatics trying to murder their way to power."

The AP (9/11) reports Cheney "says the fact that there has not been another attack on US soil shows 'we've done a pretty good job' of protecting the country against terrorists." At a memorial observance "near the site where an American Airlines plane slammed into the Pentagon five years ago, Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld walked side-by-side to the speaker's platform as somber music played. Rumsfeld's arm was in a sling; he is recovering from shoulder surgery. A moment of silence was observed at 9:37 a.m. EDT, the exact time the plane struck, killing 184 people." Also in attendance was "retired Air Force Gen. Richard Myers, who was vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff the day of the attack."

NYTimes Criticizes Cheney Statement On Iraq. The New York Times (9/12, 1.21M) editorializes, "It's hard to figure out how to build consensus when the men in charge embrace a series of myths. Vice President Dick Cheney suggested last weekend that the White House is even more delusional than Mr. Bush's rhetoric suggests. The vice president volunteered to NBC's Tim Russert that not only was the Iraq invasion the right thing to do, 'if we had it to do over again, we'd do exactly the same thing.' It is a breathtaking thought." The Times adds, "If we could return to Sept. 12, 2001, knowing all we have seen since, Mr. Cheney and the president would march right out and 'do exactly the same thing' all over again. It will be hard to hear the phrase 'lessons of Sept. 11' again without contemplating that statement."

Dionne Says Cheney "Impatient With Democracy." E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/12, A23, 748K), "Perhaps Vice President Cheney should quit his current job and work within a political system more to his liking, the kind in which those in charge can protect national security by telling everyone what not to say and what not to think." Cheney "seemed terribly impatient with democracy Sunday on 'Meet the Press' when he suggested that those who oppose President Bush's Iraq policies are helping -- excuse me, validating -- the terrorists." Dionne adds, "If Cheney doesn't like 'the kind of debate that we've had in the United States,' is there any other 'kind,' short of a lock-step endorsement of all of Bush's choices, he'd endorse?"

New Jersey Prosecutors Assert Right To Phone Records. The AP (9/12, Defalco) reports, "New Jersey has the right to obtain information about a federal domestic surveillance program because that program is no longer a secret, the state argued in response to federal efforts to quash its investigation." The AP continues, "The Justice Department wants to throw 'an impenetrable cloak insulating the federal government's domestic surveillance activities from all judicial scrutiny,' acting New Jersey Attorney General Anne Milgram said in a statement Monday." The AP adds, "New Jersey prosecutors subpoenaed 10 phone companies in May because of suspicion that state consumer protection laws may have been violated if phone companies were turning over records to the National Security Agency. … The federal government sued the New Jersey attorney general's office in federal court June 14, claiming compliance with the state's subpoenas or even acknowledging the existence of such a program would threaten national security. … The state in its response, filed late Friday, argued: 'There is no secret for the state secret privilege to protect.' … The federal government considers the program vital to fighting terrorism, but critics say it unconstitutionally gathers private information. … Federal officials have objected to efforts by several states and civil liberties groups to investigate or shut down the NSA program. Most recently, it filed a lawsuit against a Connecticut state agency last week and against Maine utility regulators last month."

Hughes Questions Lack Of International Outrage At Terrorism. In a USA Today op-ed (9/12), Karen Hughes, Under Secretary for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs at the State Department, says, "Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks, one essential ingredient is still lacking in our international response to terrorism: The concerted moral outrage of everyday citizens of every faith and country." Since 9/11, "hundreds of others have been torn from their families, murdered as terrorists targeted morning commuters in London, Madrid and India, wedding guests at a hotel in Jordan, children in school in Russia and lining up for candy in Iraq, tourists in Egypt and Bali, Indonesia. This is not right, or normal, or acceptable, and a much louder chorus of voices needs to join in condemning it." Our "challenge is to launch a new grassroots movement across all faiths and continents, a movement that clearly states that no grievance, no complaint, no matter how legitimate, can ever justify the targeting and killing of innocent civilians. A movement that commits to teach our children that life is precious, diversity should be celebrated, and hope can conquer hate."

Hughes was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/11) why the US image in the Arab world has plummeted in recent years despite the fact that "almost every single time the United States deploys troops around the world, it's designed to help a Muslim country or Muslim people, whether liberating Kuwait or in Kosovo or in Bosnia or in Somalia, Iraq, Afghanistan." Hughes said, "There are a couple of things. First of all, there's a lot of propaganda out there, a lot of it very negative about us. We don't hear the full story a lot of times."

In Video, Bin Laden Deputy Warns Of New Attacks. ABC World News (9/11, story 0,:10, Gibson) reported that Al Qaeda used the 9/11 anniversary "to make a series of new threats. Osama bin Laden's deputy Ayman Al-Zawahiri called on revenge on American and declared Persian Gulf countries would be al Qaeda's next targets."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/11, Blitzer) reported Ayman al-Zawahiri "is warning that US troops in Iraq and Afghanistan are quote, 'doomed.' Osama bin Laden's top deputy delivered those words in a sophisticated new video coinciding with this, the fifth anniversary of the September 11th attacks."

The AP (9/11, Keath) says the video of Ayman al-Zawahri "was one of three al-Qaida released for the anniversary, showing increasingly sophisticated techniques as the group tries to demonstrate that it remains a powerful, confident force five years into the US war on terror." One video "showed images of the planes striking the World Trade Center, lionizing the 19 suicide hijackers as men 'who changed history.' Another was a 91-minute documentary-style video in which Osama bin Laden is seen smiling and chatting with the planners of the Sept. 11 attacks in an Afghan mountain camp." Al-Zawahri "spoke in the third and longest video, warning Americans of more attacks to come. 'We have repeatedly warned you and offered a truce with you. Now we have all the legal and rational justification to continue to fight you until your power is destroyed or you give in and surrender,' he said. 'The days are pregnant and giving birth to new events.'" The Washington Times runs a similar AP story (9/12, Ganley).

The New York Times (9/12, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports Zawahri "criticized America's military support for Israel during the country's recent war with Hezbollah, and he called on the Muslim world 'to rush with everything at its disposal to the aid of its Muslim brothers in Lebanon and Gaza,' according to a full transcript of the video provided by the SITE Institute, which tracks violent Islamist groups." Zawahri "said Al Qaeda would strike again in coming weeks, but he gave no indication of the type of targets or specific locations."

The Washington Post (9/12, A17, DeYoung, 748K) reports Zawahri's comments "reflected an ongoing al-Qaeda effort to position itself as the vanguard of the Palestinian fight against Israel and to capitalize on the outrage the conflict generates in the Muslim world." Zawahiri "claimed that US defeat in Iraq is near and that 'jihadi reinforcements' are closing in on Israel."

Former CIA Officers Say Al Qaeda Announcing Intentions To Target Saudi Arabia. CNN's The Situation Room (9/11, Todd) reported, "Former CIA officers say that al Qaeda with this message is also probably saying their intentions to target Saudi Arabia and other regimes in the Gulf region. How would they do that? Well, according to Gary Berntsen and other CIA officers we spoke to, they would likely use their operatives in Iraq and Afghanistan who are now part of the insurgencies in those countries. Many of them are Saudis. They say that they will take those operatives back to Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states once the US pulls out of Iraq and Afghanistan and they will use those operatives to target shipping, oil reserves, possibly even engage in assassination attempts of key leaders."

Bin Laden Said To Be In Pakistan. NBC Nightly News (9/11, story 3, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the "frustrating manhunt" for Osama bin Laden, focusing on the CIA's efforts to find him by tracking the delivery of the audio and video tapes that are his only known contact with the outside world. This strategy enabled the CIA in 2004 to capture "a mid-level al Qaeda figure, but no bin Laden" in a Pakistani village. NBC calls bin Laden "the number one target of the war on terror," adding "Recently the search has centered on Pakistan's Chitral Valley, home to Madrasahs that foment radicalism." The piece concludes by quoting National Counter Terrorism Center director Vice Admiral John Scott Redd (retired) as saying that despite bin Laden's continued evasion of US forces, "Our intelligence has gotten better, our operations have gotten better. So al Qaeda is -- we've basically set them back on their heels."

Hunter Military Tribunal Bill Similar To Bush Proposal. The AP (9/12, Flaherty) reports House Armed Forces Chairman Duncan Hunter "has drafted a bill largely mimicking an administration plan to create military commissions to prosecute terror suspects." Hunter will "propose on Wednesday that his panel approve a bill that would allow the exclusion of evidence to protect classified information. A floor vote is expected next week." The bill "puts Hunter, R-Calif., in line with the White House and Senate leadership, but at odds with his counterpart, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va. Warner and some of his colleagues have drafted a rival bill that would ensure defendants are allowed access to all evidence against them."

CQ (9/11, Donnelly) reports House Republicans "fell in line Monday behind President Bush's proposal for military tribunals to try terror suspects, further isolating a trio of Senate Armed Services Committee leaders who support legislation that would provide such suspects with greater legal protections." Rep. Duncan's bill "would permit the introduction of classified information unavailable to defendants, hearsay evidence and testimony given after coercive interrogation. Like the president's proposal, the House bill also would permit suspects to be excluded from their own trials and amend a law that guarantees suspects the protection of the Geneva Conventions."

Key Senate Republicans Make Concessions To Administration. The Washington Post (9/12, A17, Smith, 748K) reports the Bush Administration "has won concessions from key Senate Republicans in proposed legislation on standards for detainee treatment and the rules for military trials of terrorism suspects, although some disagreements persist between the lawmakers and the White House, Senate sources said yesterday." The disagreements "that remain involve whether suspects can be convicted with evidence they are never allowed to see, an approach favored by the administration but opposed by the Republican senators." The "two sides also still differ over the terms of a related amendment to the U.S. War Crimes Act that would limit the exposure of CIA officials and other civilian personnel to prosecution for abusive treatment of detainees, the sources said." But in a "sign that Congress is nonetheless preparing to act quickly to establish 'military commissions,' as the trials are known, and provide other legal relief sought by the administration, the Senate trio at odds with the White House circulated a revised bill yesterday containing their concessions." Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) last week "had circulated a draft that diverged more sharply from the White House's version."

Graham Says Senate Won't Approve Restricting Terrorists' Access To Evidence. McClatchy (9/12, Rosen) reports Sen. Lindsey Graham "says he's confident the Senate will reject President Bush's plan to try accused terrorists without letting them see classified evidence against them." The clause "would prohibit defense lawyers from sharing classified information with defendants they represent. He marked it with a red pen." Graham said, "That's the killer. I fell over when I read it." McClatchy adds Graham "said he supports 90 percent of the bill, which Bush sent to Congress on Wednesday. But 'I don't feel good about telling someone — no matter who they are — 'We're going to execute you next week, but I'm sorry, we can't tell you why.'"

US Courts Can't Stop Military From Transferring US Citizen To Iraqi Court. The New York Times/AP (9/12) reports government lawyers "said Monday that American courts had no authority to stop the military from transferring an American citizen to an Iraqi court to face charges that he supported terrorists and insurgents." Shawqi Omar, "a citizen of both Jordan and the United States who once served in the Minnesota National Guard, was captured in Iraq in 2004. He is being held at Camp Bucca, a prison in southern Iraq, where his family says he has not been charged or allowed to speak with a lawyer." His family "is demanding that Mr. Omar be brought before an American court, where prosecutors would have to show probable cause for detaining him and he could consult with a lawyer."

PATRIOT ACT:

Connecticut Librarians Speak Out About Patriot Act Gag Orders. The New Britain (CT) Herald (9/12, Capozzi) reports, "Public libraries in mid-sized Central Connecticut towns are not likely places for an FBI investigation involving a perceived threat to national security, but unbeknownst to their patrons and the majority of their staff, they were in the midst of one last summer." The Herald continues, "In late June 2005, Library Connection Inc., a non-profit consortium of 26 central Connecticut libraries, received a National Security letter from the FBI, involving a top-secret investigation of patron Internet usage. … Subsequently, four executive members of the consortium were placed under life-long gag orders, made possible through the Patriot Act, which does not require court evidence or oversight. Although the names of the John Does were to be kept secret by the government, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union found the government had failed to redact one mention of Director of Plainville Public Library Peter Chase's name and other identifying information from the legal documents. From the identifying information that was not omitted, it didn't take long until the national press had identified Chase and the other John Does." The Herald adds, "Soon, Chase was being bombarded with calls from newspapers all over the country and even in Japan and France. But even after all the media attention, the government would not allow the gag order to be lifted. … Through the ACLU, the four consortium members, Chase, George Christian, Library Connection Executive Director, Barbara Bailey, librarian at Glastonbury's Welles Turner Library and Janet Nocek, librarian at Portland Public Library, fought the gag order against Connecticut United States Attorney Kevin O'Connor under the alias John Doe. … Bridgeport Superior Court ruled the law was unconstitutional and the government appealed that decision, later withdrawing the appeal in May 2006, thus releasing the four librarians from the gag order."

DOJ_NMG_0061989

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Appeals For Unity, Calls War On Terror A "Struggle For Civilization." President Bush addressed the national from the Oval Office last night. The AP (9/12, Hunt) reports Bush said "the war against terrorism is 'the calling of our generation' and urged Americans to put aside differences and fight to victory." Bush also "staunchly defended the war in Iraq though he acknowledged that Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people." The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Fiore, Gerstenzang, 918K) says Bush sought "to justify the increasingly unpopular US military action in Iraq, which he called a battleground in the war against terrorism." The president also "said somberly that the United States was engaged in a 'struggle for civilization.'"

Summarizing the speech, CBS News (9/12, 1:40, Couric) reported the President "marveled at the heroism of 9/11 when he said ordinary citizens responded with extraordinary acts of courage. He also praised the American soldiers serving overseas, and again, explicitly linked the war in Iraq to a broader war on terror. He tried to rally the nation against a enemy he says is trying to create a radical Islamic empire, and he said this is the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century."

While the White House insisted the President's remarks on the war on terror were not meant to be political, most media commentators analyzed them from the perspective of the partisan clash over the upcoming midterm election. On CBS News (9/12, 1:15), Jim Axelrod said, "We were told it would be a non-political speech, where there would be no distinctions drawn between Democrats and Republicans, and then he delivered…a speech with stark differences in terms of the arguments made about handling the war on terror. I think what we're seeing here is probably the bridge to September 12th, which, of course, marks eight weeks until the mid-term elections, and clearly this speech moves from this sort of non-political unity display to the final two-month sprint for the mid-term elections." Also on CBS News (9/12, 1:40), Bob Schieffer said after the speech, "We had almost 3,000 people who died since 9/11…but that sacrifice has been made by a very small segment of our society because we no longer have a draft army. … I think it is very difficult to make the case that you're in a life-or-death situation without asking most of the people to sacrifice. I think that's the challenge that the President has tonight, but this is where he wants to frame the next election. He wants it to be about who can best fight the war on terror. And that was the case. He laid out his case tonight."

On NBC News (9/11), Tim Russert said, "I think the President noting Iraq and saying [that] although Saddam was not responsible for September 11th he was a 'clear threat and that Iraq will be an ally in the war on terror' is going to prompt many Democrats to say the President was the politician in chief tonight as well. There are only 56 days before the mid term elections."

On ABC' Prime Time Live (9/11), George Stephanopoulos said, "The chairman of the Republican National Committee says the key question in this election is: Do you believe we are at war? The President made that point tonight. America is at war. It is a war we will win. The President believes if the country is convinced of that, his party will limit its losses in November. He used the most powerful tool he has tonight to make the case, that Oval Office address." ABC (Gibson) added, "Indeed, that is the central issue in the election that is are coming up in two months."

Nina Easton said on Fox News (9/11), "There was soaring rhetoric, but…it was a political speech. There wasn't a direct attack on his political foes but there was a dwelling on Iraq. It's interesting he has not spoken about Iraq on a 9/11 anniversary except in election years, 2004 and now. Last year, by the way, he just did a moment of silence on 9/11.

But this time he dwelled on that war. … So I thought his dwelling on Iraq was quite notable a couple months before an election."

Joe Scarborough said on MSNBC (9/11), "It is a campaign effort, obviously. And the President's problem is there remains linkage between his war on terror and the war in Iraq. Something the Administration wanted a few years back. But the lines that stick out here is when he says America didn't ask for this war and Saddam Hussein posed a great threat. Moral ambiguity and war didn't mix with others and it doesn't mix with this President now. Unless he can make that sell, that this was not a war of choice, then the President's words tonight will fall a deaf ears with Americans."

The New York Times (9/12, Rutenberg, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports, "Even by the standards of his latest round of speeches, Mr. Bush's language was particularly forceful, even ominous, with warnings of a radical Islamic network that was 'determined to bring death and suffering to our homes.'" The Times also says "Bush's address brought to a close a day when leaders of both parties put aside, at least for the moment, the acrimony that has characterized the national security debate since the brief period of national unity after the attacks. But as soon as the speech was over, the partisanship flared again."

Democrats, in fact, charged that White House had injected politics into the 9/11 anniversary. USA Today (9/12, A7, Jackson, 2.27M) reports White House spokesman Tony Snow "told reporters earlier in the day that the speech would not be political," but political analysts "suggested that is an impossible task less than two months before Election Day." Sen. Charles Schumer, who heads the Democrats' Senate campaign committee, "called the speech 'disappointing.' He said, 'You do not commemorate the tragedy of 9/11 by politicizing it.'"

The Washington Post (9/12, A1, Abramowitz, Fletcher, 748K) says Bush "melded one of the most unifying events in recent national experience -- the common horror and sadness of the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon -- with one of the most polarizing, the war in Iraq." Democrats "said Bush politicized the Sept. 11 anniversary. 'The president should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning to commandeer the airwaves to give a speech that was designed not to unite the country and commemorate the fallen, but to seek support for a war in Iraq that he has admitted had 'nothing' to do with 9/11,' said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.)."

The Washington Times (9/12, Curl, 88K) also reports, "With midterm congressional elections less than two months away and Democrats charging that Mr. Bush is politicizing the fifth anniversary of September 11, the president urged unity and condemned partisan politics."

The New York Times (9/12, Sanger, 1.21M) says that "a speech that began as a commemoration of one of the most searing and painful moments in American history became something else. For much of his 17-minute address from the Oval Office, Mr. Bush in effect acknowledged that his political standing and the success of his avowed mission to make the world safe from Islamic terrorism now rests on victory in Iraq, a mission his critics say was a deadly detour from the task he set out five years ago." Bush's "aides acknowledged beforehand that it would not be easy. The country Mr. Bush faced on Monday was very different from the shocked, angry but unified nation he addressed from the same chair 1,826 days before. Iraq and its aftermath had changed everything, dividing Americans who five years ago had largely unified around Mr. Bush's strategy, cutting his approval ratings in half and leaving in its wake questions about whether the president had made an ugly confrontation with Islamic extremists worse."

The Washington Post (9/12, A17, Balz, Abramowitz, 748K) says "falsely optimistic predictions of progress have undermined the administration's credibility. A majority of Americans question fundamental elements of the president's argument, including his contention that Iraq is the central front in the campaign against terrorism. Cumulatively, it leaves decidedly uncertain whether this week's flood of rhetoric and remembrance can alter Bush's perilous circumstances -- at a critical moment for the future of the Iraq mission and the president's own domestic standing 56 days before the midterm elections."

There was little consensus on the speech among commentators last night – not even on whether the President's rhetoric was poetic or nor. Tom Brokaw said on MSNBC (9/11), "I was surprised that there was no poetry in it. And that he didn't take us to a different place in terms of when he wants to go next. This is the kind of speech he could have given three years ago. The American public has been through a lot in five years, and with all due respect to the President, they'll be measuring his rhetoric versus the reality they see almost every day in what they see in the newspapers and on television." Meanwhile, Morton Kondracke said on Fox News (9/11), however, said, "There was a lot of soaring rhetoric in this speech. It was not quite Churchilian, but on the cusp."

Charles Krauthammer said on Fox News (9/11), "It was a sober address. It wasn't soaring or poetic. Sobering that befits a country in a difficult war. I was struck by how political it was." Krauthammer added that Bush "planted a flag on policy and said, 'Here I stand.'"

Fred Barnes said on Fox News (9/11), "This is the fifth speech in a series of speeches that the President has given on the war on terror over the last, well, since late August. This is sort of the capstone, the summing up and the President did a good job on it. I think most Americans probably didn't hear the first four and we all saw them and read them and so on. He said, 'Look, this war on terror, including Iraq is going to shape the future of the 21st century that we are on offense against terrorists and we need to stay on offense and the result can be this new Middle East which will not be the seed bed of terrorism the way it's been over the last 20, 30 years.' And by doing, that I thought he did what he needed to do."

On CBS News (9/12, 1:15), anchor Katie Couric interviewed presidential historian Douglas Brinkley, who said, "It was the Bush doctrine in another disguise. If we smell a threat out there somewhere in the world, we have to go after them. He made it very clear he was sticking to his guns, I was right to bring down Saddam Hussein, and the very fact he is invoking this on the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks shows you he does see a connection between Iraq and 9/11 and that is one of the things that is debated. And he said you're wrong about this, we had to get rid of the guy, and he was a threat. He may not have been responsible for 9/11, but he would have been responsible for future 9/11s."

John Tierney also addresses Bush's rhetoric in his New York Times column (9/12). He writes, "Somewhere, Osama bin Laden must be smiling. Or at least he will be whenever his couriers deliver the next batch of press clippings. Once again he has beaten America at an American game: public relations. … Last night, President Bush paid him homage by quoting his warning that America will face 'defeat and disgrace forever' it if loses in Iraq. Bush himself called the war on terror a 'struggle for civilization,' and said it was essential to 'maintain the way of life enjoyed by free nations.'" Tierney adds, "It was just the kind of apocalyptic language favored by bin Laden, except that, for all his delusions, he might realize that American civilization is not really in jeopardy. Americans can try to copy him, but they don't understand his rhetorical technique."

Similarly, in his Washington Post column (9/12, A23), Richard Cohen says Osama bin Laden "laughs, the madman does, whenever George Bush says, as he has over and over, that America is 'winning this war on terror.' Bin Laden knows better. He has already won." From "bin Laden's standpoint, this has been a glorious victory, made possible, it has to be said, by the totally unforeseen incompetence of the Bush administration. It was so intent on going to war in Iraq that it would not finish the job in Afghanistan. So, to bin Laden's absolute amazement -- I am guessing here -- the United States took on his enemy, the secular and ungodly Saddam Hussein, whom bin Laden himself would gladly have murdered. It has to be a wonderful thing when your enemy vanquishes your enemy."

In Bellwether District, Voters Seen As Skeptical Of Bush's Terrorism Speeches. The New York Times (9/12, Hulse, 1.21M) reports on Colorado's 7th Congressional district, a suburban Denver district that is considered a bellwether in the battle for control of the House. The Times reports that "interviews over the last three days here found Republicans, Democrats and independents all expressing degrees of skepticism about Mr. Bush's motives in delivering a set of high-profile speeches on terrorism and the war in Iraq two months before Election Day. While it is too early to know whether the White House will succeed in winning over enough voters to make a difference in what is shaping up as a tight race, the interviews suggested that Mr. Bush's newest efforts to cast his party as better suited than Democrats to defend the country had yet to overcome concern and anger among many voters about Iraq and a more generalized sense of discontent with the administration." Even "strong Bush supporters said they doubted the presidential drumbeat on terrorism would alter the political landscape here."

Bush Feels He Bested TV Anchors In Interviews. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/11) reported President Bush is "described as very pleased with his performances in a spate of high-profile TV interviews that he granted in the past couple of weeks. Specifically, Bush believes he got the best of his encounters with anchors Brian Williams, Katie Couric, Charles Gibson, and Matt Lauer." White House insiders "say the President wasn't eager to do the interviews in the first place because he believed the anchors would try to embarrass him in order to burnish their credentials as tough interrogators and get higher ratings. Now that the interviews are over, the President believes he made his points smoothly and effectively, especially about the importance of winning the war in Iraq and the overall war on terrorism, and perhaps persuaded more Americans to support his policies in those areas. 'He's been very comfortable' with the interviews and will do more between now and the congressional elections November 7, says a senior White House official."

42% Of Americans Feel Safer Than Before 9/11. NBC Nightly News (9/11, lead story, 2:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight, in a just released NBC News poll, 42% of Americans tell us they feel safer now than they did prior to September 11. 32% say it's about the same. 23% say they are less safe today."

45% Blame Bush Administration For 9/11 Attacks. William Schneider said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/11), "In June 2002, 32 percent of Americans blamed the Bush administration either a great deal or a moderate amount for the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. And, now, that number has gone up to 45 percent. More people are willing to criticize a president who is no longer as popular. But, also, congressional investigations uncovered damaging information, like the title of a daily intelligence briefing the President received a month before the attacks." Schneider added, "Forty-one percent of Americans say the Clinton Administration deserves a great deal or a moderate amount of blame for the 9/11 attacks. The older you are, the less likely you are to blame the Bush Administration, and the more likely you are to blame the Clinton administration. Americans under 30 are the 9/11 generation. Fifty-five of them blame the Bush administration for 9/11. Only 30 percent blame the Clinton administration. The 9/11 generation is likely to have less vivid memories of the 1990s, when many of them were children. Some of their criticism of President Bush may be driven by opposition to the war in Iraq. Americans under 30 are the least supportive of that war. Their generation is doing most of the fighting."

Giuliani "Shocked" US Has Not Been Attacked Again. Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/11) that it "shocks me that we haven't been attacked again, which I expected. If you would ask me this question the night of September 11, five years ago, I would have said to you and everybody else in America, particularly American law enforcement, 'We're going to get attacked. We better get ready for a number of attacks, you know, suicide bombings and other kinds of attacks.' So, I thank God that that's not the case and I expect we are going to get attacked again but I'm thankful that we got these five years."

Negroponte Touts Improved Cooperation Of US Intelligence Agencies. National Intelligence Director John Negroponte was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/11) if there is a "sense of esprit" about trying to get ahead of terrorists by a few hours and prevent an attack. Negroponte said, "I think it's enormous. I think you've seen evidence of that in the disruption of various plots that have taken place. You also see much better cooperation between the key agencies, the FBI, the CIA, the National Security Agency. They work as teams now. There is teamwork all the way down to the local level, both in our country and abroad, between these agencies. It's an integrated effort because it's not any one single intelligence methodology that is going to unravel, unearth these plots. It's usually a combination of human intelligence, on the one hand, and then technical intelligence of various kinds on the other. You've got to marry the two together and that's extremely important. And I believe that with the reforms that have taken place and with the lesson learned from 9/11, these agencies are much, much better. They're far, far ahead of where they were five years ago."

US Observes Fifth Anniversary Of 9/11 Attacks. The nation yesterday observed the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, with President and First Lady Laura Bush visiting the three sites of the terrorist attacks -- Ground Zero at the World Trade Center, Shanksville, Pennsylvania, and the Pentagon -- for commemorative events. The anniversary was the focus of the major media outlets, which reported on both the official ceremonies and private remembrances. Network newscasts all led with the story, which was also covered on the front pages of the major dailies, such as USA Today, the Washington Post, and New York Times, in multiple articles.

The network coverage was somber, and included many personal observations from the family members of 9/11 victims. ABC World News (9/11, lead story, 2:30, Harris) reported, "Under a brilliant blue sky with a striking resemblance to the one that morning five years ago, the family members of the can people that died at Ground Zero came back. At 8:46 the moment the first plane hit the north tower a moment of silence. President Bush and First Lady Laura Bush were at a fire station nearby." ABC World News (9/11, story 7, 3:10, Gibson) also ran a story on the children of 9/11.

CBS Evening News (9/8, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Today President Bush sought to be both commander and comforter in chief as we all remember that day." CBS (Axelrod) added, "President Bush visited all three places, consoling families, laying wreaths, and sharing a moment of silence. The President made no public remarks today. Aides called it a wordless day, understanding perhaps that the power of 9/11 is in the images, kids holding pictures of dads and moms they lost, flowers piled high in the pools of remembrance." CBS Evening News (9/8, story 5, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported on the mentor of a boy who lost his father, a Port Authority policeman, on 9/11.

NBC Nightly News (9/11, lead story, 2:25, Taibbi, 9.87M) reported, "As Vice president Dick Cheney put it at the Pentagon, Americans took what happened on 9/11 personally and still do." Vice President Cheney: "And our nation will forever look with reverence upon the place where their lives ended." Tiabbi: "President Bush visited each of the attack sites and soon all you could see was flowers. All you could hear were the voices of those who still grieve." NBC Nightly News (9/11, story 2, 1:00, Fratangelo, 9.87M) also interviewed mourners at Ground Zero.

USA Today (9/12, Hampson, Jones, 2.27M) reports Americans "solemnly remembered and mourned Monday the lives lost five years ago in the worst terror attacks on the nation, a tragedy that President Bush said brought 'extraordinary acts of courage' and heroism from ordinary citizens." USA Today (9/12, Hampson, 2.27M) also says the anniversary "prompted Americans to measure the day's meaning through the words and tears of the victims' survivors." The "expressions of grief, longing and hope came amid public sentiment that the war on terror is far from over."

The Washington Post (9/12, A1, Powell, White, Vargas, 748K) reports in a front page story that "there was an aching familiarity to the rituals. In New York, family members recited 2,749 names, punctuated by violins and the wail of bagpipes, to the drawn and tearful faces of the families of the victims." Bush "and Vice President Cheney paid homage to the dead. And as during the past few weeks, they did not hesitate to try to draw a connection between the Sept. 11 attacks and the war in Iraq."

The Washington Post (9/12, A1, Ruane, 748K) reports, "Five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, residents and visitors across the Washington region paused yesterday, away from the grand commemorations, to remember the milestone and take stock of all that has and has not changed in the half-decade since 2001." The Washington Post (9/12, B2, Smith, 748K) also profiled Colin Wolfe, a 14-year-old on 9/11 who volunteered for the Marines and was killed in Iraq on August 30. Yesterday, "family and friends gathered at Arlington National Cemetery to honor the slain Marine. His parents picked Sept. 11 for the burial, believing it to be a fitting tribute to a young man who gave his life for his country in Iraq."

The AP (9/12, Westfeldt, McClam) reports, "Clutching photos to their hearts and blowing kisses to the sky, tearful loved ones of Sept. 11 victims recited a 3 1/2-hour litany of the lost Monday, the names echoing across an expanse still largely barren five years after terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center." The "ritual has changed little since the first anniversary of the attacks, and in many ways the site has remained the same as well."

McClatchy (9/12, Boyd, Hutcheson) reports, "Across the land, Monday brought back memories of that awful morning five years ago: the crisp blue sky above Manhattan, the silver planes streaking into tall buildings, the flames, smoke, dust, horrified faces, people running, firefighters and police officers struggling, the fear, grief and death." The New York Times (9/12, McFadden, 1.21M) reports a "wounded but resilient America paused yesterday to remember the calamitous day when terrorist explosions rumbled like summer thunder and people fell from the sky." But if "there was a theme to this year's proceedings, it was honoring the dead while moving on with life."

The AP (9/12, Nephin) reports that in Shanksville, Pennsylvania, "hundreds of people…gathered Monday in a wind-swept field to remember Flight 93, the hijacked jetliner in which passengers tried to storm the cockpit on Sept. 11, 2001, to wrest control from terrorists shortly before the plane crashed in southwestern Pennsylvania." President Bush "laid a wreath at the crash site and privately greeted family members in a cold drizzle as they marked the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks."

The New York Times (9/12, Stanley, 1.21M) reports it is "painful, but not difficult, to memorialize Sept. 11 on television. There are so many images from that morning, so many ways to recreate its horror and mourn those who died."

New York Members, Administration At Odds Over Categorization Of 9/11 Victim As Non-Firefighter. The Hill (9/12, Bolton) reports New York Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) and Charles Schumer (D), and Rep. Pete King (R-N.Y.) "gathered with President Bush at St. Paul's Chapel in New York Sunday to commemorate the five-year anniversary of the 9-11 attacks, but behind the scenes they are struggling with his administration over the controversial death of one rescuer." Glenn Winuk, "whose first love in life was being a firefighter but who became a lawyer at Holland & Knight to earn a better living — did what would be natural to any first responder near the scene of a disaster: he rushed to it." Winuk died in the collapse of the South Tower, but "the Justice Department last week made public a ruling that Winuk was not eligible to be recognized as a firefighter having died in the line of duty despite his years of volunteer service." The Justice Department's decision "has denied Winuk's parents $250,000 in federal benefits," but Jay Winuk "said his family's fight is about much more than money."

FDNY Still Recovering. CBS Evening News (9/8, story 2, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "No families suffered a greater loss on 9/11 than the family that is the New York City fire department. Fire fighters rushed into the burning towers as everyone else rushed out and 343 of them died that day. Five years later, those who were in charge of the recovery effort here at Ground Zero are still recovering themselves."

Makeshift Memorial Holds Unidentified Remains Of 9/11 Victims. ABC World News (9/11, story 6, 2:15, Gibson) reported, "There is here in New York, in Lower Manhattan, a tent set up that most people walking by not even notice. Indoor tennis courts, perhaps, urban campers, you might think. It's anything but. Its one of the saddest reminders of September 11th." ABC (Weir) added, "Beneath a noisy Manhattan highway, under this gleaming white tent, sit three containers, very big and very sacred. They hold almost 14,000 human remains, carefully preserved, but too small or damaged to name. There are pews nearby, a simple altar, precious space for the 1,151 families who were never given anything to bury."

Wreckage From WTC Stored At JFK. NBC Nightly News (9/11, story 5, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We have a special look tonight at all the wreckage that was taken from Ground Zero. All of it sacred. And it's all awaiting a home, a permanent memorial. It's all being cared for in a hangar at New York's JFK Airport. They don't want us to show you the outside of the building but we can say this if you've flown in and out of Kennedy airport, you've taxied right by it. Tonight for the first time on network television, you will get to see what remains of that day. It's as if that day five years ago is now contained in this room. The violence is over and the heat has cooled, but it's all here. You can feel it, you can smell it. It's enough to make anyone angry and sad and spiritual all over again. It's an airline hangar as church."

9/11 Novel Praised For Exposing Distortions. In a USA Today book review (9/12), Deirdre Donahue says it "would be a shame if Jess Walter's novel The Zero were lost amid all these other 9/11 projects. The author of the unforgettable non-fiction book Ruby Ridge and the admired novel Citizen Vince, Walter uses 9/11 and the past five years as a launch pad to explore how bureaucrats and profit-hungry corporations have distorted a tragedy."

More Commentary. In the Wall Street Journal's "Global View" column (9/12), Bret Stephens says, "Here's a puzzle: Why is it so frequently the case that the people who have the most at stake in the battle against Islamic extremism and the most to lose when Islamism gains -- namely, liberals -- are typically the most reluctant to fight it?" Yet "after 9/11 at least a few old-time voices on the left -- Christopher Hitchens, Bruce Bawer, Paul Berman and Ron Rosenbaum, among others -- understood that what Islamism most threatened wasn't just America generally, but precisely the values that modern liberalism had done so much to promote and protect for the past 40 years: civil rights, gay rights, feminism, privacy rights, reproductive choice, sexual freedom, the right to worship as one chooses, the right not to worship at all." But "five years on, however, Messrs. Hitchens, Bawer et al. seem less like trendsetters and more like oddball dissenters from a left-liberal orthodoxy that finds less and less to like about the very idea of a war on Islamic extremism, never mind the war in Iraq."

In his Washington Post column (9/12, A23), Eugene Robinson says that by "far the most fateful post-Sept. 11 coinage is 'war on terrorism.' The phrase that has come to define our era is entirely suspect, except perhaps the 'on.'" Witness the "recent arrests of would-be airline bombers in London, or the fact that so many of the high-value terror suspects held until recently in secret CIA prisons were captured in Pakistan, an ostensible ally. We should call this police work what it is, although that might make it harder to ignore such principles as habeas corpus and due process."

New York City Attorneys Adjusting To Life After 9/11. The National Law Journal (9/12, Jones) reports, "In the five years since the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, attorney H. Taufiq Choudhury said that he has grown numb to the reminders he sees every day on his way to work in lower Manhattan. … 'I've gotten used to it,' he said. 'The feeling is not as sharp.'" The Journal continues, "An immigration lawyer, Choudhury initially relocated his solo practice from the 22nd floor of 1 World Trade Center to midtown Manhattan after the attacks. But today, his firm, which also endured the 1993 trade center bombing, is back in the downtown area. … There is a certain comfort for Choudhury in returning to lower Manhattan, he said, but his practice still suffers as a result of the events on Sept. 11, 2001. … 'It has changed for the worst,' he said." The Journal adds, 'Choudhury is just one of an estimated 14,000 New York lawyers -- more than 10 percent of all lawyers in the state -- whose practices were upended when the planes brought down the Twin Towers. The businesses of virtually every lawyer working below 14th Street in Manhattan were affected by the attacks. In the towers themselves, attorneys and support staffers at about 30 law firms lost their offices and, in some cases, their lives. … Five years later, some law firms have come back to the downtown area, but many others have opted to start over in areas less scarred."

FBI Agents Tout Post-9/11 Counter-Terrorism Initiatives. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/12, Louwagie, 398K) reports, "As he reflected on five years of fighting terrorism since the Sept. 11 attacks, Minneapolis FBI special agent in charge Michael Tabman said Monday that a second local squad was created last year to focus on international terrorism groups." Tabman "said he wanted a second squad to increase intelligence-gathering and reach out to communities, building trust and cooperation so people feel free to come forward with information. The squad is one of several local changes that reflect new priorities in the FBI. 'We have gone from an investigative agency to a preventive agency,' Tabman said." He "credits the USA Patriot Act with giving the FBI and other agencies better tools to do their work," although "there's still a lot of oversight when decisions are made on intelligence gathering -- something the public still wants, he said." Tabman added, "We're not going to wipe out terrorism, just like we can't wipe out drugs or stop crime completely. Every day that we don't have a terrorist act, every day that citizens go home and feel confident we'll have a safe day the next day, we've won.'"

The AP (9/12) reports Tabman "says it's no accident that there's been no further terrorist attacks in the five years since 9-11." He "says that reflects the bureau's decision after the attacks to make preventing terrorism its top priority." At a media briefing yesterday, "Tabman rattled off statistics he says shows the bureau's emphasis. That includes almost 1500 new agents bureau-wide, 65 new anti-terror task forces nationwide between the FBI and local law enforcement agencies, and a shift from investigating crimes to preventing them."

International Reaction Mixed On Fifth Anniversary Of 9/11. The AP (9/12, Ganley) reports, "the nations of the world joined Monday in solemn remembrance of Sept. 11 — but for many, resentment of the United States flowed as readily as tears." Critics say Americans "have squandered the goodwill that prompted France's Le Monde newspaper to proclaim 'We are all Americans' that somber day after the attacks, and that the Iraq war and other U.S. policies have made the world less safe in the five years since." In Europe, "where Islamic terror has struck twice since 9/11, in the Madrid train bombings and the London transit attacks, the silent tributes were tinged with doubts and recriminations." Adding to "the global jitters, a senior al-Qaida leader issued a new warning." Ayman al-Zawahiri said, "You should worry about your presence in the (Persian) Gulf and the second place you should worry about is Israel."

Some Islamic Blogs Commemorate 9/11 Anniversary. In a New York Times op-ed (9/12), Bernard Haykel and Saud al-Sarhan report on the Islamic jihadi and al Qaeda-related blogs' commemoration of the 9/11 anniversary: "The Web sites affiliated with many of militant jihadism's top thinkers, including Abu Muhammad al-Maqdisi and Sulayman al-Alwan, remained silent. That shouldn't surprise us: the Salafi strain of Islam, to which most jihadis subscribe, prohibits commemorating anniversaries." But "perhaps more remarkable was the fact that this year, a number of Web sites affiliated with Al Qaeda did commemorate the day — no doubt because they knew Americans would." Some messages "yesterday were clearly meant for Western consumption, reminding the United States that Al Qaeda is still active and bent on future attacks, and even posting images overlaid with threats in English."

Rice Thanks Canadians For Help On 9/11. The AP (9/12, Gearan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday the generosity of Canadians who took in thousands of stranded American air passengers five years ago represents the best of human nature in the face of evil." Rice "commemorated the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terror attacks with a short visit to the closest US ally. She read a letter of thanks from President Bush to employees at Halifax's small airport who helped coordinate a huge impromptu aid effort."

House GOP, Democrats Deadlocked On Language Of 9/11 Resolution. The Hill (9/12, O'Connor) reports, "House Republicans and Democrats are locked in a standoff over the language of a resolution commemorating the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001." Democratic leaders "want the GOP to remove any reference to legislation passed in response to the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon, which include the USA Patriot Act of 2001, the Homeland Security Act of 2002 and the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004." Republicans "argue that many of these accomplishments were listed in two of the previous four such annual resolutions." Democrats "requested that Republican leaders remove a long passage that refers to the bills signed by President Bush, according to a draft from Sept. 6 obtained by The Hill. GOP leaders refused, citing the two previous resolutions and a need for Congress to refer to its accomplishments following the attacks."

Roll Call (9/12, Davis, Yachnin) reports, "Deliberations over the annual anniversary resolution stalemated Monday, according to several House aides, with the GOP leadership now expected to bring the legislation to the floor Wednesday despite Democrats' unhappiness with the text of the measure. 'Negotiations have stopped,' said a GOP leadership aide, who confirmed Hastert's office had walked away from the negotiating table. 'We're going forward with it.'"

The New York Times (9/12, Zernike, Nagourney, 1.21M) runs a similar story titled "A Solemn, Sad Moment To Reflect, But Politics Also Surfaces." The Times says Republicans and Democrats are "squabbling over the wording of a Sept. 11 resolution in what aides to both parties acknowledged was, to no small extent, a bid to gain political advantage. And throughout the day, even as Democratic and Republican aides talked about efforts to avoid being seen as tarnishing the memory of the attacks with blatant political appeals, candidates and Congressional leaders were issuing statements reflecting political implications that Republicans and Democrats saw in the day's events." The Times also reports that "in election years -- 2002, 2004 and now 2006 -- the Republican-controlled House has included language heralding accomplishments in the war on terror. This time, the Republican version of the resolution applauded the reauthorization of the legislation known as the USA Patriot Act, as well as the tough immigration bill passed in the House."

The Washington Times (9/12, Bellantoni, 88K), meanwhile, reports under the headline "Lawmakers Unite Once Again Over 9/11" that "politicians gave a message of unity and determination yesterday." In "a rare bipartisan event," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "and Republican leaders joined Democratic leaders Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi and about 100 other lawmakers on the steps of the Capitol. The lawmakers recalled the evening of September 11 when many members of Congress gathered on the steps and sang 'God Bless America.'" The Times adds, "Republicans and Democrats came together for that moment in a spontaneous show of patriotism, members said yesterday as they enter what are sure to be the bitter last two months of the election season." The Washington Post (9/12, Weisman, Babington, 748K) also reports the story in a story titled "Whereas Congress Cannot Set Aside Politics."

McCain Says US Missed An Opportunity After 9/11. Sen. John McCain said on MSNBC's Hardball (9/11) that the US "passed up an opportunity after September 11th. I think we should have said, we're going to double the size of the Peace Corps, triple the size of Americorps, we're going to set up volunteer organizations all over America to ensure our security. We're going to give young people $18,000 in educational benefits for 18 months of military service, call Americans to serve. The country was united. We should have called them to serve, not just tell them to take a trip or go shopping."

Clinton Says US Is Safer, But Not Safe Enough. Sen. Hillary Clinton said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/11) that the US is safer since the 9/11 attacks, "but we're not safe enough. I think that we know that our borders and our ports and our mass transit and rail systems, our bridges, our tunnels, our chemical, nuclear plants are just not yet where they need to be and we're not following the recommendations of all the experts, including the 9/11 commission, that we distribute money here at home based on what the risk is. So my primary focus today, as I spent time with family members and, you know, reflected back the last five years, is whether we've done everything we know to do to protect our citizens here in New York and across America and I think, unfortunately, the answer is not yet."

Clinton was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/11) if the world is different since the 9/11 attacks. Clinton said, "I think it certainly is for me. It is for many Americans and the way that an event of such enormous importance sort of divides your life, pre-9/11 and post-9/11. And for thousands of people, life will never be the same. But I think it's also important that we maintain our values and our common sense about who we are as people and how we have to promote our interests and our concerns in the world, and how we have to make more friends and allies and not enemies, because if we're in for a long struggle, as we hear all the time -- and I don't doubt that, I think it is a struggle against an ideology that has religious overtones to it -- then we have got to be smart about how we're dealing with that."

Hamilton Angered By Kean's Role Advising ABC 9/11 Docu-Drama. In the Washington Post's "Washington Sketch" column (9/12, A2), Dana Milbank says there have "been few political love stories as beautiful as that of Tom Kean and Lee Hamilton, the former chairman and vice chairman of the 9/11 commission." So it "packed even more punch when Hamilton, at the National Press Club luncheon, lectured his friend about the falsified Sept. 11 docudrama Kean helped ABC produce." Kean has "infuriated many a Democrat who saw him as a nonpartisan truth-teller. In his work on ABC's 'The Path to 9/11,' Kean has blessed what has been documented to be a collection of falsehoods -- a disproportionate number of which make the Clinton administration look bad."

The New York Times (9/12, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "Perhaps the entertainment industry will come up with a few lasting lessons from the outcry over ABC's 'dramatization' of the events leading up to the terrorist attacks on 9/11. One suggestion: when attempting to recreate real events on screen, you do not show real people doing things they never did." It was "especially disturbing" that Kean "was willing to lend his prestige to this ill-considered project. Mr. Kean served as a senior consultant to the miniseries and has repeatedly defended it in public, even as several Democratic members of the commission criticized its distortions."

Despite Volatility, Ammonium Nitrate Easily Attained. ABC World News (9/11, story 5, 3:00, Gibson) reported on President Bush's touting of government efforts to prevent terrorist attacks, continuing to examine the widespread availability of ammonium nitrate fertilizer, which "has been used around the world in devastating terror attacks from Istanbul, Turkey to Oklahoma City." In an "ABC News undercover investigation…with virtually no questions asked, we were able to make large buys in Virginia and North Carolina." ABC reports that New York Rep. Peter King (R) has worked to gain restriction on the sale of the substance, but says he has had to accept a "watered down" version of his legislation, owing to the efforts of American Farm Bureau lobbyists. ABC "assembled 1,000 pounds of ammonium nitrate. And undetected, moved it into a storage shed just a few miles from the White House."

Critics See Gaps In Aviation-Security Despite Billions Spent. The Washington Times (9/12, Hudson, 88K) reports that in spite of billions spent "to protect against future airplane hijackings, …critics say many changes made are haphazard and misguided and that serious security gaps remain in place five years after the September 11 terrorist attacks." DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said in a speech at Georgetown University Friday that "the hardening of cockpit doors, 'thousands' of federal air marshals 'on aircraft protecting travelers every day all over the world' and 'armed flight deck officers authorized and trained to defend the cockpit'" had laid "a solid foundation for the future of our aviation-security efforts for the five years and the 10 years to come." However, "United Airlines is the only company that has installed steel cable barriers to prevent someone from charging the flight deck." Meanwhile, "Only a small fraction of 25,000 to 30,000 daily flights are protected by air marshals."

CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/11, Griffin) reported that "one of the biggest federal bureaucracies born out of 9/11," the TSA, "has repeatedly failed government security tests. … The Orlando Sentinel Newspaper reported this summer that, of 830 TSA screeners at this airport, 501 took a test in June, and could not recognize explosives or other banned material. That means 60 percent of the 830 failed." Later, Secretary Chertoff appeared on the show from Washington, and Zahn asked him about the "startling statistics" from Orlando. Chertoff began by "clearing up a couple of misconceptions," telling Zahn that "it is a fact that we do have a unified no-fly list and selectee list. And it is the case that everybody who gets on an airplane is run against that list. … It's also the case that that particular test, my understanding is, occurred when a group of new screeners were brought on board, and that the next month, the results became much better."

Former FBI Official Says Airliners Are Unguarded During Refueling. The Washington Times (9/12, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside The Beltway" column that Dan Coleman, who was the FBI's top expert on Osama bin Laden, predicts that the next terror attack on Washington could be a "hijacked plane swooping down over the green grass of the National Mall, roaring over tourists' heads, and straight into the dome of the US Capitol. … Airliners are virtually unguarded while refueled on airport tarmacs, Mr. Coleman cites among other security weaknesses not yet fully addressed. In addition, transportation workers still aren't sufficiently screened, and while grandmothers in wheelchairs can't slide by X-ray scanners, terrorists can."

Lawmakers Support Liquid Ban Until Effective Screening Possible. USA Today (9/12, Frank, 2.27M) reports, "Lawmakers from both political parties say the month-old ban on carrying most liquids on airliners should remain until airport screeners and machines can detect explosives such as those that alleged terrorists planned to use to destroy US-bound planes in August." The TSA, meanwhile, "said last month that it was studying whether it can safely allow passengers to carry small amounts of liquids on airliners. … Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff recently said that leaving the ban in place might keep security lines moving faster than a potentially confusing policy allowing small quantities of liquids."

Senate Panels Not In Complete Agreement On Port Security Bill. Roll Call (9/12, Pierce) reports for "all the talk of Senate committees skipping arm-in-arm down the path to stronger port security, the floor of the venerable chamber this week instead will feature its share of territorial disputes." Though the chairmen "of the three committees of jurisdiction — Commerce, Science and Transportation; Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs; and Finance — lauded the alleged compromise bill in floor speeches last week, a number of key agreements between the three, most notably how to fund the $835 million bill, have yet to be worked out. And the bill is in danger of being larded with myriad expensive transportation-related amendments." Despite the hurdles, "aides to both parties say they should be able to come up with some finished product by Thursday, before, perhaps, turning to an Amtrak authorization bill."

Passage Still Expected. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Simon, 918K) reports with "both parties jostling for the upper hand on national security ahead of November's midterm elections, a port security bill is headed for approval." The measure — "expected to pass the Senate this week — would, among other things, impose deadlines on background checks for port workers, expand a program to screen for 'dirty bombs' and authorize $400 million to help ports bolster anti-terrorism defenses. A good chunk of that money is likely to go to the Los Angeles-Long Beach port complex."

WPost Urges Senate To Pass Port Security Bill. The Washington Post (9/12, A22, 748K) says in an editorial that the Port Security Improvement Act of 2006 "contains several common-sense proposals" and "two things distinguish this moderate legislation from the irresponsible rhetoric on port security that has marred debates on the subject for years. First, it does not call for 100 percent of containers arriving at U.S. ports to be individually inspected for all dangerous materials." Second, "while providing five years of steady funding for port security projects, the bill does not dedicate money for port security in perpetuity." With "those sensible checks in place, the Senate should pass this bill."

WSJournal Criticizes Prospect Of Partisan Retribution For CIA Agents. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) says in an editorial that if Jack Bauer of Fox's "24" program "worked at the CIA in real life today," he "would apparently be buying insurance in case the ACLU or John Kerry decided to sue or subpoena him for protecting America with too much vigor. The Washington Post reported yesterday that more CIA counterterrorism officers are signing up for private insurance that would pay for civil judgments and legal costs if they are sued or charged with a crime. These are the agents who interrogated Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, Abu Zubaydah and other jihadis, using what President Bush last week called methods that were legal but 'tough.' Those methods succeeded in breaking these men into divulging information that led to the arrest of other al Qaeda bigs, and to the foiling of plots that could have killed thousands." Though "the government pays the premiums for this kind of insurance, it is a sorry spectacle that these agents must now fear partisan retribution for having done precisely what the country asked them to do."

Abercrombie Criticizes Administration Gulf Coast Rebuilding Efforts. In an op-ed in the Hill (9/12), Rep. Neil Abercrombie writes that one year after Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans and Mississippi's Gulf Coast remain "a terrible, twisted portrait of lives and families and whole communities washed away; home by home, block by block, neighborhood by neighborhood. One year after President Bush viewed the destruction from 40-thousand feet as he flew back to Washington from his vacation; one year after he vowed—'We will do what it takes,' promises of timely federal assistance to help the people of the region rebuild are as empty as the endless square miles where homes and businesses once stood." Abercrombie calls for FEMA to "be restored to independence from the Department of Homeland Security, with a legislative mandate to rebuild now." He adds, "The Pentagon has just announced a new czar for infrastructure construction in Iraq. The American people should demand that the federal government's post-Katrina priorities reflect an equal and urgent commitment to the infrastructure of the US."

WAR NEWS:

Intelligence Report Paints Negative Picture Of Situation In Western Iraq. The New York Times (9/12, Gordon, 1.21M) picks up the story broken by the Washington Post yesterday, concerning Marine Col. Peter Devlin's grim intelligence assessment of the situation in Anbar Province: "The political and security situation in western Iraq is grim and will continue to deteriorate unless the region receives a major infusion of aid and a division is sent to reinforce the American troops operating there, according to the senior Marine intelligence officer in Iraq." The Times adds, "Military officials familiar with the document disclosed additional material and provided several quotations from the assessment."

Pentagon Takes Anbar Report "Very Seriously." The Washington Post (9/12, Tyson, 748K) reports, "The Pentagon is taking 'very seriously' a classified intelligence report concluding that the U.S. military has fought to a stalemate in Iraq's western Anbar province as political conditions also worsen in the 'epicenter' of the country's Sunni insurgency, a senior defense official said yesterday." Speaking to the House Government Reform Committee was Undersecretary for Policy Eric Edelman. Panel members Reps. Dennis Kucinich (D-OH) and Christopher Shays (R-CT) are quoted questioning Edelman or Rear Adm. William Sullivan about the classified Devlin report and about the length of the US presence in Iraq, respectively.

Sadr Opposes Iraq Division Plan. The Washington Post (9/12, Paley, Sarhan, 748K) reports, "Moqtada al-Sadr, the powerful Shiite Muslim cleric, remains adamantly opposed to a controversial plan to partition Iraq into a federation of three largely independent regions." Sadr's stance differs from that of "intermittent rival Abdul Aziz al-Hakim": "The dispute between two of the most influential Shiite politicians in Iraq highlights the bitter divisions between various parties in the country's fragile ruling coalition. The rift also underscores the divisive nature of the federalism issue, which has pitted Sunni Arabs against some Shiites and Kurds." Sunnis reportedly fear being "left with" resource-poor "swaths of the country."

Sadr Aide Describes Vision Of Iraq Without US Troops. The Washington Post (9/12, Knickmeyer, Raghavan, 748K) reports the vision of Mustafa Yaqoubi for an Iraq after US forces leave: "First, 'there will be a civil war,' said the aide, Mustafa Yaqoubi ...The rising violence and rivalries under the American occupation make a shaking-out all but inevitable once foreign forces go, Yaqoubi said. ... 'No matter the number of people who would lose their lives, it is better than now,' he added. 'It would be better than the Americans staying.'" He ultimately envisions the "freedom to usher in a Shiite religious government that ... would be moderate and perhaps comparable in some ways to Iran's." Yaqoubi denies any need for Shiite "gratitude" to the US, saying that the US ousted Saddam Hussein out of its "own interest[s]."

Militias May Be Spinning Out Of Leaders' Control. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Moore, 918K) reports, "As U.S. and Iraqi officials seek a way to disarm Shiite militias involved in the sectarian violence driving Iraq toward civil war, the paramilitary forces are splintering into more extreme groups that militia leaders say they are powerless to control." The Times adds, "A series of devastating paramilitary strikes against Shiite neighborhoods has eroded early gains attributed to the security sweep and severely undermined U.S. arguments for disarming militias." A proposal by Abdelaziz Hakim to install "popular committees" to provide neighborhood security could end up adding to Iraq's "chaotic patchwork of gangsters, revenge squads and insurgents."

Iraqi Elections Said To Have Worsened Sectarian Divisions. McClatchy (9/12, Brown) reports, "Iraq's political process has sharpened the country's sectarian divisions, polarized relations between its ethnic and religious groups, and weakened its sense of national identity, the Government Accountability Office said Monday." The GAO report is called "unusual in its sweep" because it relied "on a series of other government studies, some of them previously unpublicized, to touch on issues from violence and politics to electricity production. Published on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the GAO report was downbeat in its conclusions - underscoring how Iraq's deteriorating security situation threatens the Bush administration's goal of a stable and democratic regime in Baghdad."

Kristol, Lowry Call For "Substantially More" Troops In Iraq. In the Washington Post (9/12, 748K), conservative commentators Bill Kristol and Rich Lowry state, "At this urgent pass, there can be no doubt that we need to stop the downward slide in Iraq by securing Baghdad. There is no mystery as to what can make the crucial difference in the battle of Baghdad: American troops." Shifting troops from one Iraqi area to another weakens control in the former areas; therefore, "we need substantially more troops in Iraq," not just Baghdad.

Shiite-Sunni Dating Wanes In Polarized Baghdad. The Washington Post (9/12, Paley, 748K) reports in a front page article, "For decades, marriages between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq were as ordinary as the daily call to prayer. But the sectarian warfare gripping the country has created a powerful barrier to Sunni-Shiite romances." The breakdown of intermarriage is "a grim foreboding of the future." The Post mistakenly calls the "oppressed" Shiite population a "minority" in Iraq.

Saddam Accuses Kurds Of Sowing Hatred. The AP (9/11, Al-Bashir) reports, "A defiant Saddam Hussein accused Kurdish witnesses at his genocide trial Monday of trying to divide Iraqis by alleging chemical attacks and mass arrests during a crackdown that the prosecution says killed up to 180,000 people." AFP (9/11, Deshmukh) reports the trial as well, saying that Saddam delivered "a tirade from the dock" stating that the trial was a scheme to split "Kurds and Arabs."

The New York Times (9/12, Von Zielbauer, 1.21M) reports, "The trial of Saddam Hussein on charges of genocide against Iraq's Kurds resumed Monday, after a nearly three-week hiatus, while sectarian violence continued on Baghdad's streets, including the suicide bombing of a crowded downtown bus that killed more than a dozen people." In parliament, "lawmakers aligned with the political movement led by the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr came out against efforts to enact legislation that would allow Iraq to be divided into autonomous regions, with Shiites and Kurds controlling the oil-rich south and north. Sunni Arabs, who would be left holding the barren western and central regions, are vehemently opposed to the legislation." American soldiers patrolling a neighborhood in Baghdad reportedly "delivered six headless bodies" and a seventh, unmutilated body to a hospital.

Suicide Bomber Attacks Assassinated Iraqi Governor's Funeral. The New York Times (9/12, Gall, 1.21M) reports, "A suicide bomber blew himself up Monday at the funeral of the assassinated governor of Paktia Province, killing at least seven people and wounding up to 40. Five of the dead were policemen, and two were children." The bombing was perceived by some "as a message from the Taliban that they are ready to strike in areas outside their traditional homeland, which is in the south, and are showing they can hit where they want." Denial by a Taliban spokesman of responsibility for the funeral bombing may signify "fissures are showing in the Taliban movement, with some Taliban commanders based inside Afghanistan opposed to suicide bombing."

The Washington Post (9/12, A24, Constable, 748K) reports that the bombing was the "third major suicide attack in four days." The Post theorizes that the escalating violence may be part of an "orchestrated offensive by the revived Taliban militia."

DOJ:

DOJ Attorneys Lose Appeal On Overtime Pay. In his "Federal Diary" colulmn for the Washington Post (9/12, D04), Stephen Barr writes, "There's no dispute that Justice Department lawyers worked overtime and on holidays, and there's evidence the lawyers were 'expected and induced' to work extra hours. But that's not enough to win back pay, a federal court ruled yesterday." Barr continues, "Overtime hours must be 'ordered or approved' in advance for pay purposes, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit said. … The ruling is the latest in a long-running class-action lawsuit involving more than 9,000 Justice Department lawyers, but it's not the end of the case." Barr adds, "The agency lawyers, represented by Williams & Connolly LLP, will appeal the decision to the Supreme Court, said Robert A. Van Kirk , a lawyer for the firm. … 'The Federal Circuit's decision essentially guts the Federal Employees Pay Act and gives federal agencies the green light to disregard the mandatory overtime provisions of the law,' Van Kirk said. … The Justice Department would not comment on the ruling. In the past, the department has said that its lawyers are professionals who accept that they will work more than 40 hours a week to carry out their responsibilities." Barr notes, "Yesterday's ruling was the second defeat for the Justice Department lawyers -- many are assistant U.S. attorneys -- at the circuit court. They had prevailed in a federal claims court only to see that decision reversed on an appeal by the department. The lawyers went back to the circuit court in hopes of readdressing certain issues in the case. … The agency lawyers are seeking compensation for overtime, holiday and 'administratively uncontrollable overtime,' a special pay category. The department has said the case covers the period between 1992 to 1999, but the lawyers think the case could extend to the present."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ, FBI Launch Probes Of Hewlett-Packard Leak Investigation. The Washington Post (9/12, D1, Noguchi) reports, "The Justice Department, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a House subcommittee have started their own probes into how Hewlett-Packard Co. investigators obtained private phone records in an attempt to identify a source of company leaks to the media, according to the company and regulatory filings released yesterday." The Post continues, "Last night, the HP board of directors also reconvened to consider ousting its chairman, Patricia C. Dunn, who led the company's efforts to identify the source of the leaks from its own board." HP "revealed yesterday in a regulatory filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it had been contacted by the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California for information regarding its investigation. … A spokesman for the FBI said the agency also was looking into the methods of HP's investigation. The House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on oversight and investigations has asked HP to submit information as part of the committee's broader look at breaches of private information. Last week, the California state attorney general's office launched its own investigation, and the Federal Communications Commission requested information from AT&T Corp. about the disclosure of the phone records."

The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Carlton, Emshwiller) reports, "A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California yesterday confirmed that his office and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are probing the 'processes employed' in the H-P leak investigation. Separately, a House committee said it is seeking information from H-P about the matter, including the identity of private investigators that H-P has said it used in the investigation, which involved accessing the private phone records of board members and nine journalists." The Journal continues, "The focus of the government inquiries is an H-P investigation that was requested by Ms. Dunn in 2005 and intensified in early 2006. That company probe involved a practice known as 'pretexting,' in which a person's private phone records are obtained by someone impersonating them. … The Palo Alto, Calif., computer and printer maker has disclosed that it hired a private-investigation firm to carry out the inquiry and the firm, still unidentified, hired a second firm that used pretexting to obtain phone records. Ms. Dunn has said she knew directors' phone records were being scrutinized, but didn't realize those records had been obtained improperly."

The New York Times (9/12, Darlin) reports, "The company's board, which met inconclusively on Sunday, resumed telephone consultations Monday afternoon. Foremost among the topics was the role of the chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, who the company says first authorized the investigation last year. … Ms. Dunn recused herself from parts of the discussion, according to a person with knowledge of the board's deliberations, leaving the company's outside counsel, Larry W. Sonsini, chairman of the powerhouse Silicon Valley law firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, to preside." The Times adds, "Mr. Sonsini and his firm were consulted at various points in the investigation, according to the company. As a result, his role at the board meeting was 'an odd choice,' said Jeffrey A. Sonnenfeld, a professor at the Yale School of Management who advises companies on corporate governance. 'They have a highly conflicted law firm right now,' he said." The Times notes, "Tne reason for the board's extended talks was reported to be discussion of Thomas J. Perkins, who quit the board in May in anger at Ms. Dunn over the internal investigation. A person with knowledge of the board's deliberations said that Mr. Perkins, a pre-eminent Silicon Valley venture capitalist, sought to return to the board but that members are split on whether he should. … Mr. Perkins's spokesman, Mark Corallo, disputed that report. 'Mr. Perkins will not return to the H.P. board, even if asked,' Mr. Corallo said, but 'he believes in the performance and prospects of the company under the leadership of Mark Hurd.'"

USA Today (9/12, Kessler) reports, "In a five-page letter Monday to HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, the House Energy and Commerce Committee said it was 'troubled' by reports of pretexting. … The letter, signed by two Republicans and two Democrats, asks HP for the names of everyone involved and other data."

The AP (9/12, Robertson) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission has also taken interest in the HP investigation, asking AT&T Inc. last week how the company's private investigators managed to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists."

Bloomberg (9/12, Guglielmo, King) reports, "The new inquiries add pressure on Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, who authorized the probe that California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has already said may result in criminal charges. Hewlett- Packard's board is meeting today for a second day to discuss the scandal and consider calls by former director and venture capitalist Tom Perkins for Dunn's resignation."

More Commentary. USA Today (9/12) editorializes, "Just how easy is it for people to obtain your private telephone records? The scandal at Hewlett-Packard provides a stark and troubling answer. … Aside from exposing dysfunction in the HP boardroom, the episode illustrates just how loose phone companies are with customers' records." USA adds, "Despite its obvious deceit, however, pretexting might not violate federal law if is not used for identity theft. California, where HP is based, has more stringent laws, and authorities there are investigating whether any of them were broken. … If nothing else, the events at HP should put pressure on telephone companies to make it harder to get sensitive data. They should adopt restrictions that would keep private records out of the hands of unscrupulous poseurs, such as requiring passwords and mailing records only to the customers' listed addresses." USA concludes, "A federal response might be in order as well, both to set standards for releasing sensitive data and to crack down on the pernicious practice of pretexting, which some Internet companies have turned into a for-profit business model. … Perhaps then, people would feel more secure. And perhaps companies like HP would focus more on their customers, and less on themselves."

Dell Delays Filing Financial Report Amid DOJ, SEC Probes. USA Today (9/12, Acohido) reports, "Amid rising uncertainty about its strategic course, Dell on Monday delayed filing its quarterly report and postponed a high-profile analysts briefing for the second time in six months." USA continues, "The No. 1 PC maker also put its stock-repurchase program on hold and noted that the Justice Department has joined the Securities and Exchange Commission in examining its accounting practices. In a statement with few details, Chairman Michael Dell vowed to make things right. … Federal regulators are examining whether Dell misstated financial reports 'including issues relating to accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items,' Dell said. Meanwhile, the U.S. Attorney's office for the Southern District of New York has requested to review accounting documents from 2002 to the present."

The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Lawton) reports, "The news increases the spotlight on Dell's reporting methods and could spell more trouble for chief executive Kevin Rollins. … When Dell disclosed the SEC investigation in August, the Round Rock, Texas, company said it didn't think the investigation would materially affect its financials; now Dell isn't ruling out needing to restate prior results. The subpoenas from the U.S. attorney, which has requested documents related to Dell's financial reporting from 2002 to the present, hadn't previously been disclosed." The Journal adds, "Dell was also forced to take two other embarrassing steps yesterday. … It suspended its share-buyback program until further notice. The company spent $7.2 billion to repurchase 204 million shares in fiscal year 2006, which ended in February. In addition, Dell canceled its financial-analysts' day for the second time this year; the meeting with Wall Street analysts was to have taken place in New York tomorrow."

Bloomberg (9/12, Guglielmo) reports, "Dell said the investigations indicate possible errors related to so-called accruals and reserves -- estimates of future company obligations -- reported in previous financial statements. The company said last month that the SEC started requesting information in August 2005 relating to revenue recognition. … Analysts also raised concerns about the delay of Dell's financial day, which already had been postponed from April. It will be rescheduled to a later date, Dell said Monday. The company still plans a meeting with reporters today, which will be held by Michael Dell and Rollins." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. attorney requested documents related to the company's financial reporting dating back to 2002, Dell said. The company said it plans to file its latest report as soon as possible and it is cooperating with the investigations."

The AP (9/12, Slagle) reports, "Dell first disclosed the accounting probe in last month's quarterly report, in which revenues plummeted 51 percent. … At the time, Dell officials played down its significance and said they didn't expect it to have any material impact on the company's bottom line."

DOJ Drops Freddie Mac Probe. The Washington Post (9/12, O'hara) reports, "After laying dormant for two years, the Justice Department's criminal probe into accounting transgressions at Freddie Mac is apparently over, according to company officials. … 'The U.S. attorney's office has not initiated contact with us in well over two years, and it is our understanding that the matter is inactive,' said David R. Palombi, a spokesman for the McLean-based mortgage finance company. 'Accordingly, we expect no further action in this matter.'" The Post continues, "The inactivity at the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria also extends to investigations of several former Freddie Mac executives, including chief executive Leland C. Brendsel, president David Glenn and chief financial officer Vaughn A. Clarke. Sources familiar with the investigation, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they did not want to be seen as speaking for the department, said lawyers for the ousted officials have not been contacted by the Justice Department since 2004." The Post adds, "Palombi's statements appear to resolve one of the final issues that have been dogging the company since its accounting problems became public in 2003. … In 2003, Freddie Mac admitted it had improperly managed its earnings through a series of transactions that smoothed out earnings growth. The company reduced its reported earnings by $5 billion between 2000 and 2003, hoping to defer those earnings to later years. … Freddie Mac is still working to produce an up-to-date and accurate set of books. But the company has cleared itself of most of the liability from the matter in the past three years. It has paid a $125 million fine to federal regulators, more than $400 million in shareholder lawsuit settlements, and $3.8 million in civil fines to settle Federal Election Commission charges of improper political fundraising. … But the possibility of a criminal action remained. In recent weeks, the company sought clarification from the Justice Department over whether its long silence meant the case was closed -- particularly after the department issued a statement in August that it had closed its criminal investigation of similar accounting problems at Freddie Mac rival Fannie Mae."

Financial Times Blasts DOJ Policy On Corporate Cooperation. The Financial Times (9/12) editorializes, "Corporate America has had a rough ride since Enron: between Eliot Spitzer, New York attorney-general, and the Sarbanes-Oxley act, US companies have paid a high price for their pre-Enron bad habits (not to mention the bad behaviour of others). … But corporate America's problems have come not only from the scourge of Albany, and the new regulatory burden imposed by Congress. The US Department of Justice has made white-collar crime (rightly) one of its top priorities. But in its zeal to catch corporate criminals, the DoJ has used some dubious tactics that arguably violate the US constitution and may even defeat the whole purpose of its corporate crime crusade - to create a new culture of compliance that encourages companies to do the right thing without having to be prosecuted." The Times continues, "Later today, the powerful Senate judiciary committee will open its own inquiry into the department's hardball tactics, particularly the practice of forcing companies to waive the privilege that normally protects communications with lawyers - including those between whistle-blowers and in-house lawyers. … The crux of the problem is a 2003 policy (known as the 'Thompson memorandum') that says prosecutors should decide whether to indict a company partly based on the company's co-operation with the government; and the best way to prove co-operation is to waive attorney-client privilege, and give the government all the information it needs to make its case. Companies have little choice but to turn over the information: an indictment is tantamount to a death sentence. … This is the wrong way to fight corporate crime. Companies need legal advice to be able to obey complex laws; if they cannot get it - without the risk that what they say will be revealed to the government - they may not try to obey the law at all. … The DoJ should rewrite its policy on waiver of attorney-client privilege - before Congress does so for it."

Former NYSE Head Grasso Seeks New Judge For Trial. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Lucchetti) reports, "Former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso is seeking a new judge for his pending trial on civil charges brought by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer." The Journal continues, "Mr. Grasso's lawyers last week filed a motion to have the case reassigned to a new judge. New York Supreme Court Justice Charles Ramos has been handling the pretrial stage of the case and is set to preside over a trial that may start as soon as October. … Mr. Spitzer's civil lawsuit against Mr. Grasso alleges that his $187.5 million pay package was excessive for the head of a New York not-for-profit company, which the NYSE was before it went public in March as NYSE Group Inc." The Journal adds, "Lawyers for Mr. Grasso at Williams & Connolly LLP filed papers arguing for a new judge on the grounds Justice Ramos held settlement discussions with the parties in which he made statements that could be interpreted as 'impairing Mr. Grasso's right' to a fair trial. The filing also stated that -- before the case was filed -- Justice Ramos twice unsuccessfully approached the Big Board to be considered for a board seat."

Former ITXC Executives Accused Of Bribing African Officials. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/7) reported, "Two former executives of a Princeton international telecommunications company approved more than $250,000 in bribes to officials in several African nations, securities regulators charged in a lawsuit filed yesterday." Steven Ott and Roger Michael Young "while at ITXC violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, the Securities and Exchange Commission charged in the complaint filed in federal court in Trenton. Ott, vice president for global sales, and Young, managing director of the Middle East and Africa, approved $267,468 in bribes to phone company officials in Nigeria, Rwanda and Senegal between 2001 and 2004, the lawsuit alleged." The AP (9/7, Hughes) noted, "The Justice Department said it had charged Amoako and unnamed co-conspirators with arranging for ITXC to pay $166,000 in commissions to a foreign official at Nitel, a Nigerian government-owned company; $26,000 to Rwandatel, owned by the Rwandan government; and about $74,000 to an employee of Sonatel, partly owned by the Senegalese government."

Retirements Of Sarbanes, Oxley To See Shake Up Of Finance Panels. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, A4, Mullins) reports, "The retirements of Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D., Md.) and Rep. Mike Oxley (R., Ohio) spell changes next year in the House and Senate committees that regulate Wall Street, banks and finance. … The broader change will come in the House, which will see a new committee chairman regardless of whether Republicans or Democrats control the chamber after the November elections. On the other side of the Capitol, Sen. Chris Dodd (D., Conn.) will succeed Mr. Sarbanes as the senior Democratic member of the Senate Banking Committee. Should Republicans, as expected, retain a majority in the Senate, the panel's chairman will remain Sen. Richard Shelby (R., Ala.)." The Journal notes, "Things are more complicated in the House, where as many as five lawmakers could win the top spot on the Financial Services panel. If Democrats win majority control in November, the liberal Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.) would inherit the gavel. If Republicans keep their majority, a contest is shaping up between Reps. Spencer Bachus of Alabama and Richard Baker of Louisiana. Two other Republicans, David Dreier of California and Deborah Pryce of Ohio, have outside chances to succeed Mr. Oxley."

DOJ Leads Alaska Corruption Probe. The Anchorage Daily News (9/12, Mauer) reports, "The federal influence-buying case that erupted with fury 10 days ago with searches of a half-dozen Alaska legislative offices is being managed independently of the Alaska U.S. Attorney's office, a U.S. Justice Department official said Monday. … 'The whole office is recused,' Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said." The News continues, "Instead, the wide-ranging investigation is being overseen by attorneys from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, Sierra said. … The Public Integrity Section has about 25 attorneys, a team that often lives out of suitcases in pursuit of corruption cases as far away as Guam. They've prosecuted petty thefts by sheriff's deputies, the massive frauds of Enron and the high-profile corruption case of Jack Abramoff." The News adds, "Sierra wouldn't say why the Alaska office wasn't allowed to participate in the case or how many lawyers from Washington were assigned to it. But the case is even off-limits to Nelson Cohen, the new U.S. Attorney for Alaska who just arrived last month from Pittsburgh, he said. … Sierra said it's not unusual that the local U.S. Attorney's office will recuse itself from a sensitive corruption case and wall off its legal, public relations and even clerical staffs from the investigation and prosecutions. Sometimes one or two assistant U.S. attorneys might still be assigned to work with the Public Integrity attorneys, but Sierra said he didn't know if that was the case in Alaska. … FBI agents from Alaska are lead investigators, working the case alongside the prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section, said Eric Gonzalez, spokesman for the FBI in Alaska." The News notes, "Dozens of extra FBI agents were brought in from Outside to execute about two dozen search warrants when the first raids started at legislative offices and elsewhere on Aug. 31. After the initial round of searches and interviews, the Outside agents were sent home, Gonzalez said. … While officials say little, the warrants target the relationships between legislators and the oil-field service and construction company Veco. The company, which has long been generous with campaign donations at the state and federal levels and lobbying in Juneau, has gone so far as to hire sitting legislators, including Senate President Ben Stevens, R-Anchorage, the son of Alaska's powerful U.S. senator, Ted Stevens."

Lawmaker Denies VECO Contribution Influenced Pipeline Vote. The AP (9/12, Volz) reports, "Days before an ailing Rep. Carl Moses flew from Anchorage to cast the deciding vote on a contentious oil and gas tax bill, six VECO Corp. executives contributed $3,000 to the Unalaska Democrat's campaign. … Moses, contacted Monday…denies the VECO campaign contributions had anything to do with his vote and his name has not previously been connected with the FBI raids. 'Don't worry, I'm squeaky clean,' Moses said." The AP notes that VECO "typically supports Republican candidates. The contributions to Moses are among the only donations company executives have given to a Democrat this election year."

Corruption Trial Of DC Developer Begins. The Washington Post (9/12, B5, Weiss) reports, "Despite his reputation as a maverick wheeler-dealer whose projects helped revitalize the city, prominent developer Douglas Jemal was 'little more than a common thief,' prosecutors said yesterday at the start of his trial on bribery and fraud charges." The Post continues, "Government lawyers said Jemal and his company, Douglas Development Corp., used bribes and fraudulent documents to keep an overextended real estate empire alive in the years before the boom in District property prices. … Jemal, his son Norman, who is the company's vice president, and leasing director Blake Esherick went on trial in U.S. District Court in Washington yesterday. They are charged with conspiring to bribe a former D.C. government official with cash, fine meals, trips to Las Vegas and a Rolex in exchange for 'sweetheart' contracts with the city. Prosecutors said Jemal's company received inflated profits for leasing property to the city from 2001 to 2004." The Post adds, "All three defendants have pleaded not guilty and vowed to fight the charges in a trial that could last up to six weeks. The defense painted Jemal, 63, as a 'visionary,' and previously said that its witnesses could include Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) and Washington Wizards' owner Abe Pollin, who built a sports arena in an area of downtown that is home to many of Jemal's retail properties. … Most of the allegations involve dealings with Michael A. Lorusso, a former deputy director of the D.C. Office of Property Management. Lorusso, who was fired from his city job in January 2003, pleaded guilty to bribery and agreed to aid prosecutors. Lorusso, who is expected to be the key witness in the trial, faces a prison term of 57 to 71 months under federal sentencing guidelines, but prosecutors have said they could seek less time depending on the value of his cooperation. … In his opening statement to the jury, Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark H. Dubester twice mentioned Lorusso's guilty plea to the jury. That drew calls for a mistrial from Jemal's defense attorney, Reid H. Weingarten, who argued that Dubester was trying to taint Jemal on the basis of Lorusso's guilt. … U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina rejected the motion for a mistrial but agreed to tell jurors that they should not take Lorusso's guilty plea to mean that Jemal also is guilty."

Son Of Key Gotti Prosecution Witness Disputes Witness Tampering Charges. The New York Daily News (9/12, Zambito, 729K) reports, "Trying to soften their client's image," John A. Gotti's "defense attorneys yesterday told jurors that the mobster -- along with a cellmate-turned-illustrator -- penned a kiddie book about a lovable pint-sized tiger and a fierce dragon." Meanwhile, "the son of the government's star witness -- mob turncoat Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo -- disputed witness tampering charges against Gotti. Prosecutors contend Gotti summoned DiLeonardo's then-teenage son to Ray Brook Prison in February 2003 to get him to persuade his father not to testify against the mob boss. Michael Ricci…said he and Gotti talked about 'school, girls and sports. How I was doing.'" Ricci "said he made the jailhouse visit after finding out his father was going to cooperate with the feds, meaning he probably wouldn't see him again."

Two Georgia School Contract Fraud Conspirators Sentenced To Prison. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/12, Montgomery, 399K) reports former Georgia schools superintendent Linda Schrenko "reported to federal prison Monday afternoon while her former lover and deputy superintendent, Merle Temple, was sentenced to eight years and one month in prison. Another conspirator in the case, Alpharetta computer executive A. Stephen Botes, received an identical sentence to Temple: eight years and one month. The three were charged as part of a scheme to defraud the government of $600,000 in federal funds earmarked for deaf and honors students." The AP (9/12) also reports on the sentencings.

Corruption Trial Of Illinois Secretary Of State Employee Gets Underway. The AP (9/12, Dennis) reports, "A former high-ranking Illinois secretary of state official helped three janitors pocket more than $150,000 in state pay for work they didn't do in exchange for special treatment by city trash collectors in his Springfield neighborhood, prosecutors said Monday. Cecil Turner received no financial kickbacks in the alleged ghost payroll scheme, U.S. District Attorney Patrick Chesley said during opening statements in Turner's trial in federal court in Peoria. Instead, Chesley alleged Turner aided in the scheme because one of the janitors - Dana Dinora - also worked for Springfield's public works department, arranging quick pick ups of junk ranging from water heaters to a dog house for Turner and his neighbors.

Defense attorney Michael Metnick told jurors Turner was unaware of the alleged five-year payroll scam he maintains was orchestrated by Dinora, one of three former janitors who pleaded guilty in the scheme and agreed to cooperate in the case against Turner."

Anti-Castro Exiles In Florida Plead Guilty To Weapons Plot. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/12, Anderson) reports, "A prominent Cuban exile who virulently opposes the communist government of President Fidel Castro pleaded guilty Monday to weapons charges arising from seizures last year of machine guns, a grenade launcher and thousands of rounds of ammunition." Santiago Alvarez, "a wealthy developer and key benefactor of jailed Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles, pleaded guilty to a single criminal conspiracy charge," and his long-time employee, "Osvaldo Mitat, also pleaded guilty. Their pleas came a day before jury selection was scheduled to begin for a trial before a federal judge in Fort Lauderdale." The AP adds, "Alvarez and Mitat were arrested in November after an informant tipped the FBI that a large cooler full of military-style weapons was being transported from apartments in Broward County owned by Alvarez to Mitat in Miami." The New York Times (9/12, Aguayo, 1.21M) notes that Alvarez and Mitat "would have faced up to 20 years in prison if convicted. But prosecutors reduced the charges in a last-minute plea deal, and the men now face a maximum sentence of five years. The men were arrested last year after the Federal Bureau of Investigation seized machine guns, a grenade launcher and thousands of rounds of ammunition."

The Miami Herald (9/12, Weaver, 310K) reports, "Francisco 'Pepe' Hernandez, of the Cuban American National Foundation, said of Alvarez's decision to plead guilty: 'He didn't have any choice after the judge ruled on the insistence of the government bringing this trial in Broward.' 'They realized their chances were slim,' Hernandez said, 'and they wanted to spare the community this commotion.' Jose Basulto of Brothers to the Rescue said, 'George Washington would have been proud of these two men as patriots.'" The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/12, Blum, 265K) adds, "One longtime friend and supporter said Monday's guilty pleas marked a 'shameful day for Cuban patriots.'" The Sun-Sentinel also notes that the FBI was tipped off by the employee Alvarez asked to transport the weapons to Mitat.

Judge Rules Posada Carriles Should Be Released From Custody. The AP (9/12, Caldwell) reports, "U.S. Magistrate Judge Norbert Garney issued a 23-page written ruling Monday that Luis Posada Carriles should be set free from the El Paso immigration detention center where he has been held since his arrest on immigration charges last year, Posada's El Paso lawyer, Felipe D.J. Millan said Monday. Millan said the ruling will now go to a federal district judge. If Garney's ruling is upheld, which Millan believes will happen, he anticipates that Posada could be set free in about 30 days. … A Department of Justice spokesman said Monday evening that the agency is reviewing the decision." The AP notes, "Eric Wingerter, a Venezuelan government spokesman in Washington, said Garney's ruling 'is exactly the wrong message to be sending' in time of an increased focused on fighting terrorism."

8th Circuit Considers Sentencing Guidelines In Light Of Booker. The National Law Journal (9/12, Maclean) reports, "An 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge warned recently that the appellate court may be creating unconstitutional sentencing precedents that violate the spirit of last year's Supreme Court decision in U.S. v. Booker, which gave judges discretion to shape reasonable sentences." The Journal continues, "Nationally, circuits have been grappling with how much leeway to give trial judges in fashioning sentences that are either more or less lenient than the traditional guideline range established by the U.S. Sentencing Commission. … The 8th Circuit overturned the 11-year prison term for repeat offender Jeffrey A. McDonald in a methamphetamine case because it was less than half the recommended sentencing guideline range of 22 to 27 years and just one year more than the law's minimum limit. … The court ordered resentencing without such an extreme variance. … This prompted Judge Kermit E. Bye to point out in dissent that, since the Booker decision, the 8th Circuit has reversed 25 sentences below the guideline range while affirming four, yet affirmed 16 sentences above guideline range while reversing just one. … 'If we fail to implement the promise of Booker and do not relinquish greater discretion to experienced district court judges whose proximity to sentencing renders them eminently more qualified to appreciate the subtleties of each case, we will find ourselves the architects of a new -- and equally unconstitutional -- de facto mandatory sentencing system crafted from the ashes of the last,' Bye wrote in U.S. v. McDonald, No. 05-1617." The Journal notes, "Around the country, six circuits have held that sentences within the guideline range are presumptively reasonable. Only the 2nd Circuit declined to create a per se rule on the reasonableness of any sentence within approved ranges. U.S. v. Crosby, 397 F.3d 103 (2005)."

FBI Investigating Ohio Woman's Disappearance From Cruise Ship. The Miami Herald (9/12, Robinson, 310K) reports, "Federal officials are investigating the reported disappearance of a passenger who had been aboard a cruise ship that returned to the Port of Miami-Dade on Monday. The 36-year-old Ohio woman was reported missing from Carnival Cruise Lines' Imagination as it was en route from Mexico. FBI officials in Miami spent Monday morning interviewing family members who were on the ship. … FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said the investigation is just beginning," but she noted, "It doesn't look like foul play at this time." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/12) notes that the "cruise line said relatives last saw the woman early Sunday but did not report her missing until Monday, when the ship returned to Miami." Orihuela "said, however, that she was not aware of any delay in reporting the disappearance." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/12, Naanes, Stieghorst, 265K) also reports on the story, noting the Orihuela said there appears to be no evidence of foul play.

Loaded Gun Found In DC Court Cellblock. The AP (9/12) reports, "Investigators were trying to determine how a loaded handgun got into a cellblock inside District of Columbia Superior Court." The AP continues, "A cleaning contractor found the .25-caliber semiautomatic pistol under a wad of paper in a cell toilet Friday, said Steve Conboy, the U.S. marshal for Superior Court. … It was the first time such a serious security breach occurred at the busy downtown courthouse in at least 10 years, authorities said." The AP adds, "Conboy, who oversees courthouse security, said he does not know how the small pistol was smuggled into the building. … All prisoners are patted down by deputy marshals before being taken into the cellblock -- whether coming from the D.C. jail, police headquarters or off the street. … But only people who are taken into custody in a courtroom after coming in off the street are scanned by a metal detector, Conboy said."

California Highway Patrol Probing Computer Breaches. The New York Times (9/12, Steinhauer) reports, "The California Highway Patrol is investigating outside breaches of a computer system used by aides to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to store downloaded audio files, a spokesman for the patrol said Monday. In those files, some of which were leaked to The Los Angeles Times, the governor was heard telling Susan Kennedy, his chief of staff, that Cubans and Puerto Ricans were naturally passionate because of their combination of 'black blood' and 'Latino blood.' … 'We are looking into the security of the governor's office computer system,' said Fran Clader, a spokeswoman for the Highway Patrol, which is in charge of policing state facilities." Clader "would not provide details of the investigation, but a person associated with the governor said that three times over the last week of August and the first week of September a person or group of people gained access to the governor's staff computers from outside the Sacramento offices. The person spoke on the condition of anonymity because the matter could become the subject of a criminal investigation."

Arizona Man Charged In Rape Case Linked To Phoenix Killings. The AP (9/12, Kahn) reports from Phoenix, AZ, "An ex-convict and construction worker was charged with 17 felony counts Monday in two sexual assaults linked to an investigation of a string of serial killings." The AP continues, "Maricopa County Attorney Andrew P. Thomas said that authorities are not calling Goudeau the 'Baseline Killer' and that he has not been named as a suspect in 22 other robberies, rapes and shootings that left eight people dead since August 2005. … For more than a year, a predator known as the Baseline Killer has terrorized the Phoenix area with killings, rapes and robberies. Police continue to try to understand how and whether Goudeau is connected, Thomas said." The AP adds, "The case is one of two serial-predator cases in the Phoenix area in the past year. Police have arrested two men in the other, dubbed the "Serial Shooter" investigation. … At a news conference, Thomas said Arizona's parole board was 'naive and misguided' when it granted early release to Goudeau in 2004. Goudeau had eight more years to go on a prison sentence for unrelated assault charges. … Goudeau is accused of attacking two sisters, who were 21 and 23, in September 2005 while they were walking in a park at night. Defense lawyer Corwin A. Townsend said that Goudeau plans to plead not guilty to the charges. And as soon as he gets the chance, Townsend said, he will independently test the DNA evidence that authorities used to arrest Goudeau."

DOJ Joins Probe Of Drug Maker Over Pricing Allegations. The AP (9/12) reports, "The federal government is joining in a whistleblower's lawsuit in Boston alleging a drug maker inflated prices for medications and defrauded Medicare and Medicaid." The AP continues, "The Justice Department said today it is intervening in the case against Dey (DAU) Incorporated, a California-based U-S affiliate of the German drug maker Merck." The AP adds, "The government is joining a complaint by a Florida pharmacy and provider of home drug-infusion services. Ven-a-Care also has brought complaints alleging drug makers defrauded government programs. … Officials accuse Dey of reporting prices for drugs that were more than five times the actual sales prices, costing the government more than 500 (m) million dollars in reimbursement."

United Press International/UPI (9/12) reports, "Dey LP, a California drug company, denied Monday that it engaged in wrongdoing in the pricing or marketing of its medicines. … The denials follow word from the U.S. Justice Department earlier in the day that it intervened in a whistleblower suit against Dey." UPI adds, "Justice's complaint alleges that Dey engaged in a scheme to report 'fraudulent and inflated' prices for several pharmaceutical products, knowing that federal healthcare programs established reimbursement rates based on those reported prices. … Dey's denial took aim at the method used by the government in developing its complaint. … 'When virtually an entire industry is sued -- as has been the case with the pricing lawsuits that have been filed around the country by dozens of attorneys general -- it indicates that the real issue is not the industry's conduct, but rather the government's own reimbursement system,' said John M. Kling, senior vice president-legal at Dey."

New Jersey Gets $500,000 From GlaxoSmithKline Settlement. The AP (9/12) reports, "New Jersey prosecutors say the state will get nearly $500,000 dollars from GlaxoSmithKline to settle claims it overcharged the government for two anti-nausea drugs." The AP continues, "New Jersey was reimbursed more than $472,000 from a $149-million national settlement with the Justice Department. … The government said Glaxo engaged in a scheme to inflate the price of Zofran and Kytril for the Medicare and Medicaid programs, which reimburse health care providers based on the manufacturers' prices." The AP adds, "The drugs are typically administered in doctors' offices or hospitals and are mainly used to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation. .. The Justice Department claims the company charged health care providers less for the drugs, knowing the providers would get to pocket the difference, and would be more likely to prescribe them again."

USA Today Doubts Big Tobacco's Reform Pledges. USA Today (9/12) editorializes, "Tobacco companies have spent years trying to look as if they've reformed their old deceptive ways. … But in just the past month, new information has come to light that strongly suggests they are still willing to sacrifice smokers' lives for profits:" USA continues, "On Aug. 17, a federal judge found that cigarette-makers marketed and sold their lethal products by deceiving the public about the risks of smoking for five decades. The duplicity and manipulation, she wrote, 'continues to this day.' … Two weeks later, the industry returned to court brazenly seeking a loophole that would allow it to continue the deception overseas. … On Aug. 29, Massachusetts health officials reported that the average nicotine delivery in scores of cigarette brands had increased by an average of 10% during seven years ending in 2004. Nicotine is the chemical that hooks smokers and keeps them hooked." USA adds, "These findings and the industry's own actions suggest that its recent show of good corporate citizenship is as ephemeral as a puff of smoke. They might also prove expensive. … Sadly, the public doesn't know what the industry is doing with nicotine or any ingredient. Thanks to industry lobbying and campaign contributions, there is no meaningful regulation. Never mind that tobacco kills 400,000 Americans a year. Until Congress gets serious about regulating cigarettes, Big Tobacco will have the last word."

Philip Morris Official Disputes Nicotine Findings. In an op-ed for USA Today (9/12), Michael A. Farriss, senior vice president of communications and government affairs for Philip Morris USA, writes, "The Massachusetts Department of Public Health recently issued a report based on data from 1998 to 2004 that concluded 'the amount of nicotine that is actually delivered to the smoker's lungs has increased significantly.' The MDPH report cites Philip Morris USA and its Marlboro brand. … The principal reason the MDPH report seems to show an upward trend for Marlboro is because it did not include the earliest reported data from 1997 and the most recent reported data from November 2005. We believe that when one looks at the Marlboro data from all the years reported to the MDPH (1997 through 2005), there are variations in nicotine yields, both up and down, in different brand packings, but there is no trend in nicotine yields, up or down." Farriss adds, "We do not believe that the MDPH's conclusions about the trends in nicotine yields for Marlboro are supported by the 1997 through 2005 data. Even so, there are some fundamental conclusions that Philip Morris USA and the MDPH seem to share: Cigarette smoking is addictive, cigarette smoking causes disease and death, and comprehensive federal Food and Drug Administration regulation of the tobacco industry would be good public health policy."

EEOC Seeks To Compel Testimony In Sidley Austin Age Bias Suit. The New York Law Journal (9/12, Lin) reports, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has moved to compel testimony about recent conversations between Sidley Austin partners and a former financial director who signed a 1999 letter stating that the firm had a mandatory retirement policy." The Journal continues, "Sidley has denied having such a policy in the face of an EEOC suit claiming the Chicago-based law firm discriminated against 31 partners on the basis of age when it demoted them to counsel in 1999. The EEOC has claimed the financial director's letter 'flatly contradicts' the firm's position." The Journal adds, "The letter, dated Oct. 21, 1999, and addressed to the Social Security Administration in Chicago, states that 'it is the general policy of Sidley & Austin not to permit a partner of the firm to continue as a partner commencing the first of the year following the year age 65 is reached.' The letter is signed by William B. White, financial director." The Journal notes, "According to the EEOC motion filed last Tuesday in Chicago federal court, White testified at a July 26 deposition that he believed the letter to be an accurate statement of the firm's retirement policy at the time he signed it. But he also testified that, after conversations earlier this year with Sidley partners William F. Conlon and Theodore N. Miller, he realized the letter did not accurately state firm policy. … The lawyer representing Sidley at the deposition, Michael Conway of Chicago's Grippo & Elden, objected to questions about these conversations on the grounds that they were privileged. The EEOC is seeking to compel White's testimony about them."

9th Circuit Upholds Contempt Charge Over Videotaped Protest. The AP (9/12, Kravets) reports, "A federal appeals court on Monday upheld the contempt of court citation against a freelance journalist who is refusing to cooperate with a grand jury investigating an anarchists' protest he videotaped." The AP continues, "A federal grand jury subpoenaed Joshua Wolf to acquire the 30 minutes of unpublished material, but he refused and was ordered jailed Aug. 1. He was released a month later as he appealed his case. … The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Monday that a 1972 Supreme Court precedent requires everyone, including journalists, to appear before grand juries if they have been summoned. … 'The Supreme Court has declined to interpret the First Amendment to "grant newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy,"' a three-judge panel of the San Francisco-based appeals court wrote." The AP adds, "Wolf, 24, videotaped a July 2005 protest where anarchists allegedly vandalized a San Francisco police car and an officer suffered a fractured skull after being hit. The anarchists were protesting a G-8 international economic conference in Scotland. … Wolf sold some of the footage to San Francisco television stations and posted it on his Web site, but refused to turn over unpublished material. U.S. District Judge William Alsup found him in contempt of court and ordered him jailed."

The New York Times (9/12, McKinley) reports, "At the protest, timed to coincide with the Group of Eight Summit of world economic leaders in Scotland, a police officer was injured and an explosive device, a smoke bomb or a firework, was put under a police car. … Mr. Wolf sold some of his film to local television stations and posted parts on his Web site, www.joshwolf.net. Earlier this year, the government subpoenaed Mr. Wolf to testify and to turn over the remaining video, which prosecutors wanted to use to gather evidence for potential arson charges. Mr. Wolf has refused, and in an interview on Monday, he remained defiant. 'Nothing the government can do,' he said, 'will coerce me into submitting to their demands. I intend to appeal this through every measure possible.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Wolf remained free on Monday, and it was not clear if the decision would result in his returning to jail immediately. His lawyer, Jose Luis Fuentes, said he would ask for a rehearing before the entire court. … Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of California, said his office was awaiting an order from the Ninth Circuit 'clarifying Mr. Wolf's custodial status.'"

Parties To Tennessee College Desegregation Case Call For Dismissal. The New York Times (9/12, Emery) reports, "In 1966, a young black woman named Rita Sanders, fresh out of graduate school, took a job teaching at a traditionally black college" in Nashville. In 1968, she sued the state for "maintaining an inferior system of higher education for blacks." Monday, Rita Sanders Geier, "stood alongside Gov. Phil Bredesen of Tennessee on Monday to announce that the state had met its obligations to desegregate higher education and that she, along with the other plaintiffs and parties, would ask a judge to dismiss the lawsuit." That "signified the conclusion of a significant civil rights case that sought to erase vestiges of segregation." All parties to the case entered mediation six years ago, "and a year later they hammered out an agreement that would result in the dismissal of the lawsuit after five years, if all the conditions were met. On Monday, the parties said the conditions had been met, including appropriating $15.5 million for the Tennessee State endowment, $19.8 million in capital outlays and almost $15 million in financial aid. All told, the state has spent $77 million since 2001 to increase equality and diversity at state colleges and universities."

Nebraska Law Dividing Omaha District Into Three Defended For Giving Minorities Greater Say. DeWayne Wickham writes in his column for USA Today (9/12) Nebraska state Sen. Ernie Chambers "never made it to the Congressional Black Caucus' annual legislative conference last week, but he was the elephant in the room when some of the attendees got together to talk about this nation's racial divide." Chambers is "the only black member of Nebraska's state senate" and "co-author of a law that divides Omaha's public school system into three smaller districts -- one mostly black, another largely white and the other predominately Hispanic." Chambers said that "his law will give black and Hispanic parents more control over the schools their children attend. More control, he believes, will translate into greater academic achievement." Wickham concludes, "In 1935, W.E.B. DuBois, the black sociologist and civil rights activist, wrote that 'the Negro needs neither segregated schools nor mixed schools. What he needs is (a good) Education.' Chambers thinks DuBois is right -- and so do I."

Parties Feud Over Voter ID Laws. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Wallsten, 918K) reports that a nationwide fight has erupted between liberal and conservative groups over "new laws that could determine who wins close elections in November and beyond." The dispute "concerns new state laws and rules backed primarily by Republicans that require people to show photo identification in order to vote and, in some cases, proof of citizenship and identification when registering to vote. … The legal battle reflects a deep partisan divide, with Republicans arguing that the new requirements are needed to prevent voting fraud and boost confidence in election results, and Democrats charging that they disenfranchise seniors, minorities, students and others who tend to vote Democratic."

Pentagon Hopes Improved Web Site Will Help Overseas Americans Vote. The Washington Post/AP (9/12, A21) reports, "The Pentagon is counting on an improved Web site to help an estimated 6.5 million Americans -- including US troops at war and others living overseas -- vote in the November elections, and to avoid the problems of the 2000 presidential election." According to officials, the site "now includes information on how voters can request and get ballots by fax and e-mail rather than rely on slower postal service. The Defense Department is responsible for the balloting process not only for troops but for all expatriate voters. The potential voters include all 1.4 million active-duty service members in the United States and abroad, about 1.4 million of their family members, and 3.7 million other Americans living outside the country, said Polli Brunelli, director of the voting assistance program. The total includes about 225,000 troops deployed in Iraq, in Afghanistan and elsewhere around the world."

Monitor Urges Dismissal Of Bristol-Myers CEO. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Carreyrou, Martinez) reports, "Directors at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. head into a board meeting today facing heavy pressure to fire Chief Executive Officer Peter R. Dolan and the drug maker's general counsel after a federal monitor overseeing the New York company urged their dismissal last night." The Journal continues, "The board, which already was expected to discuss Mr. Dolan's fate at its meeting today after the latest in a long string of missteps, has little choice but to accept the monitor's recommendation. Bristol-Myers is operating under the terms of a deferred-prosecution agreement reached with the U.S. Attorney in New Jersey last year following a three-year investigation into a $2.5 billion scandal at the company involving 'channel stuffing,' or overloading wholesalers with inventory to meet quarterly sales targets. If the board refuses to fire Mr. Dolan, the company could face charges in connection with the probe." The Journal adds, "The Bristol-Myers monitor, former federal Judge Frederick B. Lacey, recommended to a special session of the company's board late yesterday that it terminate Mr. Dolan and Bristol-Myers General Counsel Richard Willard, according to a person familiar with the matter. The meeting was attended by the U.S. Attorney for New Jersey, Christopher Christie, who appointed Mr. Lacey last year in the settlement agreement."

The New York Times (9/12, Saul) reports, "The board appears bound to abide by the recommendation from Frederick B. Lacey, a former federal judge. Mr. Lacey is monitoring the company's behavior under the terms of an agreement the company reached with the federal government last year in hopes of avoiding criminal prosecution for an accounting scandal." The Times continues, "The only reprieve for Mr. Dolan could be granted by Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney in New Jersey who is the prosecutor in that case. He has the power to overturn Mr. Lacey's recommendation. But it appeared that Mr. Christie, who was present for Mr. Lacey's meeting last night with most of the company's 11 directors, supported the recommendation to remove Mr. Dolan, according to the participant."

Market Watch (9/12, Marketwatch) reports, "In June 2005, Bristol-Myers reached a settlement with the Justice Department for $300 million to end a long-running government investigation into its accounting. At that time, the company conceded that it had engaged in questionable practices, inflating sales by $2.5 billion and net earnings by $900 million between 1999 and 2001."

EU Takes Over German Antitrust Probe Of Intel. The Financial Times (9/12, Buck) reports, "European regulators have expanded their antitrust probe against Intel to include charges that the world's largest chipmaker tried to prevent retailers from offering computers powered by rival microprocessors." The Times continues, "The European Commission, which has been investigating Intel's business practices for more than five years, said yesterday it had taken over a probe that was started by Germany's Federal Cartel Office this year. … The investigation centres on allegations that Intel attempted to hurt Advanced Micro Devices, its rival, by cutting off the company's access to the Media Markt and Saturn retail outlets. Owned by Metro, the German retail group, the chains are Europe's biggest computer retailers."

CNET News (9/12, Kawamoto) reports, "Germany's antitrust agency, Bundeskartellamt, received a complaint from AMD alleging that Intel had abused its dominant market position by putting pressure on major electronics retailer Media Markt to not sell AMD's chips. Because the Commission found similarities with its existing probe into Intel, it took over the German investigation in late August, Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said." CNET adds, "Intel will cooperate with the EU investigation, as it has done over the past five years, said Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy, who added that the company believes its actions are 'fair and lawful.'" CNET notes, "Last year, the Commission raided several European Intel offices as well as offices of companies that manufacture or sell computers. … Other countries have weighed in with their own investigations into Intel's business practices. Earlier this year, the Korean Fair Trade Commission sought more documents from Intel relating to its antitrust investigation into the chip giant."

The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Jacoby, Echikson) reports, "If regulators decide Intel broke European antitrust rules, the commission would issue a 'statement of objections' outlining its specific concerns. Recent success in the marketplace by AMD prompted the commission's top antitrust civil servant, Philip Lowe to suggest the case had lost some urgency. … Yesterday, commission spokesman Mr. Todd said AMD's recent increased sales didn't augur an end to the probe. AMD spokesman Jens Drews said he believed regulators would disregard AMD's recent market gains and focus on whether Intel had used illegal anticompetitive practices."

Battle Over Software Patents Heads To European Courtrooms. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Jacoby) reports, "A proposal here to create a new European patents court has the support of Microsoft Corp., Siemens AG and many other giants of Western industry. But can it survive an attack from Hartmut Pilch? … A 43-year-old linguist from Munich, Mr. Pilch speaks Chinese, Japanese and an artificial language called Lojban intended to eliminate ambiguity and promoted by some programmers. He is the unlikely leader of a movement of self-styled computer geeks out to sink a patents plan they say would stifle software programmers. … 'Patents on software mean any programmer can be sued at any time,' says Mr. Pilch, a simultaneous translator who writes computer programs for his own use in his leisure time." The Journal continues, "In July last year, heeding appeals posted on the Web site of Mr. Pilch's lobbying group, about 200 programmers descended on the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France, waving signs demanding the right to freely exchange computer code. … The Parliament was poised to approve a law extending American-style software patents to Europe, the most lucrative consumer market outside the U.S. … A panicky Parliament suddenly backed off a law the industry giants had spent several years and millions of euros lobbying to enact. … The surprise winners: U.S. software companies Red Hat Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc., the only large companies that had taken public stands against the software patents law. … Today, the battle has shifted to an effort to create a special patents court that would handle appeals cases from all over Europe. Companies like Microsoft support the idea in large part because many national courts currently reject software patents, bucking rulings by the European-wide patent office."

Industries Seek Share Of Ticket Reseller's Take. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Smith, Silver) reports, "Reselling sports and concert tickets online has become a multibillion-dollar business for eBay Inc., StubHub Inc. and other middlemen. Now the concert and sports industry -- and Ticketmaster, which sells the majority of seats -- are fighting to take back some of that money." The Journal continues, "A division of Barry Diller's IAC/InterActiveCorp, Ticketmaster is overhauling the way it sells tickets, embracing new methods that it long shunned. It is now running auctions to sell seats for roughly 30% of this year's major music tours -- including Pink Floyd's Roger Waters, Barbra Streisand, Madonna, B.B. King and Melissa Etheridge. Ticketmaster also is letting customers resell some seats at its Web site. Since that lets fans sell tickets far above face value, Ticketmaster has joined the fight against state antiscalping laws, reversing its earlier position." The Journal adds, "Concert promoters, performers and sports teams stand to win if the new methods at Ticketmaster reduce scalper sales -- and return some of the proceeds to their own coffers. … Ticketmaster, which for 15 years has held a near-monopoly over the market for ticketing major live events, is battling competition from online rivals that can easily resell tickets at whatever price the market will bear. The result is a marketplace in the throes of upheaval, confronting a pricing system that everyone agrees is dysfunctional."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Manure-To-Power Venture Spawns Fraud Suits. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Pugmire, Heisel) reports, "As he sold investors on an improbable plan for turning...cow manure into electricity, W. Patrick Moriarty...promised cutting-edge technology, a respected engineering firm and tax-exempt financing to extract methane gas from mountains of manure and use it to generate enough power to light a small city." What Moriarty and his business partner didn't tell investors, who put up more than $10 million, "was that their company, Chino Organic Power Inc., had no licensed technology, no equipment, no permits — not even a guaranteed supply of manure. Although manure-to-electricity plants have been used on a small scale to turn water-polluting cow waste into power, they are not particularly cost-effective and have never produced close to the amount of electricity Moriarty envisioned, documents and interviews show." The Times says, "the lofty energy plan has come crashing down, followed by a bankruptcy and accusations from angry investors, a number of whom have filed lawsuits alleging fraud ... ." However, Moriarty "said last week that he intended to keep fighting to build some version of a manure-based power plant in California."

Tribes Ask Senate To Block Jonker Nomination. The AP (9/12) reports, "Seven American Indian tribes in Michigan are asking federal lawmakers to block the judicial nomination of a lawyer who has represented groups opposed to the expansion of casino gambling." In letters to Democratic Senators Debbie Stabenow and Carl Levin, the tribes "wrote that Robert Jonker's work indicates a bias against Indian tribes and raises questions about his fitness to serve as a federal district judge." Jonker "was nominated in June for a vacancy on the U-S District Court for Michigan's Western District. His hearing before a Senate panel has not yet been scheduled."

Los Angeles Mob Figure Gets More Than 10 Years For Racketeering. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Mozingo) reports Hai Waknine, "an Israeli-born mob figure known for holding court at the hippest of Westside clubs" in Los Angeles, was sentenced to "more than 10 years in prison for racketeering." In June, Waknine pleaded guilty during "to using extortion and threats of violence to help an Israeli crime group launder nearly $2 million in embezzled funds. The case against Waknine stemmed from ongoing federal probes into Israeli rings that traffic the club drug Ecstasy and launder the proceeds. Several of Waknine's associates have been convicted of Ecstasy trafficking. Waknine and his older brother Assaf, who grew up in Van Nuys, have been on the Los Angeles Police Department's radar since they were teenagers."

Houston-Louisiana Cocaine Ring Busted. The New Orleans Times Picayune (9/8) reported, "Nine men -- including four from Metairie, two from LaPlace and one each from Kenner and Destrehan -- have been indicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine powder and crack cocaine, the U.S. attorney's office said Thursday. Among those charged in the Aug. 31 federal grand jury indictment, which was unsealed this week, was Henry Gloston, 25, of Houston, who is accused of running kilogram-size shipments of the drugs from Houston to William Lang, 32, also known as 'Tussy' or 'Hood,' of Metairie, one of the local defendants." US Attorney Jim Letten said Lang "would sell the cocaine powder and crack to other defendants for distribution in Metairie and nearby." DEA agent William Renton, said the investigation "has dismantled 'a significant cocaine distribution organization, from wholesale and street level distributors operating in Metairie and Kenner to the Houston, Texas, source of supply.' As part of the investigation, Jefferson Parish sheriff's deputies made undercover drug purchases from an additional 24 people, resulting in state warrants for related drug-trafficking crimes, the U.S. attorney's office said. Twenty-two of the 33 defendants were arrested in a roundup early Thursday morning, the U.S. attorney's office said. It is unclear how many of the 22 were among the nine indicted on federal charges."

Tennessee Marijuana Runner Pleads Guilty. The Knoxville News Sentinel (9/12, Satterfield) reports "businessman-turned-convicted pot peddler" Scott West "faces as much as nine years behind bars when sentenced later this year." He pleaded guilty Monday "to charges he conspired with his older brother, James Michael West, and others to push more than a ton of marijuana along a pipeline that ran from Arizona to Tennessee, Georgia and North Carolina. He also admitted pumping millions of his brother's drug money into his Market Square ventures, using the dirty cash to buy several buildings on Market Square and launch businesses such as the Preservation Pub, Oodles Uncorked and World Grotto." West's wife Bernadette Trent West also "entered a guilty plea to conspiring to launder drug money. As a result of a plea negotiated by her defense attorney, David Eldridge, she faces a penalty range of 46 to 57 months."

Sentences Handed Down In San Diego Marijuana Cases. The AP (9/11) reports prison sentences were handed down for two San Diego-area defendants "convicted in unrelated cases involving marijuana cultivation, federal prosecutors announced Monday." Daniel Barton of Carlsbad, "who managed a substantial marijuana 'grow' operation at a residence in Valley Center, was sentenced to 37 months behind bars," while Christopher DeMatteis "was sentenced to 30 months in federal prison after pleading guilty to a conspiracy charge involving 555 marijuana plants. He admitted that he was the caretaker and operator of a substantial marijuana 'grow' operation in Oceanside, which was owned by his brother and co-defendant, Eric DeMatteis, who also pleaded guilty."

Ex-Armstrong Teammates Admit Doping During 1999 Tour De France. The New York Times (9/12, Macur) reports, "Two of Lance Armstrong's eight teammates from the 1999 Tour de France have admitted for the first time that they used the banned endurance-boosting drug EPO in preparing for the race that year, when they helped Armstrong capture the first of his record seven titles." The disclosures by Frankie Andreu and another anonymous team member "are rare examples of candor in a sport protected by a powerful code of silence. The confessions come as cycling is reeling from doping scandals, including Floyd Landis's fall in July from Tour champion to suspected cheat." Andreu said that he took EPO "for only a few races and that he was acknowledging his use now because he thought doping was damaging his sport. Continued doping and denial by riders may scare away fans and sponsors for good, he said." The other rider said, "The environment was certainly one of, to be accepted, you had to use doping products. There was very high pressure to be one of the cool kids." Neither rider "ever tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs, but both said they felt as if they had to take EPO to make the Tour team in 1999."

Salinas, CA, Seen As Site Of Organized Gun Trafficking. The Monterey (CA) Herald (9/12, Reynolds, Sánchez) reports, "For years, Salinas police have said that most of the guns used in local crimes in the city were stolen individually during residential burglaries. Police reports indicate that there have been no significant robberies of local gun stores, and most firearms acquired in the city are bought legally. … But over the last 20 years, the city has also had several notable episodes of organized gun trafficking, as the following cases show." The Herald continues, "One unexpected source of cheap handguns was the Santa Ana Police Department. In the 1990s, it was not uncommon for police departments to sell confiscated weapons to gun dealers. In 1993, an Assembly analysis found that most of the weapons sold were the type used for hunting or collection value and were not cheap 'Saturday Night Specials.' … But one exception was a sale by the Santa Ana Police Department through a Modesto broker of 25 small pistols to Justin Davis, proprietor of the now-defunct JKD Shooting Sports in Salinas for $30 each. Davis told a reporter he bought the .25-caliber pistols because a factory had temporarily stopped making them. … 'The police are just partners in the recirculating of these weapons onto the streets of California after these weapons have been taken away,' then-Sen. Tom Hayden, D-Santa Monica, complained at the time." The Herald adds, "Some of the weapons were used in bank robberies, convenience store holdups and shootings, an agent at the San Jose office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, told the San Jose Mercury News."

IMMIGRATION:

Putnam To Participate In Rally Urging Comprehensive Immigration Reform. CQ (9/11, Sandler) reported, "Rep. Adam H. Putnam was tasked last week with assembling a tough border security package that House Republicans hope will provide their party a boost leading up to Election Day. The Florida Republican will serve the 'security first' approach favored by his caucus, organizing a policy forum Tuesday that will generate ideas he will turn into legislative proposals designed to put political pressure on those who favor a broader Senate immigration bill. But on Wednesday, Putnam will share a platform with some of the very people his House leadership is looking to squeeze: supporters of the other chamber's version of an immigration overhaul. Putnam has accepted an invitation to join a coalition of business interests and Sen. Larry E. Craig, R-Idaho, at a rally outside the Capitol urging passage of the Senate's 'comprehensive' immigration bill this year. The groups Putnam will stand with Wednesday want a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants now in the country — positions that most of Putnam's GOP House colleagues oppose."

Morris, McGann Say GOP Punted On Immigration Reform. Dick Morris and Eileen McGann write in The Hill (9/12), "The decision by the Republican leadership not even to try to pass immigration reform before the election smacks of punting when they should have gone for a touchdown. America is begging for tough immigration reform and looking to the Republican Party to exercise its traditional role of leadership in law and order issues. But even without a real threat of a Democratic filibuster, the Republican Party has tripped over its own feet and given up its attempt to meet the needs of the country and of its constituents." Republican voters "are not likely to forgive GOP ineptitude and failure. With a 30-vote margin in the House and 10 in the Senate, they will find the lack of action inexplicable. … Whether or not the Republicans keep control of Congress in the 2006 election, their numbers will be reduced. The chances of a good immigration reform bill will decline proportionally."

Schwarzenegger Urges Civil Debate On Immigration Reform. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger writes in the Los Angeles Times (9/12, 918K), "By not finishing comprehensive immigration reform this year, Congress left behind a poisoned debate that will continue to fuel a growing anger in our country. … So it's up to the rest of us to tone down our rhetoric and listen to the voices on all sides." Schwarzenegger adds, "Unfortunately, we must wait for Congress to return next year to take up the critical issue of comprehensive immigration reform. Meanwhile, we must do all we can to stop the problem from getting worse and to maintain a civil debate about illegal immigration."

Analysts Watching Arizona Primary To See How Immigration Resonates With Voters. Arizona's primary election today coincides with the House's final field hearing on immigration. The Hill (9/12, Sherman) reports that "political analysts are watching the elections closely to see how immigration resonates with voters. In Arizona's open 8th congressional district, conservative GOP candidate Randy Graf and moderate Steve Huffman are squaring off to replace outgoing Rep. Jim Kolbe. Graf press secretary R.T. Gregg said House Republicans' immigration hearings over the August recess have helped focus attention on an important issue for the district."

TAX:

Glaxo Settles IRS Suit For $3.4 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Matthews, Whalen) reports GlaxoSmithKline PLC will pay the US "$3.4 billion to settle a nearly two-decade-long dispute over how to tax dealings between the British company and its American subsidiary, in a case that underscores" the IRS's "resolve to confront corporate tax avoidance." The settlement "covers taxes…Glaxo owed for 1989 through 2005 because the company's American unit improperly overpaid its British parent for drugs." It said "those overpayments reduced the company's profit in the U.S., thus lowering its U.S. tax bill."

The AP (9/12, Dalrymple) reports, "The disagreement concerned how much of the profits from certain drugs, particularly the ulcer and heartburn medication Zantac, should be attributed to U.S. subsidiaries of GlaxoSmithKline PLC and, therefore, subject to tax." The AP continues, "As part of the settlement, Glaxo abandoned its claim for a $1.8 billion tax refund. Glaxo spokeswoman Patty Seif said the IRS had rejected the company's refund claim and held that Glaxo owed $8.3 billion for taxes due from 1989 through 2000. … That case had been scheduled for trial at the U.S. Tax Court in February." The AP adds, "The IRS has been looking more closely at multinational tax practices and the complex transactions that cross borders in the globalized economy. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson this summer told a Senate committee investigating offshore tax abuses that the complexities of globalization and cross-border transactions 'create opportunities for aggressive tax planning.' … IRS Chief Counsel Donald Korb said Monday that a 'key focus' for tax collectors is transfer pricing, the issue involved in the Glaxo dispute, as one area where some multinational companies could take advantage of the global economy to move some profits to a country with lower or no taxes."

Former Tyco Tax Official Charged With Filing False Return. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Levitz) reports, "The former top tax official at Tyco International Ltd. was charged with filing a false tax return for the company that failed to report more than $170 million in income." The Journal continues, "Raymond Scott Stevenson, who was vice president in charge of taxation at the manufacturing-and-services conglomerate until 2003, pleaded not guilty before a federal magistrate in Fort Pierce, Fla., to a felony fraud charge. He was released on $100,000 bail." The Journal adds, "According to the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Florida, Mr. Stevenson, of Delray Beach, Fla., directed a 'series of transactions' designed to reduce Tyco's state tax liability, and in doing so triggered $170 million in capital gains under federal tax code. The capital gains would have added about $50 million to Tyco's tax bill, said Ellie Michaud, a spokeswoman for the Internal Revenue Service's criminal division. On Tyco's 1999 corporate tax return, Mr. Stevenson 'left off' the $170 million, Ms. Michaud said. … The transaction may have been related to one of the company's acquisitions, Tyco spokeswoman Sheri Woodruff said."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pelosi Calls GOP Ethics Reform Bill "A Sham." In a letter to USA Today (9/12, 2.27M), House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi writes that there are "real differences" between Democrats' and Republicans' ethics reform plans. Democrats "voted in favor of a true reform bill, the Honest Leadership & Open Government Act, which would ban gifts and travel from lobbyists and the organizations that retain them; prohibit official travel on corporate jets; extend the ban on former members' lobbying to two years; require greater disclosure of lobbyist contacts; mandate fair and open debate in the Congress; and impose tough new standards to end waste, fraud and abuse. House Republicans, in contrast, put forward only a sham of a proposal, which USA TODAY has rightly called an 'anemic excuse' for reform." Pelosi adds that Republicans "have turned this Congress into the most corrupt and closed in history. Democrats want to take Congress in a new direction, to make it the most open and honest in history."

Democrats Say They Would Run House In Less Partisan Manner Than GOP. CQ (9/11, Kady, Ferrechio) reported that House Democrats "are suggesting that they would run the chamber in a less partisan manner. Among the changes being floated in the heat of the campaign are allowing more floor amendments from the minority, negotiating conference agreements in public and enforcing time limits on roll call votes. Many of the ideas reflect the Democrats' complaints about 12 years of Republican rule. The public discussion of detailed proposals shows the confidence with which the party so long out of power is approaching the November elections."

Navy Was Moving To Fire Controversial Chaplain. The Washington Times (9/12, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "Internal e-mails indicate that the Navy was moving to fire an outspoken chaplain even before he was charged with disobeying an order. Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, whose court-martial is scheduled to begin today in Norfolk, yesterday said the e-mails given to his defense team prove that the Navy was plotting to fire him after he had complained publicly about a commander censoring his sermons." The Times quotes an email from Vice Adm. John Harvey, "the Navy's top personnel officer," to CNO Adm. Michael Mullen. Klingenschmitt is described as "a member of a small breakaway evangelical Episcopal denomination."

Government Accounting Said To Understate Federal Deficit. In his Washington Post column (9/12, D2), Newsweek Wall Street editor Allan Sloan says, "Next month, the White House and its congressional allies will be taking victory laps when the deficit for fiscal 2006 is announced. The stated deficit for the year, which ends Sept. 30, will be $260 billion or so. That will be down $58 billion from 2005 and a whopping $77 billion below what the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted in January. The White House says this is happening largely because tax revenues have surged, which they have. It sure sounds great." But the "dirty little secret" is that the "real federal deficit isn't $260 billion. It's more than double that. And when you calculate what I consider the real deficit -- hold on to your hats, it's $558 billion -- you come out with slightly more than last year's real deficit, which I put at $551 billion." The "stated deficit is the difference between the cash the government takes in and the cash it spends. That's $260 billion, the number most analysts use to measure the deficit." But the government will also "borrow almost $300 billion from federal trust funds: $177 billion from Social Security and $121 billion more from 'other government accounts,' such as federal-employee pension funds."

WSJournal Says Congress Should Enact Tort Reform. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) editorializes, "Cornerstone Research released a study this summer showing a huge drop in securities class-action suits, and a common explanation has been that this is a result of new rules designed to keep the corporate community on the straight and narrow: No wrongdoing, no need for lawyers. … Lawsuits are certainly down, but a closer inspection of the numbers shows that the drop-off directly correlates with the decline in filing by one law firm: Milberg Weiss. Long the nation's premier class-action generator, the entire firm and two partners were indicted in May of paying off their class-action plaintiffs." The Journal adds, "The numbers should also provide all the evidence Congress needs to conclude that the only real way to rein in America's runaway legal system is with tort reform that allows redress of genuine wrongs but limits the ability of lawyers to game the system. Milberg Weiss may be in the dock, but it's only a matter of time before other firms take up the slack."

Economists Predict Inflation Will Rise Even As Growth Slows. USA Today (9/12, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "Inflation will rise faster than previously thought through the end of the year while economic growth will be slower, a group of prominent economists said Monday, painting an especially hazy outlook." The National Association for Business Economics "said inflation expectations rose significantly in its survey of 50 members conducted in August from its last poll released four months ago. Instead of expecting so-called core inflation, which excludes often-volatile food and energy costs, to rise 2.3% in the second half of 2006, the economists' median forecast is for the index to rise 2.9% in the third quarter and 2.7% in the fourth quarter." At the same time, the group "lowered its forecast for economic growth and job creation through the middle of next year."

The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Blackstone, 2.03M) reports the group also said "an outright recession is unlikely." Gross domestic product "is projected by the 50 forecasters surveyed by NABE to expand 2.6% in the second half of 2006. For 2007, the NABE panel cut its forecast to 2.8% from the 3% rate it expected when last surveyed in May. The latest survey was conducted between Aug. 9 and 24." Productivity "will be less of a factor in limiting price pressures than it has been in the past, according to NABE. Survey respondents cut their 2006 productivity growth forecast to 2.2% from the 2.5% forecast in the May survey. Productivity next year is expected to rise just 2.1%. Meanwhile, unit labor costs are expected to climb 2.7% this year and 2.3% next year, up from the 1.9% rate expected for both years in the May NABE survey."

Trade Report Expected To Contain Good News. Under the headline "Trade Picture Brightens," the Wall Street Journal (9/12, Lahart, 2.03M) reports, "Today's trade report will probably show a whopper of a deficit for July, something that always gives investors a fright about holding U.S. dollar assets. But dig a little deeper, and it looks like a shift in the nation's trade is happening." Economists "polled by Dow Jones Newswires are looking for a July trade deficit of $65.5 billion, up from June's $64.8 billion and prospectively the third largest monthly deficit ever." Oil prices "have dropped sharply since July, which could bring the import figure back down. Meanwhile, away from oil, imports were already looking subdued in July. … Even as imports slow, continued growth in Asia should keep US exports strong, says Investment Technology Group economist Robert Barbera. Those exports will help boost economic growth, a plus at a time when other engines of growth seem to be slowing." The Journal adds, "Taken together, it spells a better trade picture in the months ahead, a silver lining for investors who worry about financing the mammoth trade shortfall. The dark cloud is that weary US consumers might be behind much of it."

Data On Unsold Homes Adds To Evidence Of Slowing Housing Market. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Hagerty, 2.03M) reports, "A continued rise in inventories of unsold homes in August is likely to put more downward pressure on home prices in parts of the US." Inventories of homes in 18 large metropolitan areas across the country "expanded by 4.7% in August from a month earlier, according to data compiled by ZipRealty Inc., a real-estate brokerage firm based in Emeryville, Calif. The data are based on single-family homes and condos included in local multiple-listing services of homes for sale."

Stocks Rise Slightly. NBC Nightly News (9/11, story 9, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The stock market also was up today. The Dow was up almost 5 points [to close at 11,396.84]. The Nasdaq gained 7 points [to close at 2,173.25]." The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Anand, 2.03M) notes the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index" rose 0.1%, or 0.62 point, to 1299.54."

Gasoline Prices Fall To Lowest Levels In Five Months. USA Today (9/12, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "Gasoline prices continue to tumble, almost free-falling toward levels not seen in five months. The nationwide average for regular was $2.618 a gallon, the Energy Information Administration reported Monday. That was 10.9 cents lower than a week earlier." USA Today says, "High prices of spring and summer attracted more imported gasoline than usual, contributing to the above-average supplies that now are keeping prices down. ... Falling prices are cheering gasoline retailers as much as motorists." The "EIA plans to issue a short-term energy forecast today that will predict gasoline prices. That will suggest how low prices will go and how long they will stay there."

OPEC Leaves Production Target Unchanged, But Sets Stage To Cut Output. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, A2, Levine, Bahree, 2.03M) reports OPEC "decided to let its production fluctuate rather than adhere to its formal quotas, allowing the cartel to curb output quietly should oil prices continue their recent swoon. As expected, the cartel didn't change its official oil-production target of 28 million barrels a day. More important, though, OPEC has effectively agreed to ignore those quotas for now." The Journal says, "Senior OPEC officials said oil marketers from member countries would base their sales of crude on demand from customers. The cartel will seek to avoid pushing more oil than needed by markets -- implying it would seek to avoid discounting, a necessary step to shore up prices should demand weaken." OPEC's "next gathering is scheduled for December, but the new understanding would allow members to trim output without a formal meeting."

The Washington Post (9/12, D7, Mufson, 748K) reports, "Crude oil prices continued their downward march yesterday as [OPEC] left its production targets unchanged and as Europe's foreign policy chief raised hopes of a peaceful resolution to the standoff over Iran's nuclear program." OPEC "says that it fears high prices will drive consumers to alternative energy sources or non-OPEC oil, and its president, Nigerian oil minister Edmund Maduabebe Daukoru, said yesterday that OPEC was pleased to see prices drop from their peak levels. But the ministers talked mostly of 'downside risks' to prices and asserted that they might move to trim output later in the year if prices continued to slump."

The Financial Times (9/12, Morrison, Hoyos) reports, "members of the cartel signalled they might reduce output later this year to limit any further fall in world oil prices." OPEC "ministers agreed to keep the cartel's official production at 28m barrels a day, even though the 10 members that abide by quotas are producing 500,000 b/d less. With the cartel producing below official limits, analysts said Opec may cut at its next meeting in Nigeria in December."

Blogosphere Increasingly Serves Government Oversight Role. USA Today (9/12, Wolf, 2.27M) reports on a recent trend in government oversight in which more light "is being thrown on Congress, not just by the media and public interest groups, but in the 'blogosphere' where Internet users meet." The blogosphere's involvement "is getting action: House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, has promised a vote this week on a rules change that would ensure the sponsors of individual projects are identified. And Republicans in the House and Senate say they will approve the national database this year." USA notes, "Advances in technology and communication now make it easier for average citizens to be researchers, reporters and muckrakers. The model for many watchdog groups is the Center for Responsive Politics, whose website, opensecrets.org, puts information about lobbying and campaign finance into accessible formats for Internet users."

LA Plans To Honor Prominent Muslim Generate Controversy. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Watanabe) reports that in a "public hearing spiced with accusations of Jew-hating and Muslim-bashing, nearly four dozen religious, ethnic and civil rights activists spoke out Monday on whether a prominent Los Angeles Muslim should be disqualified from receiving a prestigious humanitarian award because he has expressed some views critical of Israel." Maher Hathout, "chairman of the Islamic Center of Southern California, is the first Muslim chosen for the award from the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission. But some Jewish groups have vehemently objected to the selection, calling Hathout an extremist masquerading as a moderate, and are urging the commission to rescind the award before it is presented next month." Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles President John R. Fischel "told commissioners that Hathout's 'false and controversial' statements about Israel — that it is an apartheid state, for instance — had offended and angered many Jews." But Hathout's "supporters Monday were more diverse and outnumbered opponents 2 to 1."

Mehlman Says $47 Million Cash-Edge, GOTV Will Allow GOP To Keep Congress. Roll Call (9/12, Kane) reports, "Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman predicted Monday that the GOP would maintain its control of both Congressional chambers, using a $47 million across-the-board financial edge and a finely honed voter turnout program to overcome historical trends and public resistance to the Iraq War." Mehlman "refuted pundits' suggestions that this year's midterms would be a purely nationalized campaign on issues breaking against Republicans, arguing instead that the elections would be characterized by larger national issues transposed onto a localized, race-by-race battlefield." Mehlman "said it would be 'a dereliction of your duty' for his committee not to run a television air war attacking Democratic candidates for the votes taken by their party leaders, indicating his intention to highlight how a Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and her ranking-members-turned-chairmen would run the House."

Data On Contributions Suggests Republicans In Defensive Mode. USA Today (9/12, Lawrence, Locker, 2.27M) reports, "Top House Republicans are using almost all their campaign contributions to hold on to their 15-seat majority, federal records show, while Democratic House leaders are pouring money into campaigns to capture Republican seats." USA Today "examined contributions by leadership committees run by House Speaker Dennis Hastert, House Majority Leader John Boehner and House campaign chief Tom Reynolds, all Republicans, and their Democratic counterparts: House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer and House campaign chief Rahm Emanuel." The three Republicans "sent 85% of their donations -- $1.9 million -- to at least 70 Republican incumbents and candidates trying to hold GOP seats. The three Democrats gave $963,000, or 64% of their money, to at least 50 Democrats seeking Republican seats." USA Today adds, "The contrasting contribution patterns underscore the extent to which Republicans are on the defensive this year. Democrats, in hot pursuit of a House majority, are finding expanding opportunities across the electoral map."

Anti-Incumbent Sentiment Said To Be Widespread. The AP (9/12) reports that a widespread anti-incumbent sentiment can be heard "up and down the Ohio River Valley as it cuts through Republican-held congressional districts in Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio -- politically pivotal House seats in an election year in which Democrats hope to end 12 years in the minority." Voters in this region and nationally "are quick to voice their frustration with the GOP-controlled Congress, and their desire for more responsive replacements for the current crop of lawmakers. It's a general disgust that may lead to firings of some politicians on Nov. 7. People already have hinted as much in Republican and Democratic primaries."

Republican Aides Prepare For Worst. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/11) reported some Republican House aides "aren't buying the Administration's confidence in keeping control of the chamber and are beginning to shop around for jobs in advance of the fall elections. Trade associations and lobbying shops are the first target, according to K Street executives and association officials." A handful of GOP aides "said that they are preparing for the worst, when a Democratic majority would take over House committees and ax one-third to two-thirds of the Republican staffers and replace them with Democrats. One insider said that communications and scheduling aides would be the first to go, and that the minority would be left with only a handful of top aides on each subcommittee as Democrats moved to use the positions to build up investigative staffs." Another aide "however, said a staff cut would have the benefit of 'trimming some old deadwood' on committees. He added that some committee staffs have begun to draw up lists of staffers likely to get the ax."

Race To Replace Sanders Could Determine House Control. The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Mehren, 918K) reports that in Vermont's US Senate contest, Bernie Sanders "boasts a commanding lead over a Republican challenger who has blanketed the state with venomous advertising. Richard Tarrant, a software magnate who has never held elective office, has poured millions of dollars into a campaign that has brought him scant 34% support, according to the state's most recent polls." As an independent, a Sanders victory "would not help Democrats or Republicans in the tight struggle for Senate control. By contrast, the contest for Sanders' congressional seat is important to both major parties. State Sen. Peter Welch is running unopposed in the Democratic primary; Maj. Gen. Martha Rainville, the former adjutant general of the Vermont National Guard, is the leading Republican candidate."

Democratic Poll Shows Welch Leading Rainville By 10 Points. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (9/11, 2.03M) reported, "A new Democratic poll obtained by The Wall Street Journal casts doubts on Republican claims that they've got a shot at capturing the Vermont House seat being vacated by liberal independent Rep. Bernie Sanders. A Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research poll shows Democrat Peter Welch leads Republican Martha Rainville by 10 points, 52% to 42%. A recently released Republican poll put the race within a closer margin."

Jefferson Faces Tough Primary. USA Today (9/12, Konigsmark, 2.27M) reports, "A bribery scandal has Congressman William Jefferson fighting for his political life following eight House terms in which he faced little opposition at election time. A dozen candidates are challenging Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who FBI agents say was found with $90,000 in bribe money in his freezer. Jefferson denies any impropriety." USA Today adds, "The Nov. 7 election is the first time Jefferson has been threatened with defeat since elected to the House in 1990." Jefferson "faces eight Democrats -- including two state representatives and a former city councilman -- three Republicans and one Libertarian."

Roll Call (9/12, Whittington) says that "as she builds support for her bid to oust" the "embattled" Jefferson, Louisiana state Rep. Karen Carter (D) "is getting help from several influential Louisiana Democrats, including former Sens. J. Bennett Johnston and John Breaux and former Rep. Chris John." Carter "is making effectiveness the central issue of her campaign, asserting that Jefferson's situation is both 'embarrassing and disappointing,' and the investigation is detracting from his Congressional work." Today "she is set to receive the endorsements of New Orleans City Council President Oliver Thomas and City Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge-Morrell."

National GOP Pushing For Chafee Win In Primary Election. The AP (9/12, Tanner) reports, "Moderate GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island faces a serious challenge Tuesday as the last big flurry of primary elections provides another test of the depth of anti-incumbent sentiment and the erosion of the political middle ground." Chafee has been "targeted by the Club for Growth, a Washington-based group that has tried, not always successfully, to force candidates to vote against taxes. The group is backing Steve Laffey, a former investment banker and mayor of Cranston, R.I." Chafee "has drawn a remarkable amount of support from national Republicans, especially for a senator who has often been at odds with the party, bucking the administration on tax cuts, civil liberties and the Iraq war. He has the distinction of being the only Republican to vote against the use of military force in Iraq." Polls "a month before the primary showed the two Republicans running even." Chafee "acknowledged that the race could hinge on turnout in heavily Democratic Rhode Island, saying a low turnout could mean his defeat. His campaign has encouraged Democrats to drop their party registration so they could vote for him."

The Financial Times (9/12, Yeager, Knight, Island) says National Republicans "are doing all they can to ensure that Mr Chafee wins his party's primary election in Rhode Island on Tuesday. If he loses to Stephen Laffey, the conservative mayor of Cranston, they fear the party has no hope of keeping the seat in November's general election, imperilling the Republicans' control of the Senate."

Meanwhile, says The Hill (9/12, Blake) reports the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) "has argued that Laffey cannot beat Whitehouse and the party has mobilized in support of Chafee, even though he has bucked them time and time again." The NRSC also "said last week that it would not support Laffey should he win the primary. Laffey said that the NRSC, the Republican National Committee and the White House have asked him to withdraw."

Analyzing the Rhode Island race, the Christian Science Monitor (9/12, Chaddock, 58K) reports, "Campaign 2006 is proving to be a scorcher for moderates of both parties, especially in the Northeast, where at least eight of the key races for control of the House and Senate will be decided. … Like fellow moderate Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D) of Connecticut, Chafee could lose the primary to a rival who's more aligned with the base." But "unlike the Connecticut primary, the Rhode Island contest is not just about Iraq or the candidate's ties to President Bush. It's about whether a politician can hold middle ground when the pull in both parties is to the extremes. It's also about contrasting candidate styles -- Chafee, low-key and reflective; Mr. Laffey, high intensity and no shades of gray -- in a state so small that one-on-ones with voters can still make a difference."

Tester Compiles Highlight Reel Of Burns Gaffes. Montana state Senate President Jon Tester, who is challenging GOP Sen. Conrad Burns, has compiled a "highlight reel" of Burns' gaffes, which has campaign will begin showing on the YouTube web site today, Roll Call (9/12, Duran) reports. Whether "he was accusing Virginia firefighters of doing a 'piss-poor job' or commenting about the 'nice little Guatemalan man' -- with uncertain immigration status -- who is doing work on his Virginia home, Burns spent most of August apologizing for his off-the-cuff remarks. Probably the most damaging incident came in late July when Burns reportedly stalked up to an elite group of firefighters from Augusta, Va., in the Billings, Mont., airport and accused them of not doing a 'goddamned thing' to put out a raging wildfire in Montana."

McCaskill Says Comments On Bush Were Reported Out Of Context. As it tried link GOP Sen. Jim Talent to President Bush, the campaign of Democrat Clair McCaskill accused Bush of letting poor blacks in Louisiana die during Hurricane Katrina. The Washington Times (9/12, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that McCaskill "has been under sharp criticism" since making the comment. Republicans, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, "immediately called upon Mrs. McCaskill to apologize for the remarks. … But Mrs. McCaskill told KMOX radio in Missouri the statement's context as reported by Pub Def Weekly is 'not exactly correct.' She said she was acknowledging the sentiment of many Americans, and national tragedies are the time when people need government the most."

Maryland Democratic Senate Primary Remains "Two Man Race." CQ (9/11, Spiegel) reported that polls indicate that Maryland's Democratic Senate primary campaign "is ending as it began: as a two-man race between Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin and former Rep. Kweisi Mfume, who more recently served as head of the NAACP. The front-runners have remained competitive right up to primary day because each has significant political assets." Mfume "has stayed in the running, largely for two reasons. His dramatic life story of rising from a difficult youth on the streets of inner-city Baltimore and his personal charisma have enabled him to personally outshine the earnest but bland Cardin, and the longtime civil rights activist with the Africanized name — he was born Frizzell Gray — has a stronger connection than Cardin to an African-American constituency that makes up more than a quarter of the state's population and a significant portion of the Democratic primary voting base."

GOP Hopes Michigan's Troubled Economy Will Help Unseat Granholm. The Washington Post (9/12, A3, Slevin, 748K) reports that in Michigan, this year's election is likely to come down to whom voters blame for the state's troubled economy. According to the Post, "With unemployment higher than the national average and many residents frustrated with Democratic Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, Republicans see a chance for a swing-state victory." Republican Mike Bouchard "has kept within striking distance in his first statewide race. But as he works to cultivate an image as a seasoned lawman and a pragmatic politician, he is finding that many voters are unwilling to replace a Democrat in Washington with a largely unknown Republican. … The GOP draws hope from polls showing that two in three voters are dissatisfied with Michigan's direction. The jobless rate rose to 7 percent in July, compared with 4.8 percent nationwide. Given deepening troubles in the auto industry, economists expect the number to remain high even with seasonal hiring."

Daley Vetoes Chicago Living-Wage Bill. Chicago Mayor Richard Daley used his veto power for the first time in his 17-year tenure to reject a living-wage ordinance intended to force big retailers to pay wages of $10 an hour and health benefits equivalent to $3 an hour by 2010. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Hudson, 2.03M) reports, "Mayor Daley had to persuade only two aldermen to reverse course on the ordinance to ensure his veto isn't overridden. The aldermen had voted 35-14 on July 26 to pass the ordinance. The ordinance's sponsor, Alderman Joseph Moore, said an override of the veto remains possible."

The New York Times (9/12, Davey, 1.21M) reports, "The veto, praised by business leaders but condemned by labor groups and the aldermen who had pressed for the ordinance, set up the mayor for a rare political fight: Mr. Daley, who is up for re-election next year, may face an effort to override his veto at City Hall on Wednesday." An override "would require 34 of the 50 aldermen, and at least one Council member who had supported the ordinance told The Chicago Tribune that she now intended to vote against it. Another alderman who supported the measure is expected to be absent."

WSJournal Makes Case Against Living-Wage Bill. The Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) editorializes, "In his veto message, Mayor Daley, a pro-union Democrat, declared that the wage law would 'drive jobs and businesses from our city, penalizing neighborhoods that need additional economic activity the most.' Wal-Mart and Target have announced plans to cease expansions in the city if the law is enacted. … And of course if Wal-Mart, Home Depot and the others were to abandon the city, Chicago residents would be paying a great many millions more a year in higher prices. Still, the City Council has vowed a veto override vote later this week."

Survey Finds Americans Have Four Distinct Views Of God. USA Today (9/12, Grossman, 2.27M) reports, "A new survey of religion in the USA finds four very different images of God -- from a wrathful deity thundering at sinful humanity to a distant power uninvolved in mankind's affairs." Written and analyzed by sociologists from Baylor University's Institute for Studies of Religion, in Waco, Texas, and conducted by Gallup, the survey of 1,721 Americans "asked 77 questions with nearly 400 answer choices that burrowed deeply into beliefs, practices and religious ties and turned up some surprising findings: Though 91.8% say they believe in God, a higher power or a cosmic force, they had four distinct views of God's personality and engagement in human affairs. These Four Gods — dubbed by researchers Authoritarian, Benevolent, Critical or Distant — tell more about people's social, moral and political views and personal piety than the familiar categories of Protestant/Catholic/Jew or even red state/blue state."

The Washington Post (9/12, A12, Boorstein, 748K) reports that the survey, "considered one of the most detailed ever conducted about religion in the United States, found that one in 10 people who picked 'no religion' out of 40 choices did something interesting when asked later where they worship: They named a place. Considering that, Baylor researchers say, the percentage of people who are truly unaffiliated is more like 10.8 percent. The difference between 10.8 percent and 14 percent is about 10 million Americans."

Book Says "Daily Show" Makes Young People Cynical About Politics. Mary Zeiss Stange, an associate professor of women's studies and religion at Skidmore College, writes in USA Today (9/12, 2.27M), "In 'The Daily Show Effect: Candidate Evaluations, Efficacy, and American Youth,' Jody Baumgartner and Jonathan Morris, of East Carolina University, claim to have discovered that viewing Stewart's nightly satirical riff on the news causes college-age Americans to become cynical about politicians and the news media. … They reached this conclusion by contrasting the responses of students who had viewed 2004 presidential election coverage on The Daily Show to those of students who had viewed similar reportage on CBS' Evening News." Stange adds, "The cynical and potentially more apathetic Daily Show viewers also seemed to be 'more confident about their own ability to understand politics' than those who had 'consumed' the network news." Stange adds, "if the 'serious' national news media are irked at being called to account by a show whose lead-in is 'puppets making crank phone calls,' they have no one to thank but themselves."

Assassination Film Said To Devalue "The Difference Between Real And False." The Wall Street Journal (9/12, Morgenstern, 2.03M) reviews the film "Death Of A President," a fake documentary set one year in the future, which depicts the assassination of President Bush. The Journal reports that the film "is certainly artful in its deployment of tried-and-true documentary techniques to create an alternate reality. … By dramatizing the government's dependence on questionable forensic evidence, by manipulating images and flagrantly falsifying contexts (as in excerpts from a Cheney speech that are made to seem a eulogy for the fallen president), it reminds us of the undependable nature of supposedly objective truth." The film "ultimately, and paradoxically, does what it professes to deplore -- devalues the difference between real and false." It "takes on an unreal life of its own. The film itself becomes a riderless horse."

USA Today (9/12, Jacobson, 2.27M) also reviews the film, noting that it did not "score any huge critical success" at this week's Toronto film festival. The consensus "seemed to be that the political conclusions -- that American politics drives truth out the window -- didn't seem to be worth the artistic effort to pump up the volume. … The auditorium was silent during the film while viewers tried to follow the stream of political and forensic jargon. Audience response at the end was an unsure round of applause."

Edsall Book Depicts Democrats As "Hapless," "Unfocused." The New York Times (9/12, Kakutani, 1.21M) reviews the book "Building Red America," by Thomas B. Edsall. In the book, Edsall notes that Republicans hold "'a set of advantages, some substantial and some marginal,' that have enabled it to 'eke out victory by slim margins in a majority of closely contested elections' and that will probably give it an edge in the foreseeable future." Edsall depicts Democrats "as hapless, unfocused and reeling from self-inflicted wounds. … Unless the Democratic Party makes fundamental changes in its structure, tactical operations and long-range strategic planning, he writes, the odds are that the Republicans 'will continue to maintain, over the long term, a thin but durable margin of victory.'"

Gunmen Attack US Embassy In Damascus; No Casualties Reported. The AP (9/12 Aji) reports, "Gunmen apparently blew up a car outside the American Embassy and exchanged fire with Syrian guards in a bold attack inside Damascus' diplomatic neighborhood Tuesday, a witness said. … A Syrian who works at the US Embassy told The Associated Press by telephone that there were no US casualties." According to a witness, "two gunmen stopped a car on the street in front of the Embassy, got out and shot at the Syrian sentries in front of the building's entrance and then detonated the car. The security personnel shot back, and security forces in the area quickly rushed to the scene, said the witness who was in the area." The AP adds, "In Washington, the State Department said it had no immediate information and was looking into news reports of the attack."

In "Apparent Shift," Rice Open To Delay In Push For Iran Sanctions. The New York Times (9/12, Cooper, 1.21M) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in an ever-so-slight softening of America's stance, on Monday left open the possibility that the United States might suspend efforts to impose sanctions against Iran if it suspended uranium enrichment for two months. 'First of all, it would have to be suspension -- verified suspension,' Ms. Rice said. 'Secondly, it's suspension for suspension. We've said that if they suspend,' the United States would in turn halt its pursuit of United Nations sanctions against Iran and would join European talks with Tehran over its nuclear program." The "apparent shift in the American stance…reflects the hard realities that there are few good options on Iran, even if the Bush administration is able to get Russia and China to sign on to sanctions. Iran defied an Aug. 31 deadline set by the United Nations Security Council to halt production of nuclear fuel."

USA Today (9/12, 2.27M) reports, "Iran has told diplomats it may be willing to shelve its uranium-enrichment program temporarily, perhaps for two months, during negotiations with the United States and other world powers over the future and scope of the Islamic republic's nuclear program." Rice "said Iran has not put a formal offer on the table, but she did not reject the idea of beginning talks framed by an Iranian deadline. 'The question is: Are they prepared to suspend verifiably so that negotiations can begin?'"

The Washington Times/AP (9/12, Gearan) reports Rice "predicted, as other Bush administration figures have, that the Security Council would gradually ratchet up economic or political sanctions. The step-by-step approach is meant to offer Iran a way out as the pressure increases."

The Washington Post (9/12, A20, Kessler, Linzer, 748K) reports, "Rice's comments followed a round of private calls she had in the past day with European counterparts and came after positive meetings between European and Iranian officials. Two days of talks in Vienna between Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, and Javier Solana of the European Union went well, and both sides said they will meet again Thursday, according to diplomats from both sides who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the negotiations." France, Britain and Germany "have committed to push for sanctions against Iran if it does not halt its uranium-enrichment program, but the Europeans are also eager to find a route to negotiations."

Iran Closes Two Opposition Newspapers. The AP (9/12, Dareini) reports, "Iran closed down two opposition newspapers on Monday, one of which had recently poked fun at hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and the way his government has handled nuclear talks with the West." It was "a fresh show of determination by Iran's ruling clerical establishment to silence dissent over its handling of nuclear talks with the West and deny reformers a chance to air their views ahead of elections scheduled for Dec. 15." Iran's "most prominent reformist daily, Shargh, or East," ran a cartoon Thursday "depicting a horse and donkey facing each other on a chess board. The donkey — a symbol of ignorance in Iranian culture -- has his mouth open and light around him, while the horse shows no emotion. The Press Supervisory Board also "ordered the political monthly Nameh, or Letter, to be closed down, IRNA reported Monday. The paper's editor, Majid Tavallaei, said the reason behind the closure was the publication of a poem from dissident female poet Simin Behbahani. The text of the poem was not immediately available." The New York Times (9/12, Fathi, 1.21M) and Los Angeles Times (9/12, Pirouz) also report the story.

Sharansky Says Iran's Use Of Terrorism By "Proxy" Deserves International Action. In a Los Angeles Times column (9/12), Natan Sharansky compares the US' military action against the Taliban regime in Afghanistan after 9/11 and the lack of international action against Iran after Hezbollah's attack on Israel: "It is clear that Hezbollah is a proxy of Iran. It is public knowledge that Hezbollah receives more than $100 million a year from the Iranian regime, as well as sophisticated weapons and training. Yet Iran has paid no price for its proxy's actions" By "failing to hold Iran accountable for its brazen support of Hezbollah, the free world has undermined a central pillar in the war on terror and given the Iranian regime a huge weapon for achieving its ambitions. Now the mullahs know they can attack a democratic country with impunity. "

Kristof Makes Case Against Military Attack On Iran. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (9/12, 1.21M), "It is quite possible that President Bush will bomb Iran's nuclear installations over the next couple of years. Let's hope he looks at how Israel shot itself in the foot in Lebanon this summer and resists the siren calls of neocons who claim that a few air raids would make the Iranian nuclear menace disappear." Kristof adds, "The argument Mr. Bush is hearing in favor of an airstrike is pretty simple: Iran is a terrorist regime that has sponsored attacks on Americans and on Jews (as far away as Argentina). The president of Iran is a hard-liner who has used language that, while subject to debate among Farsi speakers, may mean that his aim is to wipe Israel off the map. A nuclear Iran would also have a devastating ripple effect around the region: Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Turkey might go nuclear as well. And considering how reckless Iran's foreign policy has already been, imagine if it felt emboldened with a nuclear weapon." Moreover, "if Mr. Bush doesn't strike Iran, there's a good chance that Israel will -- and the US would still get blamed (partly because the Israeli planes would fly through American-controlled airspace over Iraq)." However, "Iran's leaders are probably praying for such a strike; it may be the only way that they can stay in power for more than another decade. … We Americans are still paying the price for our involvement in the 1953 overthrow of the elected Iranian government of Mohammed Mossadegh; if we bomb Iran, we may cement the mullahs in power for another 50 years. Moreover, the military options are wretched."

Fatah, Hamas To Form Coalition Government.

The AP (9/12, Hadid) reports, "Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas struck a deal Monday to share power with the militant Islamic Hamas, an accord that could restore international aid and could lead to contacts with Israel. The breakthrough compromise falls short of international demands that Hamas fully renounce violence, but Israeli officials still voiced cautious support for the accord."

The Los Angeles Times (9/12, Ellingwood, 918K) says "the pact may help bring a measure of calm to the Gaza Strip and West Bank, easing protests by long-unpaid public workers and strife between the two parties' gunmen." However, "it remained unclear whether a government reshuffle would go far enough to restart the flow of hundreds of millions of dollars in aid from foreign donors, including the United States." The Times adds, "Palestinian officials said Abbas would dissolve the Hamas government in the coming days and that a new governing coalition would be named, most likely under Hamas leadership but including other factions. Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman with Hamas, said the parties still needed to work out the makeup of the government. … Details of the agreement were not released. A key unanswered question was whether the proposed government would satisfy the three conditions laid out by the so-called quartet of Middle East intermediaries -- the US, the EU, Russia and United Nations -- in order to resume the flow of aid." Those conditions are: "recognizing Israel, halting violence and agreeing to honor past Israeli-Palestinians agreements." The Washington Times (9/12, Mitnick, 88K) reports State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos "said the Palestinian government must accept" those "three principles of peace."

The New York Times (9/12, Erlanger, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Officials said the new government would accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements, an implicit recognition of a two-state solution. It would call for the negotiation of an independent Palestine outside of Israel's 1967 borders, including Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem, on the basis of an Arab League initiative." The government is also "expected to recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization, which has signed all agreements with Israel, as the negotiating representative of the Palestinian people, and to acknowledge the right of Mr. Abbas to negotiate for the Palestinians."

The Washington Post (9/12, A18, Wilson, 748K) reports, "Mark Regev, spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, said that 'things are still fluid' concerning the terms of the political program." But "he said that 'it's clear that if the incoming government, assuming there is one, accepts the three benchmarks...as well as the release of Gilad Shalit, it could give new momentum to the peace process and put the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue back on track.'" Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, spokeswoman for the US Consulate in Jerusalem, "which manages diplomacy with the Palestinians, said the political developments would be reviewed before any decision on aid is reached. But, she added, 'if it's still falling short of the quartet's principles, then it's still falling short.'"

Blair Encounters Angry Protests In Visit To Beirut.

The Financial Times (9/12, Adams, England) reports, "Several thousand angry chanting protesters gathered in central Beirut on Monday, leaving Tony Blair in little doubt about the hostility many Lebanese felt towards his fleeting visit to their country. … While hostile and vocal, the reaction reflects the country's experience of 34 days of Israeli bombardment that some argue Britain's prime minister bears a degree of responsibility for." The Times adds, "Many Lebanese accuse Mr Blair of supporting Israel in its war with Hizbollah, the Shia militant group, and he was widely criticised for refusing to call for an immediate ceasefire to the conflict. Some also deride him as a crony of George W. Bush, the US president."

The New York Times (9/12, Smith, 1.21M) reports "several ministers refused to meet" with Blair, "including the pro-Syrian speaker of Parliament, Nabih Berri. The front pages of most of the country's newspapers said he was not welcome. But Mr. Blair defended his policies in the 34-day war." Said Blair, "I could have gone out there and called for it all to stop, but it wasn't going to stop until there was a UN resolution that had a framework within which it could stop, in which the real problems could be dealt with." Blair "said Britain would send more than $75 million in aid to Lebanon this year and was ready to provide 'training, equipment, any help we can give' to Lebanese security forces that were filling the void left by Hezbollah and departing Israeli troops in southern Lebanon. He said he would use his remaining months as prime minister to work for peace in the Middle East."

Cameron Criticizes US Policies, Suggests Blair "Slavish" To US Interests. The Financial Times (9/12, Green) reports, "David Cameron, leader of Britain's opposition Conservative party, on launched an outspoken attack on the failures of American foreign policy, calling for a "rebalancing" of the close relationship between the US and the UK." In a speech in London on the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, Cameron said, "We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America." He added, ""I and my party are instinctive friends of America and passionate supporters of the Atlantic alliance," but "I fear that if we continue at present we may combine the maximum of exposure with the minimum of real influence over decisions."

The New York Times (9/12, Cowell, 1.21M) runs a similar report under the headline "Tory Denounces Blair's 'Slavish Tie To US," and says Cameron's remarks "showed just how far the British political spectrum has shifted since the end of the cold war and, particularly, since Mr. Blair's rise to power in 1997." The speech was "intended to draw a line under previous Conservative policy." Cameron himself "supported the Iraq invasion in 2003, but a senior Conservative, who spoke on the condition of anonymity under party rules, said: 'We don't want to have an endless fight about what happened three or four years ago. This is about the next 10 years.'" Cameron "said there had been mixed success by Britain and the United States in curbing terrorism since the Sept. 11 attacks. A terrorist attack on the same scale had been averted, he said, but 'across the globe, terrorists are being recruited in increasing numbers and are active in many more areas than before Sept. 11.' Anti-Americanism had taken hold, he said, 'not just in countries affected by war and instability, but here in the West, here in Britain.'" The Washington Post (9/12, Sullivan, 748K) also reports the story.

Rice Warns Sudan About Consequences Of Flouting Demand For Peacekeepers. The AP (9/12) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she told Sudan on Monday there is no chance of improved relations with the United States if it flouts the world's demand for UN peacekeepers in Darfur." Rice "gave reporters a brief account of her morning meeting in Washington with Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol." Said Rice, "I won't say that we made progress, but I will say that I delivered the strongest possible message in the strongest possible terms to the Sudanese government that any hope for bettering relations between the United States and Sudan rests on Sudan's cooperation with the United Nations Security Council resolution."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/12, A20, 748K) reports UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said yesterday Sudan's government "has violated the Darfur peace agreement with military attacks that are 'legally and morally unacceptable.'" Annan "said in a meeting of the UN Security Council that thousands of Sudanese troops have been sent to western Sudan, in violation of the peace accord, and North Darfur has been bombed. The violence has cut off food aid to 355,000 people in the northern part of the region, he said." Said Annan, "I strongly condemn this escalation." On Capitol Hill, Sen. Richard G. Lugar "introduced legislation that would authorize U.S. assistance to the 7,000 African Union troops in Darfur and call on President Bush to name a special envoy for the crisis."

US Servicewoman Refuses To Answer Questions About Kyrgyz "Kidnapping." Air Force Maj. Jill Metzger who reappeared after vanishing for three days has given confusing accounts of her absence and has refused to make any further statements after consulting with the US Embassy, a Kyrgyz police official said yesterday. The Washington Times/AP (9/12, Saralayeva) reports that Metzger "disappeared Sept. 5 while shopping in the city. She resurfaced Friday night when she knocked on the door of a house in Kant, about 15 miles outside Bishkek, and claimed she had been kidnapped. Maj. Metzger was flown out of Kyrgyzstan within a few hours of her reappearance and was admitted Sunday to a US military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany. There was no immediate word regarding what she was being treated for. Kyrgyz authorities have said her swift departure could impede their investigation, because they wanted to question her further to clarify her account."

Senators, US Embassy Deny Reports Codel Was Fired On In Georgia. The Hill (9/12, Heil) reports that although the Georgian Interior Ministry said a helicopter escorting a delegation of US senators on a codel was fired on, senators on the codel, including Sens. John McCain and

Lindsey Graham, "said they heard of the purported missile fire only after they had returned home. It turned out the statement is inaccurate, and that the senators' helicopter was never under fire. The US embassy in Georgia on Sep. 5 released a statement setting the record straight."

US, EU Criticize China's New Media Rules. The Financial Times (9/12, Dickie, Dinmore) reports, "The Bush administration joined the European Commission on Monday in criticising Beijing's imposition of new restrictions on the distribution of foreign news in China, saying it viewed the rules with 'great concern.' A State Department official said Beijing's media policies in general were 'incompatible with China's aspirations to build a modern information-based economy' and were a breach of fundamental rights." The new regulations "require international news services...to censor information distributed inside the country. The rules also ban the agencies from selling directly to local customers, including banks and other financial services companies."

WSJournal Decries China's New Media Rules. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) says that China's new law on foreign news agencies "smacks of expropriation and may violate China's World Trade Organization commitments. The document asserts the Chinese government's right to broadly censor foreign news companies' content over a range of sensitive subjects, including 'sovereignty' (read: Taiwan), 'religion' (Falun Gong), or China's 'interests' (Iran, Burma, Sudan)." The Journal adds, "No self-respecting foreign news agency will allow the Chinese government to read an article before it's published on the mainland. For financial newswires that provide real-time pricing and market information -- such as the one owned by this newspaper's parent company, Dow Jones -- censorship would be literally impossible." Xinhua "is the Communist Party's mouthpiece, a symbol of what China really is. The reformers among Beijing's elites need to explain to their colleagues that returning to old habits of censorship won't protect their future."

Investment Firm CEO Decries US "Constant Criticism" Of China. James McGregor, CEO of JL McGregor & Company, a China-focused research, advisory and investment firm, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) that in a mid-August BBC interview Sha Zukang, China's ambassador to the UN in Geneva, told US politicians "to stifle complaints about Beijing's rapidly growing military budget. He noted that defense spending in China, with a population five times larger than the US, is a small fraction of the American military budget, which accounts for nearly 50% of global arms spending. … As Mr. Sha's comments indicate, after 25 years of economic reforms and more than a decade of nearly 10% annual growth, Beijing is weary of and angry about America's constant criticism." McGregor adds, "We can't afford to let the ignorant and insular in both China and America teach, tease and taunt our two nations into an unnecessary and potentially cataclysmic collision."

US, Venezuela Battling For Dominance In Uruguay. The New York Times (9/12, Rohter, 1.21M) reports that Uruguay is "one of the main fronts in the struggle between the United States and Venezuela for dominance in South America. The Bush administration and President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela are jockeying for position here, each trying to undercut the other by winning over Uruguay's left-wing government." The Times adds, "Uruguay's population and economy are small, with barely three million people and total trade with the United States amounting to slightly more than $1 billion last year. But the country is a member of the Mercosur customs union, which includes Brazil and Argentina, and a free-trade agreement with the United States would weaken the group and put pressure on Uruguay's two big neighbors to negotiate bilateral accords with Washington."

Sneider Says US, South Korea Must Define Basis For Long-Term Friendship. Daniel Sneider, associate director for research at Stanford's Shorenstein Asia-Pacific Research Center, writes in the Washington Post (9/12, A23, 748K), "The U.S. visit this week by South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun offers yet another opportunity to bemoan the crisis of confidence in our alliance. … As policymakers from both countries meet this week, they need to take a deep breath and remember that our alliance survived tremendous stresses in the past. The task before us is not to focus on our divergence but to pick up the challenge left unmet 30 years ago -- to define the basis for a long-term relationship that is durable and reciprocal and that finally sheds the shackles of dependency."

South Korea's Foreign Policy Said To Be Based On Appeasing North. Mary Kissel writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/12, 2.03M) that "Seoul's foreign policy is based on a deep-seated fear of the North's collapse and the prospect of China's military involvement in the ensuing turmoil. That's pushed the Roh administration to pursue an agenda whose chief goal is maintaining the status quo in the totalitarian North, where 23 million fellow Koreans eke out a rude existence in the world's most brutal regime. This foreign policy is based on an increasingly twisted rationale for appeasement of Kim Jong Il -- and is accompanied by a slow ideological drift away from the US, the nation which has kept the peninsula secure over the past 50-odd years." Kissel adds, "It will take more than a frosty summit this week -- a further U.S. troop drawdown, perhaps? -- to stimulate some real fear among the Korean people about who's protecting their interests and ensuring their security."

WPost Says Prince's Birth Allows Japan To Sidestep Debate On Female Emperor. The Washington Post (9/12, A22, 748K) editorializes that "the birth of a 5-pound, 10-ounce son to Japanese Prince Akishino and his wife, Princess Kiko, has been a cause for particular celebration there for a single reason: the baby's gender. The baby is the first boy to be born in the imperial household in 41 years, thereby allowing the country to sidestep, at least for now, an emotional national debate about whether to permit a female to ascend the Chrysanthemum Throne. … Our best wishes to the family, but it's too bad the arrival of the little prince is letting the country and its archaic system of royal succession off the hook. … Symbols matter, and in a country whose institutions and society remain pervaded with sexism, a female emperor could hardly be a better one."

Posada should be released, magistrate tells judge; In a surprise decision, a federal magistrate in Texas has recommended that Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles be released from immigration custody

BY ALFONSO CHARDY

Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles should be released from immigration custody because the attorney general has not classified him as a terrorist and his continued detention runs counter to a 2001 Supreme Court ruling barring indefinite detention for foreign nationals who cannot be deported, a federal magistrate ruled Monday.

In a 24-page decision, U.S. Magistrate Norbert Garney in El Paso, Texas, wrote that U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement should put Posada under supervised release because the federal government had failed to find a country willing to take the 78-year-old exile, who has Venezuelan citizenship.

"The court recommends that petitioner's request for habeas relief be granted and that petitioner be released subject to the terms and conditions of supervised release," Garney wrote.

Garney's ruling is only a recommendation and will not lead to Posada's immediate release. He sent the recommendation to federal Judge Philip Martinez, who is expected to make a decision later -- either adopting or rejecting Garney's recommendation.

Posada's attorney, Eduardo Soto, told The Miami Herald Monday evening that he hoped Martinez would adopt Garney's ruling because ``normally the judge would accept the ruling of the magistrate who heard the case.''

Soto said he was elated by Garney's ruling.

''I'm so happy I'm about to start screaming,'' Soto said. ``It's tremendous news.''

Barbara Gonzalez, an ICE spokeswoman in Miami, said her agency had not reviewed Garney's ruling.

''We will study the decision when we receive it,'' she said.

Posada has been in ICE custody since May 17, 2005, when federal immigration agents detained him in Miami-Dade County hours after appearing at an invitation-only news conference near Hialeah.

Before his detention, Posada had been hiding in Miami-Dade after sneaking into the United States in March 2005.

He arrived from Honduras where he had been hiding since being freed from jail in Panama where he had been convicted in connection with an alleged plot to kill Fidel Castro in 2000.

The alleged plot was just one of many the CIA-trained Posada was accused of hatching over the years -- all of which he has denied.

In 1997 and 1998 the Cuban government accused Posada of playing a role in bombings in tourist spots on the island, and in 1976 he was arrested and charged in Venezuela with the bombing of a Cuban jetliner off Barbados.

He was initially acquitted in the case, but pending appeal he escaped from prison and wound up in El Salvador working for the nestepcovert Nicaraguan contra resupply network overseen by then White House national security council staffer Oliver North.

Posada sued ICE in federal court when the Homeland Security agency denied his release March 22, arguing he was a ''danger to the community'' and posed a ``risk to the national security of the United States.''

But Garney wrote in his opinion Monday that the ICE statement was not enough to keep Posada in detention. According to Garney, the law requires for indefinite detention a formal certification by the U.S. attorney general that a detainee is a terrorist or threat to the community. ''In this case, petitioner was never certified by the Attorney General as a terrorist or danger to the community or national security,'' wrote Garney, adding the government also had not ``moved to detain petitioner under any special circumstances.''

In its 2001 ruling, the high court said foreign nationals who cannot be deported can be held beyond six months after removal orders become final -- but only if they are deemed ``especially dangerous individuals.''

The court said those cases must be ''subject to strong procedural protections,'' but did not spell them out.

Government wants U.S. terror suspect tried in Iraq

By MATT APUZZO

Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_Government attorneys said U.S. courts have no authority to stop the military from transferring a former Minnesota National Guard member to an Iraqi court to face charges he supported terrorists and insurgents.

It's the latest legal challenge to the Bush administration's authority to keep terrorism cases, even those involving U.S. citizens, out of American courts.

Shawqi Omar, a citizen of both Jordan and the United States who once served in the Minnesota National Guard, was captured in Iraq in 2004. He is being held at Camp Bucca, a prison in southern Iraq, where his family says he has not been charged or allowed to speak with a lawyer.

His family is demanding that Omar be brought before a U.S. court, where prosecutors would have to show probable cause for detaining him and he could consult with an attorney.

The military, which says Omar was harboring insurgents and had bomb-making materials at the time of his arrest, wants to transfer him to an Iraqi court. A judge blocked that transfer in February.

On appeal Monday before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, government attorneys said American courts don't have jurisdiction because Omar is being held by a multinational force, not the U.S. military.

Defense attorneys say that's a legal gimmick.

A three-judge panel also expressed skepticism, saying the government's theory might allow the military to arrest someone inside the United States and hold him without due process _ all under the guise of a multinational force.

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory Garre said that wouldn't happen but the judges noted that it could. The judges also seemed wary of saying courts had no jurisdiction over a U.S. citizen being held by his country's military.

"Let's assume he was in Iraq seeking a job," Judge David S. Tatel said. "How can it be that the District Court lacks the ability to prohibit his transfer to Iraq?"

Judge Harry T. Edwards was even more pointed, saying the government was ignoring the Supreme Court's 2004 ruling that an American in Afghanistan could challenge his detention in U.S. courts.

Omar is described in court papers as a relative of former Iraq al-Qaida leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. Authorities say Omar also plotted to kidnap foreigners from Baghdad hotels.

Attorneys for Omar's family say he is innocent and likely to be tortured if handed over to the Iraqi government. They say he is a businessman who was seeking reconstruction contracts in Iraq.

Despite their skepticism for the government's argument, the three judges suggested that the Omar family attorney, Aziz Huq, might be reading too much into the law.

Even if the court sided with Omar, the judges said the military might only be required to release him, not to transfer him to a U.S. court. That wouldn't prevent him from being arrested and charged by Iraqis.

Separately, Omar was indicted in Jordan with Zarqawi and 11 others on charges they plotted a chemical attack against Jordan's intelligence agency.

The court did not rule Monday. Rulings typically take months.

Omar spent about 11 months in the Minnesota National Guard before being discharged in November 1984 without completing his training. He received an "uncharacterized discharge," meaning he was discharged for such things as health problems or poor performance, a Guard spokeswoman has said.

According to the Star Tribune of Minneapolis, Omar's wife, Sandra, has said she and her husband moved to Jordan in 1995. She said came to the U.S. on a student visa in 1979. She said they met in 1982 and got married in 1983 in South Dakota. They lived in Brainerd, Minn., from August 1983 to July 1984. He became a U.S. citizen in 1984.

Lawsuit: US health plans bilked; Merck KGaA unit accused of inflating Medicare charges

September 12, 2006

Merck KGaA's U S generic-drug unit was accused by the Department of Justice yesterday of overcharging government health-insurance programs for medicines.

The lawsuit, called a whistle-blower or ``qui tam" action, was filed in the U S District Court in Massachusetts. Merck's unit, called Dey, inflated prices to Medicare and Medicaid by more than five times since at least the beginning of January 1993, the department said in an e-mailed statement yesterday.

More than a dozen states and U S prosecutors have alleged in lawsuits that drug companies charged government health plans too much for medicines. The cases have gained momentum as the value of the prescription drug market in the United States surged to more than $252 billion a year, driving up medical costs.

``Dey engaged in a scheme to report fraudulent and inflated prices for several pharmaceutical products, knowing that federal healthcare programs established reimbursement rates based on those reported prices," the department said in the statement.

Merck is the world's number three generic-drug maker, behind Teva Pharmaceutical Industries Ltd. and Novartis AG. Merck spokeswoman Phyllis Carter couldn't be immediately reached for comment. The Dey unit was founded in 1978, and is based in Napa, Calif .

Merck, which isn't related to Whitehouse Station, N.J.-based Merck & Co., traces its history to 1668. It sells generic medicines and controls about 70 percent of the global market for liquid crystals used to make flat-panel displays.

The federal False Claims Act is a Civil War-era law that lets individuals known as ``whistle-blowers" sue for fraud on behalf of the government and be rewarded with as much as 25 percent of any money recovered. The Justice Department investigates and decides whether to join the suit.

The department is joining a lawsuit filed by a Florida provider of home treatment, Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc. and its principals. The lawsuit was assigned to U S District Court Judge Morris E. Lasker in Boston.

U.S. joins fraud suit against generic-drug firm

The Justice Department joined a False Claims Act lawsuit alleging that Dey, Napa, Calif., a maker of generic respiratory drugs, was overpaid by Medicare and state Medicaid programs by more than $500 million since 1993 because the company reported false prices for its products. Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys filed the initial whistle-blower complaint. The home-infusion company, based in Key West, Fla., has successfully settled several similar whistle-blower suits against drugmakers and other healthcare companies. Medicare and Medicaid reimburse drugmakers based on the prices they report for their products. According to the complaint, Dey allegedly reported prices five times higher than it actually charged. Dey denied wrongdoing and in a statement said it "has consistently participated legally and ethically within national and state reimbursement systems" and "intends to defend itself vigorously against the Justice Department's claims."

"When virtually an entire industry is sued -- as has been the case with the pricing lawsuits that have been filed around the country by dozens of attorneys general -- it indicates that the real issue is not the industry's conduct, but rather the government's own reimbursement system," said John Kling, Dey's senior vice president for legal services. The company has settled similar charges with three state Medicaid programs. The company is a subsidiary of Merck KGaA, a German-based drug and chemical manufacturer not associated with Merck & Co. -- by Mark Taylor

N.J. gets $500K settlement from GlaxoSmithKline in fraud case

WASHINGTON_New Jersey will get nearly $500,000 from GlaxoSmithKline PLC to settle claims it overcharged the government for two anti-nausea drugs, New Jersey prosecutors announced Monday.

"Every dollar lost to fraud or abuse is one less dollar available to help the most needy citizens of our state," Greta Gooden

Brown, a state insurance fraud prosecutor, said in a statement released Monday.

New Jersey was reimbursed $472,382 from the company's $149 million national settlement with the Department of Justice.

Glaxo engaged in a scheme to inflate the price of Zofran and Kytril for the Medicare and Medicaid programs, which reimburse health care providers based on the manufacturers' prices, the government said. The drugs, typically administered in doctors' offices or hospitals, are used mainly to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation.

The company charged health care providers less for the drugs, knowing the providers would get to pocket the difference and would be more likely to prescribe them again, the Justice Department said.

Glaxo admitted no wrongdoing as part of the settlement, which covers claims submitted from 1994 to 2002.

N.J. presses U.S. on program of clandestine surveillance; It contends the program violates the state's rules protecting the privacy of telephone subscribers.

By Beth Defalco
Associated Press

TRENTON - New Jersey has the right to obtain information about a federal domestic-surveillance program because that program is no longer a secret, the state argued in response to federal efforts to quash its investigation.

The U.S. Justice Department wants to throw up "an impenetrable cloak insulating the federal government's domestic-surveillance activities from all judicial scrutiny," acting New Jersey Attorney General Anne Milgram said yesterday.

New Jersey prosecutors subpoenaed 10 phone companies in May because of suspicion that state consumer-protection laws were being violated if phone companies were turning over records to the National Security Agency.

The federal government countersued the New Jersey Attorney General's Office in June, contending that complying with the state's subpoenas or even acknowledging the existence of such a program would threaten national security.

The state, in its response filed late Friday, argued: "There is no secret for the state-secret privilege to protect."

New Jersey Public Advocate Ronald K. Chen argued that the federal government has no authority to sue state officials unless Congress authorized the action, which it has not.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller declined to comment, saying only that federal prosecutors would "respond in court."

The program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people the government suspects have terrorist links. A secret court has been set up to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the government says it can't always wait for a court to take action.

The federal government considers the program vital to fighting terrorism, but critics say it unconstitutionally gathers private information.

Federal officials have objected to efforts by several states and civil-liberties groups to investigate or shut down the NSA program. Most recently, the United States sued a Connecticut agency last week and Maine utility regulators last month.

Justice Department Lawyers Lose Appeal on Overtime Pay

By Stephen Barr

There's no dispute that Justice Department lawyers worked overtime and on holidays, and there's evidence the lawyers were "expected and induced" to work extra hours. But that's not enough to win back pay, a federal court ruled yesterday.

Overtime hours must be "ordered or approved" in advance for pay purposes, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit said.

The ruling is the latest in a long-running class-action lawsuit involving more than 9,000 Justice Department lawyers, but it's not the end of the case.

The agency lawyers, represented by Williams & Connolly LLP, will appeal the decision to the Supreme Court, said Robert A. Van Kirk , a lawyer for the firm.

"The Federal Circuit's decision essentially guts the Federal Employees Pay Act and gives federal agencies the green light to disregard the mandatory overtime provisions of the law," Van Kirk said.

The Justice Department would not comment on the ruling. In the past, the department has said that its lawyers are professionals who accept that they will work more than 40 hours a week to carry out their responsibilities.

Yesterday's ruling was the second defeat for the Justice Department lawyers -- many are assistant U.S. attorneys -- at the circuit court. They had prevailed in a federal claims court only to see that decision reversed on an appeal by the department. The lawyers went back to the circuit court in hopes of readdressing certain issues in the case.

The agency lawyers are seeking compensation for overtime, holiday and "administratively uncontrollable overtime," a special pay category. The department has said the case covers the period between 1992 to 1999, but the lawyers think the case could extend to the present.

The back pay at stake is substantial -- a 2001 estimate suggested it could be as high as $500 million. That year, the department successfully lobbied for legislation that it thinks will prevent the use of appropriated funds to pay overtime to its lawyers. That tactic brought criticism from some House members, who said the department was not leading by example and should conduct itself beyond reproach.

Yesterday's ruling, issued by federal Circuit Court Judges Alvin A. Schall , Randall R. Rader and Sharon Prost , focused on precise language in the 1945 federal pay law and in federal regulations. At issue was the court's finding that overtime hours must be approved in advance in writing and that the lawyers were not on a list of Justice Department employees who qualify for uncontrollable overtime -- a pay differential that goes to criminal investigators and others who regularly work long and irregular hours because of their assignments. The court also said an earlier ruling against the lawyers was correct and precluded them from getting holiday pay.

Even though the Justice Department kept two sets of books on the lawyers -- one for pay purposes and one for determining actual hours worked -- the court rejected for a second time the lawyers' argument that the records represented the department's approval of the extra hours.

"These records merely showed that the agency had awareness that attorneys worked extra hours -- not that they had been authorized to receive overtime pay for working extra hours," the court said.

When lawyers asked about overtime, they were told they were not entitled. The department also told lawyers there was no system in place to request overtime, according to the plaintiffs.

Commentary: A Judge Accepts a Claim Paralleling the Mafia and the Tobacco Industry

By ANTHONY J. SEBOK

On August 17, Judge Gladys Kessler of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia issued a 1683 page set of findings and order that ended one of the longest, strangest suits the tobacco companies have ever had to face. The decision is remarkable--it is an exhaustive and careful consideration of claim that the tobacco industry is, well, like the mafia. And the judge basically said: Yes. It is.

This case, which I have written about earlier for this site - including in this most recent column -- has ended (if it has indeed ended) with a whimper, not a bang. And, as I will explain, it may not have ended quite yet.

The History of the Suit

The suit was begun by the Clinton Department of Justice (DOJ), which tried to bring a battery of claims against the tobacco industry. The Clinton DOJ considered, and abandoned the idea of, a criminal indictment under the Racketeering-Influenced Corrupt Organizations Statute. But it did bring a civil RICO claim. (In addition, the Clinton DOJ sued for reimbursement under theories similar to those successfully brought by the states in the mid-90's, but without success.)

Under the civil RICO claim - the only claim that was left, in the end -- the Attorney General sued Big Tobacco for "injunctive relief" to prevent it from committing, in the future, wrongdoing similar to that it had committed in the past. But DOJ hoped to get money too: The Clinton Justice Department's attorneys figured that, if they could show that the entire tobacco industry was engaged in interstate mail and wire fraud when it lied about the health consequences of smoking, then they could at least get some sizeable disgorgement of ill-gotten profits from the industry.

But that was all back in 1999. Since 2000, of course, Republicans have been in charge - and they have been less than enthusiastic about the suit. . In particular, the Bush Administration has seemed to pursue it in a desultory fashion.

With only the "disgorgement" claim left in the case as a potential source of a monetary award, the tobacco companies filed an interlocutory appeal (that is, an appeal in the midst of the case) to the U,S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. It asked the D.C. Circuit to clarify what "injunctive" relief really means under civil RICO. The D.C. Circuit answered that the injunction had to be "forward looking," and that took disgorgement - a remedy that looked to the ill-gotten profits of past bad conduct -- off the table.

Judge Kessler's Recent - and Scathing - Opinion Condemning Big Tobacco

And yet the case would not die. Judge Kessler wouldn't let it.

Column continues below ↓

And last month, she finally got her chance to pass judgment. Her opinion is scathing in its treatment of the industry--she basically found that the industry had engaged in widespread fraud for over forty years--and in its comments about the law firms who had worked tirelessly to insulate the industry from liability during that time. And then came the remedy section.

In a 1683-page opinion, the remedy was only 20 pages long. Judge Kessler had indicated earlier that the D.C. Circuit had tied her hands, and that, therefore, she was forced to come up with a remedy that would both survive on appeal and express her fury at the industry. So, since she could not really punish the industry or make its companies pay, she decided to shame the companies instead.

Judge Kessler's Shaming Remedy Is Ingenious - But Doesn't Impress the Market

She ordered the industry to, in effect, wear a big scarlet A for the next few years. For two years, the industry will have to attach special stickers on every pack of cigarettes they sell. Each sticker will contain a special "corrective statement" explaining that cigarettes may cause illness and that nicotine is addictive.

For one year, Big Tobacco will also have to broadcast television ads on national evening news programs that say the same thing. And Big Tobacco will have to take out full-page ads in the major Sunday papers that also repeat the corrective statement.

Finally, the companies are forbidden from using the words "light" or "low tar" or "mild" in their packaging. That's right: No more "Marlboro Lights."

After the decision came out, the share prices of the tobacco companies all hit new highs. Basically, the market's and the companies' view was: "Sticks and stones (and damage awards) can break our bones, but names will never hurt us."

When the suit was initiated in 1999, the Clinton Justice Department had asked for a remedy of a $480 billion disgorgement--profits from 40-plus years of the racketeering enterprise. The remedy ordered by Kessler is humiliating, but the industry is sure that it can survive it.

And yet, the industry is sure to appeal. Why?

Why the Industry Will Appeal: Rebranding and Overseas Marketing Limits

The one forward-looking remedy ordered by the judge that could really hurt the bottom line of the company is the abandonment of the words "light" or "low tar" from any packaging or advertising.

This would require a huge rebranding effort. And the cost of that effort is not the only downside of the order. The abandonment of familiar logos and labels means that established consumer loyalties will be uprooted, and each company will have a chance to poach customers off of each other.

From the industry's perspective, a further, and much more disturbing, potential result of the judge's order is that it will have to conform to her demands overseas. The overseas market represents the true growth area for the industry, and anything that might inhibit the firms' freedom to market their product as they see fit is a negative for them.

It is not obvious that a federal judge can order a defendant to conform with the demands of an injunction even when it does business overseas. Obviously, conduct performed in the United States that has an effect overseas can be enjoined by a federal judge. But what about an injunction that separately reaches domestic conduct, and identical conduct occurring overseas? Is only the domestic component of such an injunction valid.

The authority for the federal statute under which Kessler issued her order is the Commerce Clause of the U.S. Constitution. Yet various decisions, especially in the area of antitrust, have held that the power of Congress to control purely foreign conduct is quite limited.

Furthermore, there is a significant comity question. In many foreign countries, tobacco sales are controlled by the state. Questions about packaging, and especially the health statements on packaging, are often regulated by foreign governments. Even assuming the Constitution does grant federal judges the power to enjoin purely foreign activity, that power may be limited where a foreign government had already "occupied the field" and does not want to share the field with a federal judge in Washington, D.C.

Can Judge Kessler tell the French subsidiary of Philip Morris that it must put an "onsert" in its packages that announces that the American tobacco companies lied in the past? Can she prohibit the use of the word "light" in a package printed and marketed in Turkey? Maybe, but I think it is unlikely.

Why Judge Kessler's Remedies Are Likely to Be Stayed Pending Appeal

All these considerations make me think that there is a good chances the D.C. Court of Appeals will stay the judge's order (that is, render it temporarily ineffective) until it can rule on the appeal. (The DOJ has appealed too, but its claims seem less likely to succeed).

The industry asked Kessler to stay her order four weeks ago, on the grounds that compliance would cause "irreparable injury" if her judgment were ultimately reversed. Kessler refused, but Big Tobacco now has a second bite at the apple with the Court of Appeals, and I think the pressure is mounting on the Court of Appeals to grant the stay.

There is a good case for irreparable injury, here, after all. When and if Judge Kessler's order takes effect, it will trigger a long and costly rebranding operation and a long and difficult series of negotiations with other countries. Both the operations and negotiations, however, could turn out to be unnecessary if the D.C. Circuit overrules Judge Kessler.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Sue Ellen Wooldridge
Assistant Attorney General
Environment and Natural Resources Division

NEXT WEEK

Nothing to report.

THIS WEEK

- Legislative Response to Cobell Litigation

ENRD and the Civil Division continue to work closely with the Senate Indian Affairs Committee on proposed revisions to S. 1439 (sponsored by Senators McCain and Dorgan to address, among other things, the claims at issue in the Cobell trust litigation). A markup on the bill is tentatively scheduled for this Thursday, September 14. ENRD also continues to work with the Department of the Interior and OMB on proposed solutions to management issues involving the Individual Indian trusts, including fractionation of individual interests, some of which may be included in the revisions to S. 1439.

LAST WEEK

- Preliminary Decision in National Audubon Society v. Norton (D. Alaska) (Petroleum Reserves Leasing Case)

On September 6, the district court issued a preliminary decision in this National Environmental Protection Act and Endangered Species Act challenge of the Bureau of Land Management's

(BLM) changes to the Integrated Activity Plan for oil and gas leasing in the Northeast Planning Area of the National Petroleum Reserve - Alaska (NPRA). Although the decision would rule for BLM on certain aspects of plaintiff's challenges, it would rule for plaintiffs on the adequacy of the cumulative impacts analysis in the Environmental Impact Study (for failure to adequately consider the impacts of leasing in the adjoining Northwest Planning Area of the NPRA) and the adequacy of the biological opinion. The preliminary decision would enjoin the first lease sale under the revised plan, which is scheduled for September 27. The court has ordered the parties to file supplemental briefs on the preliminary decision this week and next. Some press coverage of this case has failed to recognize the preliminary nature of the current ruling and has reported that oil and gas leasing have been enjoined. While no injunction has yet issued, there is risk that one will issue in the coming weeks.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Sue Ellen Wooldridge
Assistant Attorney General
Environment and Natural Resources Division

NEXT WEEK

Nothing to report.

THIS WEEK

- Legislative Response to Cobell Litigation

ENRD and the Civil Division continue to work closely with the Senate Indian Affairs Committee on proposed revisions to S. 1439 (sponsored by Senators McCain and Dorgan to address, among other things, the claims at issue in the Cobell trust litigation). A markup on the bill is tentatively scheduled for this Thursday, September 14. ENRD also continues to work with the Departments of the Interior and Treasury and with OMB on proposed solutions to management issues involving the Individual Indian trusts, including fractionation of individual interests, some of which may be included in the revisions to S. 1439.

LAST WEEK

- Preliminary Decision in National Audubon Society v. Norton (D. Alaska) (Petroleum Reserves Leasing Case)

On September 6, the district court issued a preliminary decision in this National Environmental Protection Act and Endangered Species Act challenge of the Bureau of Land Management's

(BLM) changes to the Integrated Activity Plan for oil and gas leasing in the Northeast Planning Area of the National Petroleum Reserve - Alaska (NPRA). (Additional leasing in the eastern part of NPRA was a recommendation of the President's National Energy Policy Development Group.) Although the decision would rule for BLM on certain aspects of plaintiff's challenges, it would rule for plaintiffs on the adequacy of the cumulative impacts analysis in the Environmental Impact Study (for failure to adequately consider the impacts of leasing in the adjoining Northwest Planning Area of the NPRA) and the adequacy of the biological opinion. The preliminary decision would enjoin the first lease sale under the revised plan, which is scheduled for September 27. The court has ordered the parties to file supplemental briefs this week and next on the preliminary decision. Some press coverage of this case has failed to recognize the preliminary nature of the current ruling and has reported that oil and gas leasing have been enjoined. While no injunction has yet issued, there is risk that one will issue in the coming weeks.

ATTORNEY GENERAL ALBERTO R. GONZALES HONORS EMPLOYEES AND OTHERS AT THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE'S ANNUAL AWARDS CEREMONY

Individuals Involved in Enron Trial Receive Top Awards

WASHINGTON -- More than 230 Justice Department employees – along with 42 other individuals, many of whom are federal employees and law enforcement officers – were honored today at the Department's 54th Annual Awards Ceremony at Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. The Attorney General's Annual Awards Ceremony provides an opportunity to recognize the extraordinary accomplishments of a number of U.S. Department of Justice employees as well as individuals from outside the Department.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty presented the Department's highest award, the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service, to the outstanding members of the investigative and trial team of the Enron Task Force, who were recognized for their exceptional service to the American public and the Department in the investigation and successful prosecution of the individuals who were most responsible for the Enron fraud. This hard-fought battle was won through the dedication of the team members, who devoted years of their professional lives to this effort and, in doing so, made significant personal sacrifices by living away from home for long periods of time and working under stressful conditions. The team's unparalleled dedication and teamwork over a period of years has made a significant contribution to restoring confidence in the nation's securities markets.

"Today's award recipients make me proud to be their colleague," said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. "Their dedication and achievements remind me why it is an honor to serve at the Department of Justice."

The recipients of the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service from this team include:

From the Northern District of Illinois, Sean M. Berkowitz, Assistant U.S. Attorney; from the District of Columbia, Kathryn H. Ruemmler and Lisa O. In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, many Department employees responded to assist those most impacted. fugitives responsible for the spike in crimes after the storm.

The third Distinguished Service Award was presented to the members of the Southeast Bomb Task Force, who pursued domestic terrorist Eric Rudolph for nine years after he attempted to disrupt the 1996 Summer Olympic Games in Atlanta, Georgia, by detonating one of the largest pipe bombs ever in the United States. All five successfully and swiftly implemented, on a national basis, the new credit counseling and financial education requirements contained in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.

Award recipient Barbara Rowland, Assistant U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, resolved two significant civil fraud cases in the pharmaceutical arena, recapturing $261.5 million for Federal health care programs. Her efforts resulted in passing the benefit of the lowest price available in the marketplace to Medicaid beneficiaries.

Another honored recipient, Bryan Sierra, Public Affairs Specialist, has expertly managed media relations for complex and high profile cases, including the Padilla case, Enron, and the Moussaoui trial. His efforts to explain to the public the important work of the Department are extraordinary–he consistently goes beyond the call of duty, even accepting the dangerous mission of traveling with the Attorney General to Iraq in July, 2005.

In recognition of outstanding professional achievements by law enforcement officers, four Excellence in Law Enforcement Awards were presented this year.

Special Agents David P. Biddiscombe and James Langtry, New York Division, Federal Bureau of Investigation and Detective Robert J. Brzeski, Detective, Nassau County Police Department, New York, were honored for dismantling the Velt Gangsta Lanes set of the Bloods gang in Roosevelt, New York, as part of the joint federal and local Operation Streetsweeper. Their efforts resulted in the apprehension and conviction of 22 Bloods gang members on racketeering charges involving narcotics trafficking, assaults with firearms and incendiary devices, murder and attempted murder.

The second award for Excellence in Law Enforcement was presented to Christopher M. Garay, an Emergency Medical Technician from the Federal Correctional Complex in Tucson, Az, part of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, who fought his way out of a housing unit overtaken by inmates. His concern for fellow staff members after the disturbance was noted.

Another distinguished group was awarded for their contributions in the investigation of former New York City Police Department detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, who exploited their law enforcement positions to perpetrate a broad range of racketeering acts on behalf of the Luchese organized crime family. Honorees included, from the Drug Enforcement Administration, John M. Peluso, Assistant Special Agent in Charge; and Special Agents Mark Z. Manko, John E. Perfetti, John P. Francolla, Geraldine A. Hart, and David J. Wolf , all from the New York Field Division. Those honored from the Federal Bureau of Investigation included Geraldine A. Hart and David J. Wolf, Special Agents in the New York Division.

The Award for Excellence in Law Enforcement was also presented to members of an agency task force who conducted a 22 month investigation to catch a serial arsonist. The arsonist was responsible for the deaths of two people within the Washington Metropolitan Area. All individuals honored serve in the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives. The list included Theresa R. Stoop, Special Agent in Charge; David L. McCain, Assistant Special Agent in Charge; William J. Stringer, Group Supervisor; Thomas R. Daley, Scott R. Fulkerson, Tijuana N. Patty, Special Agents, Baltimore Field Division; and Joseph M. Riehl, Chief, Arson and Explosives Programs Division.

The Attorney General's Award for Excellence in Furthering the Interests of U.S. National Security was presented to the trial team involved with the Moussaoui case. Members of the team overcame numerous obstacles in what was an extremely complex and extended national security case. Ultimately, they were able to uphold the Department's goal–the prevention of terrorist attacks and the protection of national security–by securing the guilty plea of an avowed al Qaeda terrorist, and seeing that he spends the rest of his days in prison.

Members of the team included, from the Ceriminal Division, John W. Van Lonkhuyzen, Trial Attorney; Gregory A. Miller, Counterterrorism Support Specialist and Security Officer; Suzette R. Buttram, Former Paralegal Specialist, Counterterrorism Section. Awarded from the Eastern District of Virginia were David J. Novak, Senior Litigation Counsel; Karen M. Spinks, Victim Witness Coordinator; Aaron M. Zebley, Assistant U.S. Attorney; Nancy J. Kramp, Lynn H. Johnson and Sheila A. Lee, Paralegal Specialists; Debra C. Vainio, Lead Legal Assistant; Pamela A. Benson and Michael J. Tesar, Intelligence Research Specialists; Crystal A. Griego, Victim Witness Specialist; and Robert A. Spencer, Former Supervisory Assistant U.S. Attorney. Those honored from the Southern District of New York included David A. Raskin, Assistant U.S. Attorney; Henry J. Brady, Jr., Intelligence Research Specialist; Gerard C. Francisco, Legal Administration Specialist; and Wendy

Olsen Clancy, Victim Witness Specialist. Members of the team from the Civil Rights Division include Kevin Gingras, Trial Attorney, Criminal Section. Hose from the FBI include James M. Fitzgerald, Brian L. Getson, Lisa M. Rich, and Matthew M. Gutierrez, Special Agents; Joan-Marie Turchiano, Supervisory Special Agent; Brenda Holley, Technical Information Specialist, New York Division; Jacqueline Maguire and Matthew G. Walsh, Special Agents, Washington Field Office; Lisa B. Eie, Special Agent, San Diego Field Office. From the Justice Management Division, the team included Christine E. Gunning, Security Specialist, Security and Emergency Planning Staff. Also awarded was Raymond A. Guidetti, Detective Sergeant First Class, New Jersey State Police; and from the Central Intelligence Agency, Jonathan H. Ferry and John L. McPherson, Agents.

The Mary C. Lawton Lifetime Service Award went to David Margolis, Associate Deputy Attorney General, Office of the Deputy Attorney General. Throughout his career, David Margolis has exemplified the dedicated public service, leadership, and integrity demonstrated by Mary C. Lawton. ATTORNEY GENERAL ALBERTO R. GONZALES HONORS EMPLOYEES AND OTHERS AT THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE'S ANNUAL AWARDS CEREMONY

Individuals Involved in Enron Trial Receive Top Award

WASHINGTON – More than 230 Justice Department employees – along with 42 other individuals, many of whom are federal employees and law enforcement officers – were honored today at the Department's 54th Annual Awards Ceremony at Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. The Attorney General's Annual Awards Ceremony provides an opportunity to recognize the extraordinary accomplishments of a number of U.S. Department of Justice employees as well as individuals from outside the Department.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty joined the Attorney General in presenting the Department's highest award, the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service, to the outstanding members of the investigative and trial team of the Enron Task Force, who were recognized for their exceptional service to the American public and the Department in the investigation and successful prosecution of the individuals who were most responsible for the Enron fraud. This hard-fought battle was won through the dedication of the team members, who devoted years of their professional lives to this effort and, in doing so, made significant personal sacrifices by living away from home for long periods of time and working under stressful conditions. The team's unparalleled dedication and teamwork over a period of years has made a significant contribution to restoring confidence in the nation's securities markets.

"Today's award recipients make me proud to be their colleague. They make me proud to be an American," said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. "Their dedication and achievements remind me why it is an honor to serve at the Department of Justice."

The recipients of the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service from this team include:

Leslie R. Caldwell, Former Supervisory Assistant U.S. Attorney; from the Northern District of Texas, Clifford B. Stricklin, Special Assistant U.S. Attorney; from the Eastern District of New York, Benton J. Campbell and Linda A. Lacewell, Assistant U.S. Attorneys, and Andrew Weissmann, former Assistant U.S. Attorney; from the District of Massachusetts, David H. Hennessy, Assistant U.S. Attorney and Samuel W. Buell, Former Assistant U.S. Attorney.

Also part of the team were members of the Criminal Division, including John A. Drennan, Trial Attorney for the Appellate Section; Leo J. Wise, Trial Attorney, and Linda B. Walls, Lead Paralegal Specialist for the Fraud Section; and Matthew W. Friedrich, Principal Deputy Assistant Attorney General and Chief of Staff, Office of the Assistant Attorney General. The remaining team members are part of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Those being honored from the FBI's Houston Division include Supervisory Special Agent Michael E. Anderson; Special Agents Raju S. Bhatia, David Michael Hays, Kendall L. Hopper, Jeffrey D. Jenson, Jill Odom, and Chad J. Nunez; Financial Analysts Loren P. Feast, Susan K. Ridley, and Tonja K. Rose; and Paralegal Specialist Pamela Joan Jerding. Recipients from the FBI's Washington Field Office include Supervisory Special Agent David F. Reign and Special Agents Paul E. Holdeman, Paula L. Schanzle, Marc R. Diehl, Brian L. Crews, Jeffrey C. Dutton, and Gregory H. Bristol. Supervisory Special Agent for the FBI's Security Division Anne Hopkins was also honored.

The Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Heroism is given to recognize an extraordinary act of courage and voluntary risk of life during the performance of official duties. William "Buddy"A. Sentner, Special Agent of the Office of Inspector General's Miami Field Office is honored posthumously for the exceptional courage he displayed by saving the lives of several fellow officers. Special Agent Sentner, 44, was shot and killed in the line of duty on June 21, 2006, as he was working as part of a team executing arrest warrants on six correctional officers at the Federal Correctional Institution in Tallahassee, Florida. These correctional officers were indicted the previous day on charges of conspiracy to sexually abuse female inmates and introduction of contraband into the correctional facility. During the execution of the arrest warrant, one of the correctional officers, who was a subject of the warrant, opened fire on the arrest team. Acting with extraordinary courage, Special Agent Sentner rushed to aid his fellow agents and returned fire, killing the correctional officer. Tragically, Mr. Sentner was killed and a Federal Bureau of Prisons lieutenant was wounded. Special Agent Sentner's brave actions and quick response under fire saved the lives of others while sacrificing his own life.

The Mary C. Lawton Lifetime Service Award recognizes employees who have served at least 20 years in the Department and have demonstrated high standards of excellence and dedication throughout their careers. This year's Mary C. Lawton Lifetime Service Award went to David Margolis, Associate Deputy Attorney General in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General. Mr. Margolis has been a federal prosecutor for over 40 years and has brought decades of experience in the Department to the wide array of responsibilities in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General. The contributions that Mr. Margolis has made to the Department are not simply characterized by length of service. His impact on the Department's policy and practices, his integrity and reliability and his dedication to the cause of justice are hallmarks of his character.

The Attorney General's Award for Meritorious Public Service recognizes the most significant contributions of citizens who have assisted the Department in the accomplishment of its mission and objectives. Phillip Nicholas Chapman, Christopher M. Donlan, Amber Marie Deahn, and Linda C. Olson were honored today for their heroic and selfless efforts which led to the rescue of Shasta Groene and the arrest of her abductor, Joseph Edward Duncan, III, in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho on July 2, 2005. At approximately 1:53 A.M. PT, Joseph Duncan and Shasta Groene walked into a Denny's restaurant in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho. Duncan had brutally killed members of Groene's family a few months before. Working for Denny's at the time were manager Linda C. Olson and waitress Amber M. Deahn. Ms. Deahn identified the girl from the extensive media coverage the case had received and directed her manager to call 911. Ms. Deahn offered Ms. Groene a milkshake as a delaying tactic. At the same time, Phillip N. Chapman and Christopher M. Donlan, who were patrons seated nearby, also recognized Ms. Groene from media reports and walked outside the restaurant to observe Duncan, who had gone outside to smoke. They identified his vehicle and recorded the license plate number. Responding officers soon arrived and arrested Duncan. As a result of their efforts, a violent killer and child sexual predator was arrested and an abducted child was recovered.

In recognition of outstanding professional achievements by law enforcement officers, four Excellence in Law Enforcement Awards were presented this year. Special Agents David P. Biddiscombe and James Langtry, New York Division, Federal Bureau of Investigation and Detective Robert J. Brzeski, Nassau County Police Department, New York, were honored for dismantling the Velt Gangsta Lanes set of the Bloods gang in Roosevelt, New York, as part of the joint federal and local Operation Streetsweeper. Their efforts resulted in the apprehension and conviction of 22 Bloods gang members on racketeering charges involving narcotics trafficking, assaults with firearms and incendiary devices, murder and attempted murder.

The Award for Excellence in Law Enforcement was also presented to Christopher M. Garay, an emergency medical technician from the Federal Correctional Complex in Tucson, Az., of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, who fought his way out of a housing unit overtaken by inmates. Mr. Garay was assaulted with homemade weapons, receiving numerous puncture wounds, scrapes, contusions and a laceration to his head. Immediately upon being released from the hospital, Mr. Garay returned to the prison to assist with the investigation and prosecution of the inmates involved.

Another distinguished group was awarded for their contributions in the investigation of former New York City Police Department detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, who exploited their law enforcement positions to perpetrate a broad range of racketeering acts on behalf of the Luchese organized crime family. TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Pressures GOP On Detainees (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0062081

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

The Associated Press, September 12, 2006

President Bush dispatched the vice president and top aides to the Capitol on Tuesday to try to break an election-season deadlock with Republicans over the surveillance and prosecution of terrorism suspects.

But officials met stiff resistance from senators and House leaders who say they refuse to give the White House a blank check over the war on terror. The standoff raised questions about whether the president could unite Republicans on his anti-terror agenda before November's midterm elections.

Vice President Dick Cheney and White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten appealed to Senate Republicans during their weekly policy lunch to pass legislation that would let Bush begin prosecuting terror suspects. The legislation also would limit the circumstances under which a government interrogator could be prosecuted for mistreating a detainee.

Also meeting with lawmakers this week on detainee treatment was CIA Director Michael Hayden.

The administration is also pressing separate legislation that would let it track terrorists by electronic surveillance.

Several versions of that legislation are expected to advance through the Senate and House Judiciary Committees this week. They would give legal status to the controversial surveillance program, as well as impose new rules and congressional oversight.

Bush's surveillance plan faces a difficult fight in Congress, especially in the House, where GOP leaders favor a different approach.

That measure, sponsored by Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., and endorsed by the GOP chairmen of the Judiciary and Intelligence committees, would require the administration to wait until a terrorist attack to open an electronic surveillance program.

The White House has conditionally endorsed one bill, by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., as long as it's passed unchanged — not a sure thing given amendments that await it on the floor as soon as next week.

Specter's bill would submit the existing electronic surveillance program to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court for a one-time constitutional review and expand the time for emergency warrants from three to seven days.

On the effort to craft a new way for military trials of terror detainees, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he supports the administration's efforts and could call for a vote on it — or a competing bill favored by some GOP senators — at any time.

The alternative bill was drafted by Sens. John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham, members of the Armed Services Committee. They say their measure would improve the credibility of a court system to prosecute detainees and prevent abusive treatment that would violate the Geneva Conventions.

Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said Tuesday the group remains locked in negotiations with other Republicans.

Graham said he expects the final legislation will allow a defendant to access all evidence used against them — a provision staunchly opposed by the White House and House and Senate leadership because it could reveal classified information. Graham said steps can be taken to prevent unnecessary exposure of protected information, but ultimately a fair trial must allow defendants the ability to confront evidence used against them.

"I think we've made a pretty good case that giving something to a jury to convict a defendant (with hidden evidence) is a nonstarter," Graham added.

Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said they agree all evidence should be shared with a defendant.

Graham and others said the biggest sticking points left on the bill were on the circumstances under which an interrogator could be prosecuted for mistreating detainees.

The administration would forbid what critics call a bare bones list of violations — such as torture, murder and rape — under the 1996 War Crimes Act that potentially leaves open the door for harsher interrogation methods. Warner, Graham and McCain are pushing more precise definitions, as well as a ban on coerced testimony, to ensure tough interrogations do not lead to abuse or violate the Geneva Conventions.

These definitions of war crimes have "shown to be the toughest part" of negotiations with the White House because it must be done "in a way that would adhere to your values but would not put your troops at risk for trivial violations," Graham said.

Cheney, Senators Discuss Detainees (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Vice President Cheney urged Republican senators yesterday not to be too restrictive in setting legal limits on CIA interrogations of enemy combatants, the largest remaining barrier to an agreement between Congress and the White House on legislation that would also set new rules for special military trials for terrorist suspects.

Cheney and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten met for an hour with GOP senators in hopes of narrowing their differences over proposed legislation governing the treatment, questioning and prosecution of suspected terrorists and enemy combatants, such as those held at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Afterward, key senators said they had made progress on several fronts, including the use of secret information against defendants and guidelines for handling allegedly coerced statements. The biggest sticking point, they said, was how narrowly to define practices that might subject CIA interrogators or others to charges of committing war crimes.

That "is still the area we are farthest apart on," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told reporters.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) said he and others are pressing the administration to accept a list of practices that would be considered illegal, bringing greater specificity to current language that bars "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions, the treaties that govern the treatment of prisoners of war.

"We are going to define, in the war crimes section [of the U.S. Code], what a grave breach would be, just like any other criminal statute," said Graham, a former military lawyer.

He declined to detail the proposals but said he is "optimistic" an agreement can be reached.

Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions prohibits "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment" of detainees. The Bush administration had maintained that those protections did not apply to prisoners captured in the U.S. counterterrorism campaign, but allies and human rights groups had criticized some U.S. interrogation practices, including simulated drowning.

In June, the Supreme Court ruled that the administration must abide by the Geneva Conventions in treatment of those prisoners and declared illegal its plan to try them before military "commissions." The White House responded by submitting new proposals to Congress that are now being negotiated with key Republicans.

The talks concern both the rules for trials of the detainees and language submitted by the administration that would, in effect, set the rules for CIA interrogations of future detainees.

President Bush has urged lawmakers to give the executive branch substantial leeway in interrogating and trying detainees. But GOP senators including McCain, Graham and John W. Warner (Va.) have resisted on several fronts. They balked, for instance, at a White House bid to allow the use of classified information that is not shared with defendants.

Graham said yesterday that negotiators are nearing an agreement that would allow the defendant to know the essence of the allegations against him, but not the person or techniques that produced them.

"I'm trying to protect the prosecution from having to disclose sources and methods that will come from defense requests that are basically overreaching," Graham told reporters.

Similarly, he said, senators and the White House may reach an agreement on how to handle allegedly coerced statements. The proposal would allow only those statements that a military judge decides were made voluntarily.

Under U.S. law, war crimes include "a grave breach" of the Geneva Conventions. The conventions describe grave breaches as "willful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments, willfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health . . . or willfully depriving a prisoner of war of the rights of fair and regular trial prescribed in this Convention."

Administration officials and others have said the language is so vague that it could unfairly subject government interrogators to charges of criminality. Graham said he has proposed taking the Geneva Conventions' list of grave breaches, adding "a few more," and directing that interrogation programs be built around the guidelines. He declined to say what the additions might be.

Congress should define the U.S. War Crimes Act of 1996, Graham said, "in a way consistent with our treaty obligations, which would make 'grave breaches' a crime." Under this scenario, he said, interrogators would know they could not engage in "serious criminal physical misconduct, inhumane treatment of a serious nature."

White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said: "We're having an ongoing conversation with the Congress on all of the issues, and we're committed to reaching a resolution so that they can take the next legislative step."

Deal Reported Near On Rights Of Suspects In Terror Cases (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — The leading Senate Republicans negotiating over proposed legislation to bring terror suspects to trial said Tuesday that they were close to a compromise on a main dispute with the White House: whether suspects had the right to see all the evidence used against them.

But the Senate Republicans warned that they would not go along with a White House proposal to redefine the provision of the Geneva Conventions that broadly guarantees humane treatment of detainees.

That provision, known as Common Article 3, prohibits “violence to life and person” and “outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment.”

The Supreme Court, in striking down military tribunals that the White House established after the Sept. 11 attacks, said the guarantee had to apply to terror suspects.

The administration has proposed narrowing the provision, arguing that it is too vague and does not give interrogators enough guidance in how to treat detainees. Under the War Crimes Act, interrogators who violate the article can face the death penalty.

Senator John McCain of Arizona said he and two other Republican senators crucial to the discussions, John W. Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, would not agree to any narrowing of the provision.

Mr. McCain said such a move could send a message about the nation’s support for human rights and the precedent it might set for special forces captured by other countries.

“On the detainee-treatment issue,” he said, “Senator Warner and I and Senator Graham and others are not going to agree to changes in the definitions in Common Article 3, because that then sends the message to the world that we are not going to adhere fully to the Geneva Conventions. And we worry about, in the future, other nations maybe deciding to interpret Common Article 3 to their own purposes.”

Mr. McCain is influential on detainee questions because of his years as a Vietnam prisoner of war. The three senators made their appeal for their approach at the weekly Republican Party lunch after a presentation by Vice President Dick Cheney.

In addition to talking with Mr. Cheney, the senators have extensively negotiated with Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, also discussed the topic on Tuesday with lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

The compromise on classified evidence would have a judge review the evidence and give a summary to be presented to the jury and the accused. Anything less, the senators have said, would constitute a secret trial.

The White House bill proposed last week would deny a suspect the right to see classified evidence that the jury might use to convict him.

Mr. Graham said the White House was “O.K.” with the compromise.

To address the White House concerns over Common Article 3, Mr. Graham said, the Senate would agree to redefine the War Crimes Act and make more specific the provision in it that says a violation of Common Article 3 is punishable by death.

“The administration is concerned that Common Article 3 can be used to sue our guys, to put our guys in jail, that they’re in an unfair position, and I would agree,” Mr. Graham said.

DOJ_NMG_0062084

The changes, he added, said, would define the cases in which “grave breaches” of Common Article 3 constitute a war crime and would bar “serious criminal physical misconduct and inhumane treatment of a serious nature.”

Secrecy Dispute Snarls Nomination (WP)

Wainstein in Limbo Over FBI Memos

Six months after President Bush chose him to lead a new anti-terrorism arm of the Justice Department, Kenneth L. Wainstein is still U.S. attorney for the District -- his nomination stalled by squabbling in the Senate.

Wainstein, a longtime prosecutor and former FBI official, had seemed on track to become the assistant attorney general for national security. Two Senate committees -- Judiciary and Intelligence -- endorsed his nomination. But for more than two months, he has awaited a vote by the full Senate.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) has blocked a vote because the Justice Department has not turned over to him several FBI documents that are connected to the abuse of detainees at the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba -- papers that would have passed through Wainstein's office when he was at the FBI.

The delay creates uncertainty not only at the Justice Department but also at the U.S. attorney's office, which Wainstein has led since May 2004. The office, which handles federal and local cases, is the largest U.S. attorney's office in the nation.

The national security division, created this year as part of the revision of the Patriot Act, will consolidate into one operation three branches of the Justice Department: counterterrorism, counterespionage and the office that oversees applications to the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act Court.

Wainstein was a top aide to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III from 2002 to 2004, serving first as general counsel and then as the agency's chief of staff. In each job, he played a key role in the bureau's restructuring to focus more heavily on terrorism cases.

Now Wainstein's work at the FBI is the subject of scrutiny by Levin, a member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence who has focused considerable attention on the detention practices at Guantanamo.

The senator's stance has drawn criticism from the Bush administration.

"As we mark the fifth anniversary of September 11th, it is beyond belief that Senator Levin would single-handedly obstruct the Department of Justice's efforts to stand up a new national security division," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

Levin's position has frustrated even some allies, who have urged the Senate to move forward with a vote. Thomas H. Kean and Lee H. Hamilton, the chairman and vice chairman of the 9/11 commission, have written in support of Wainstein. Charles S. Robb, a Democrat and former senator from Virginia whose commission on weapons of mass destruction recommended the restructuring of national security operations, wrote as well in support of Wainstein.

At issue are several documents that were sent to or from Wainstein or his deputy after FBI agents at Guantanamo reported witnessing sometimes abusive interrogations of detainees. The documents came to light after the American Civil Liberties Union filed a request under the Freedom of Information Act, but only in redacted form to the ACLU. Levin wants to see the original documents without redactions. Only one has been turned over, and that led to the stalemate.

Roehrkasse said the documents that Levin is seeking have nothing to do with Wainstein's qualifications for the assistant attorney general job.

Wainstein, 44, was easily confirmed by the Senate to take the U.S. attorney's job. But this nomination has been complicated.

"He's an innocent hostage in what is a pretty typical congressional response," said Norman J. Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute.

Such tactics are not new, Ornstein said, but the secrecy of the Bush administration has made them more likely to be used. The White House has advocated a more expansive doctrine of executive authority, and critics have complained that Congress has failed to exercise meaningful oversight over the administration's military and intelligence actions.

Levin, a lawyer, has been pressing hard for answers about Guantanamo, and Wainstein's nomination offered the senator perhaps his best opportunity to pressure the administration. Because it is a newly created position, the national security job cannot be filled by a recess appointment, as the president has done in other instances in which a nominee has been blocked.

If the Senate does not act on Wainstein's nomination before it adjourns at the end of the year, Wainstein would have to be nominated once again.

Wainstein declined to comment on his fate. A leading candidate to replace him as U.S. attorney, Jeff Taylor, is also in a holding pattern. Taylor is a legal adviser to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and a former assistant U.S. attorney in San Diego.

White House officials, potentially vulnerable to prosecution in the wake of the Supreme Court's Hamdan decision, break out the big guns in a battle over detainees

When the Capitol police start politely clearing the hallways outside the Senate floor on a Tuesday afternoon it usually signals that Vice President Dick Cheney has decided to attend the Republicans' weekly policy lunch. But the gentility went out the window around noon today as the cops grabbed bystanders and pulled them out of the way as they rushed to empty the area not just for Cheney and White House chief of staff Josh Bolten, but for a special guest: Lady Margaret Thatcher.

The Senate Republican leaders weren't breaking out the top tier invitations for nothing. Three moderate GOP Senators have split with them and the White House over how to treat detainees at Guantanamo Bay and around the world. At the lunch, Senators John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham were scheduled to present their case for a detainee bill that conforms to the Geneva Conventions. The White House and Senate leaders are pushing one that would allow interrogations using methods that strain — or break, depending on whom you ask — the Conventions' rules against abuse.

Rolling out former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, who famously urged George H. W. Bush not to "go wobbly" ahead of the first Gulf War, was a particular bit of political hardball by the President's Hill allies as they try to stiffen spines in their caucus. And the stakes are high. The November mid-term elections may hinge on national security, and McCain and company are depriving their party of its best weapon — a vote that makes Democrats look weak. More important, the White House claims, is that McCain and company could outlaw methods of gaining intelligence that have been effective in preventing attacks against the U.S.

But some Senators and legal experts see another reason for the heightened concern at the White House. On paper, at least, White House officials and CIA officers could be vulnerable to prosecution for past or future use of illegal methods of interrogation — unless Congress changes the law.

The threat of prosecution comes not from some left-wing activists or even the House Democrats, but from the highest court in the country. In his concurring opinion in the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case last summer, Justice Anthony Kennedy said that the administration had to live within the Geneva Conventions. "Violations [of the Geneva Conventions] are considered 'war crimes,' punishable as federal offenses, when committed by or against United States nationals and military personnel," he wrote. And for emphasis, Kennedy pointed to paragraph 2441 of the U.S. code, which lays out the penalties for those violations, including life imprisonment and the death penalty.

It's hard to see how the methods the administration authorized for use against some of their detainees could not have violated the Geneva conventions. Common article 3 of the conventions prevents any "outrages on the personal dignity" of detainees. Among the highlights of the administration's approved techniques — waterboarding, wherein a prisoner is made to believe he is drowning; intimidation using dogs; stripping of prisoners; and so on.

When the key swing vote on the Supreme Court goes out of his way to say you are breaking the law, and enumerates the penalties you face, you pay attention. Says Tom Malinowski, of Human Rights Watch, who has advised Senators and their staffs on the matter, "The White House now knows they were operating under pretty bad legal advice from the Justice Department," which told them Bush had near-limitless authority when acting as commander-in-chief during times of war. "They're worried about some rogue prosecutor in the future who might hold specific individuals responsible," Malinowski says. Privately, some senior GOP senators say they believe that is what is motivating the White House resistance to the McCain/Warner/Graham bill.

Maybe. But just how much danger is the White House really in? It is rare for political leaders to be prosecuted for genuine attempts to protect the public, and few question the motives behind the extreme interrogation methods, even if they strongly disagree with them. More to the point, Graham, Warner and McCain have larded their bill with protections from prosecution for anything but "grave breaches" of the conventions, which they believe should be adequate to protect the White House and CIA.

But just because the administration's extreme interrogation techniques wouldn't be punishable as crimes, doesn't mean they would be authorized to use them either. And that, say several people involved in the debate, is what the administration is really after. In his speech announcing the closure of the program that used most of the controversial methods last week, Bush said he wanted to keep open the possibility of reopening it in the future. "They want the authority to continue the program if they capture other guys," says Malinowski.

As he went into the policy lunch today, McCain, who was tortured in Vietnam, said "my position will not change," on the extreme methods. And Graham is adamant that the interrogation program is "a thing of the past." One or both of the competing bills may come to the floor of the Senate as early as the end of this week. For now, at least, it appears it will take more than the Iron Lady to compel the administration opponents to back down.

Tortured Logic (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

'THE UNITED STATES DOES NOT TORTURE," President Bush said last week. It can, however, make use of what he euphemistically called "an alternative set of procedures" for eliciting information from prisoners suspected of being terrorists.

The difference between torture and these "alternative procedures" seems to be who's conducting the interrogation and where it takes place. If it's the CIA and it's overseas, they're permissible alternative procedures. Anywhere else, they're not allowed. This kind of legalistic legerdemain doesn't just expose the weakness of the administration's argument, it does a real disservice to U.S. foreign policy and all those serving overseas.

The administration characteristically refused to provide details about its methods. But experts on interrogation suspect that these alternative procedures could include subjecting prisoners to extreme temperatures and "waterboarding," in which a prisoner is strapped to a board and put in fear of drowning if he doesn't confess.

Such techniques seem to qualify as "humiliating and degrading treatment" prohibited by Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention, which protects so-called enemy combatants, at least according to the Supreme Court. That's also the military's view. The new Army field manual, rooted in Article 3, prohibits extreme interrogation tactics such as waterboarding and conducting mock executions.

The administration, apparently untroubled by this disagreement, is now asking Congress to declare that detainees who claim violations of the Geneva Convention may not have their day in court. The administration also wants to amend the 1996 War Crimes Act, which makes violation of the Geneva Convention illegal under U.S. law. New language would allow for prosecution only for "torture" and "cruel and inhumane treatment," not for "humiliating and degrading treatment." A 2005 law already allows interrogators accused of abuse to offer the defense that they "did not know that the practices were unlawful and [that] a person of ordinary sense and understanding would not know the practices were unlawful." That's protection enough.

Even the clearest legal language is subject to differing interpretations. But the Bush administration has a record of taking the narrowest possible view of protections for detainees under U.S. and international law. Indeed, until the Supreme Court forced it to change course, the administration argued that unlawful enemy combatants in the war on terror weren't covered by the Geneva Convention at all.

Given an inch by the law, this administration too often has taken a mile — creating a climate in which lower-level service members could feel that they were justified in the sort of abuse that took place at Abu Ghraib. As Congress moves to write legislation governing the treatment of present and future detainees, it needs to keep that history in mind and force the president to spell out what he means by alternative methods. And Congress should allow detainees who claim those methods violate their rights under the Geneva Convention to have their day in court.

House GOP Leaders Fight Wiretapping Limits (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

House leaders moved yesterday to temper many of the controls that a bill headed toward rapid passage would have imposed on the Bush administration's program for wiretapping terrorism suspects without court approval.

The bill, set for Judiciary Committee consideration today, would have forced the administration to seek a warrant for surveillance within 60 days and bolstered consultations with Congress on the program. But last-minute changes pushed by senior Republicans may allow warrantless surveillance to largely continue without those controls. Instead, House Republican leaders brought their bill in line with legislation agreed to by the White House and the Senate, which would allow but not require the administration to submit the program to a secret court for a constitutional review.

Republican leaders, in the midst of an increasingly angry attack on Democrats over defense matters, made it clear that they will not challenge President Bush's authority in matters of national security as they challenge their opponents' commitment to fighting terrorism.

"I do not think it is our intent to . . . 'rein in' the NSA," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

The move put House GOP leaders at odds with some Republican moderates and civil libertarians in the House and the Senate, who have pledged to assert Congress's authority over the wiretapping program. The legislation's chief author, Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), made it clear that she will stand by the original bill's system of checks when the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence takes it up tomorrow.

Wilson's bill would extend from the current three days to five days the time allowed for emergency surveillance before a warrant has to be submitted and approved by the secret federal court established under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA). Warrantless surveillance would have to halt after 60 days unless the president came to Congress to justify further eavesdropping. And members of Congress would have to be briefed on the groups under surveillance.

"We need to use our intelligence tools to listen to our enemies," she said. "We also need to make sure checks are in place to prevent those tools from being used inappropriately against Americans. The best way to do that is to make sure we have divided government."

Divisions have also surfaced in the Senate, where half a dozen Republicans have publicly questioned the agreement between Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and the White House that House leaders pushed yesterday.

Democrats and civil liberties groups say neither the Wilson nor the Specter bill effectively limits the reach of the NSA's wiretapping program. Under the Wilson bill, a terrorist attack anywhere in the world would suspend for 45 days many of the controls on the program, and surveillance of international calls could continue without a warrant, as long as an American is not the target, Democrats say. Even before the leadership's changes, House Judiciary Committee aides had expected a bipartisan challenge to Wilson's bill today.

"There are some us who are uncomfortable here, some Republicans," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a Judiciary Committee member.

A competing measure, written by Flake and Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.), another committee member, would effectively end warrantless surveillance by insisting that a FISA court warrant remain the exclusive means to conduct domestic surveillance. It would also clarify that Congress's authorization of the use of force after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks was in no way meant to authorize warrantless wiretapping, and it would require disclosure to Congress of information on all Americans subjected to the surveillance.

Nevertheless, administration officials have criticized aspects of Wilson's House bill, especially the provision that would suspend controls only in the aftermath of a terrorist attack.

"The president cannot and should not wait for thousands of Americans to die before initiating vital intelligence collection," acting Assistant Attorney General Steven G. Bradbury told the House Judiciary Committee last week.

Wilson was incredulous. "It is surprising to me that, five years after 9/11, the administration comes to Capitol Hill to say they have insufficient legal authorities necessary to keep this country safe," she said.

But House GOP leaders pushed the committee to fall in line.

"Mr. Boehner's purpose right now is to hold on to GOP seats," Schiff said yesterday, after the Judiciary Committee's first classified briefing on the NSA program since it was revealed in December. "It's the security of Republican seats, not the security of the country, that's driving the majority leader.

The heated words came from both sides.

Boehner used a meeting with reporters yesterday to push his attacks on Democrats over the wiretapping issue and the president's efforts to receive congressional approval for his military tribunals.

"I listen to my Democrat friends, and I wonder if they're more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting the American people," Boehner said.

Democrats Call NSA's Input To Senate Panel Inappropriate (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Democrats on the Senate intelligence committee are complaining that the National Security Agency has played politics in support of the secret program to intercept phone calls between alleged terrorists in the United States and abroad.

On July 27, shortly after most members of the committee were briefed on the controversial surveillance program, the NSA supplied the panel's chairman, Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), with "a set of administration approved, unclassified talking points for the members to use," as described in the document.

Among the talking points were "subjective statements that appear intended to advance a particular policy view and present certain facts in the best possible light," Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said in a letter to the NSA director.

The cleared statements included "I can say the program must continue" and "There is strict oversight in place . . . now including the full congressional intelligence committees," as well as "Current law is not agile enough to handle the threat posed by sophisticated international terrorist organizations such as al-Qaeda" and "The FISA should be amended so that it is technologically neutral." FISA refers to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the current law.

Rockefeller and six Democrats on the panel wrote Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander, the NSA's director, on Aug. 29 that they believed those statements "appear intended to advocate particular policies rather than provide guidance on classification." The letter added: "We believe that it is inappropriate for the NSA to insert itself into this policy debate."

Alexander had earlier told Rockefeller that the talking points were in response to requests from more than one committee Democrat for guidance as to what could be said publicly as the policy debate began over what should be done with the program.

One element particularly troubling to the Democrats was the statement that there was "strict" congressional oversight of the program, because, as one senior Democrat said yesterday, committee members are still awaiting requested documents such as the original authorization by President Bush that initiated the program.

In a recent letter to Rockefeller, Alexander said he regretted that the NSA talking points were "misperceived as political." Rockefeller is planning to expand on the Democrats' concerns about their attempts to conduct oversight on the program in a speech today on the Senate floor.

Jury Seated For Trial Of Two Muslims On Charges They Supported Terrorism (NSDY/AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 13, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- The trial of two Muslims charged with supporting terrorism is to open Wednesday after potential jurors faced questions on their feelings about Islam, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the war in Iraq and whether they could deal fairly with the defendants.

A jury of six women and six men was chosen Tuesday to hear the case against the men arrested two years ago in an FBI sting. Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and mosque member, are accused of laundering money for an emigre businessman claiming to be a part-time arms dealer. They have pleaded not guilty, their attorneys arguing that full and accurate translations of the undercover tapes will show the men don't support terrorism.

"Right now Mr. Hossain and Mr. Aref are innocent," U.S. District Judge Thomas McAvoy said as jury selection began Tuesday. "All we can ask you to do is put aside any ideas you have ... and listen to what the witnesses say."

Some of the initial dozen members of the jury pool said they had relatives in the military, disagreements with Islam or strong feelings about the 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center in Manhattan.

"I personally believe that the government probably didn't bring these charges for nothing," one potential juror said, later likening prosecutors to the U.S. Marines at Fallujah. "Walking into this courtroom I feel like there's the enemy, here's the Marines," he said. "I may not be able to fairly judge this case."

He was excused from the jury pool.

McAvoy said it will be up to jurors to decide who's telling the truth and whether the two men broke any laws. They face more than two dozen charges that they conspired and then went ahead to launder and conceal money from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile to a Pakistan-based Islamic terrorist group.

Prosecutors say the Albany men willingly agreed to join the conspiracy, and their taped statements, as well as past statements, show their sympathy for Islamic terrorism.

Defense attorneys say Hossain, 51, simply sought a loan from the Pakistani businessman, Aref as a cleric was asked to witness the financial transaction, and the businessman/FBI informant was trying hard to implicate them to avoid a stiff sentence from an unrelated conviction.

"There is absolutely no evidence of the instant defendants' intent to commit any attacks on the United States, imminent or otherwise _ there is only a fake and completely incredible 'plot' on the part of a paid informant who tried his best, unsuccessfully, to enlist the support of the defendants," attorney Terence Kindlon wrote.

In court papers, Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek said he planned to introduce terrorism expert Dr. Rohan Gunaratna as a witness to rebut the "preposterous position" raised in a bail application that Aref's writings before he came to the U.S. in 1999 show he opposes terrorists and their philosophy. Instead, Gunaratna will offer the opinion that Aref, 36, is "a global jihadist."

McAvoy said the trial will probably last three weeks.

Jury Set In Albany Terror Sting Case (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, September 13, 2006

Opening statements due today in trial of pizza shop owner, imam accused of taking part in missile launcher plot

ALBANY -- A phalanx of federal and city law enforcement officers blanketed the U.S. District Courthouse on Broadway as a jury of six women and six men were sworn in Tuesday in the trial of two Albany men facing terrorism-related charges.

But there were only a few public spectators and no security incidents as the federal jury was culled from a pool of 65 prospective panelists who reported for duty from as far away as the Poughkeepsie area. Opening statements in the case are scheduled to take place today.

Yassin M. Aref, 36, the jailed spiritual leader of a Central Avenue mosque, and Mohammed M. Hossain, 51, a city pizza shop owner, are accused of taking part in a plot to sell missile launchers to terrorists during an FBI sting that began in July 2003. The men face up to 400 years in prison if convicted.

Aref's co-counsel, Kent Sprotbery, and Hossain's attorney, Kevin Luibrand, spent much of Tuesday plying the minds of potential jurors about their religious beliefs and feelings toward Muslims in the wake of the 9/11 attacks.

"I'm scared to death of you," Luibrand told the group at one point, referring to his client's Muslim heritage, his appearance, and the mind-set of Americans at a time when the United States is at war in the Middle East. "Do you understand why I'm afraid? ... Can you look at him as Jimmy McDonald from North Albany instead of Mohammed Hossain from Bangladesh?"

"I do believe I can listen to the facts and sort it out," one juror later responded.

But several prospective jurors were dismissed after admitting that 9/11 and other terrorist-related events had skewed their ability to remain impartial.

More than a dozen FBI agents are expected to testify during the trial, which is the culmination of the most intensive counterterrorism sting in the history of the Albany field office, which covers about 32 counties in upstate New York as well as the state of Vermont.

Much of the defense's case is expected to center on government translations of dozens of tape-recorded conversations that took place between Hossain, Aref and an FBI informant. The informant, a Pakistani immigrant, agreed to take part in the sting to help settle his own, unrelated criminal charges of unlawful supplying driver's licenses to other immigrants.

"We're all affected by what happened five years ago," Sprotbery said to the panelists, noting that Aref "looks like" terrorist figures whose violence has played out on media outlets worldwide since 9/11 and especially during the war in Iraq.

Aref was not drawn into the sting until Hossain and the FBI informant had met 13 times over the course of five months in late 2003. Federal officials have acknowledged Aref was the "ultimate target" of the investigation.

In part, their interest in Aref was sparked about two months before the sting was launched when Aref's name, phone number and Albany address were found in a notebook recovered from a bombed-out Iraqi encampment that the government contends was occupied by terrorists, according to court records.

Prosecutors also have laid out detailed allegations tying Aref to high-ranking terrorist groups in the Middle East, and he is facing several immigration-related charges for allegedly lying about the connections, which his attorneys dispute. Aref has admitted he met people who the U.S. government has labeled terrorist figures, but he has denied being involved with their causes.

Authorities have not lodged any similar allegations against Hossain.

Aref and Hossain were arrested in August 2004 on a 19-count indictment charging them with money laundering in connection with a plot to sell grenade launchers to terrorists. The government subsequently added more charges, including allegations the men conspired to provide material support to a Pakistani terrorist group, although the support was in the form of taking part in the FBI sting. There was never any real terrorist plot.

Hossain, a Bangladeshi immigrant who has lived in Albany for more than two decades, claims he was drawn into the plot by an overzealous FBI informant.

But part of the FBI's strongest evidence in the case is an undercover surveillance videotape that shows the informant holding a surface-to-air missile launcher as the men chatted inside the informant's Central Avenue storefront. During the meeting, the informant told Hossain that they would earn money through the sale of the weapons.

Aref is an Iraqi-born religious scholar who was hired as imam at the Masjid As Salam mosque on Central Avenue soon after he arrived in the United States seven years ago. Aref and Hossain had been free on bond while their case is pending, but Aref's freedom was revoked by a federal judge last September when federal prosecutors filed a superseding indictment that contained allegations of Aref's past ties to terrorist organizations.

The trial is expected to take about a month.

The Case Of The Globe-trotting Grocer (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, September 13, 2006

CHICAGO - Sitting next to Muhammad Salah on a courtroom bench, it is hard to keep him in focus. The physical presence doesn't jibe with legal papers describing him as a terrorist kingpin with blood on his hands.

The 53-year-old Palestinian-American from Bridgeview, Ill., seems remarkably calm for someone facing the possibility of spending the rest of his life behind bars. He projects the kind of inner peace ascribed to the great Christian mystics - or, perhaps more aptly in this instance, the Sufis of the Islamic world.

He is given to speaking in aphorisms.

"People are slaves to politics," he said during one of the pretrial skirmishes at the Dirksen Federal Building, where his criminal trial is scheduled to open in early October. He is accused of providing material support to a foreign terrorist group and lying under oath by denying that he was a member of Hamas, a group officially designated by the U.S. as a terrorist organization and now the majority party in the Palestinian legislature.

When Salah was charged two years ago, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft heralded it as a vindication of the USA Patriot Act, the controversial terrorism-fighting tool forged by the Bush administration in the wake of Sept. 11.

"Today, terrorists have lost yet another source of financing and support for their bombs and bloodshed," Ashcroft said in announcing the indictment by a federal grand jury of Salah and two co-defendants, including Mousa Mohammed Abu Marzook, a top leader of Hamas' political wing.

Given the White House's highly publicized strategy of maintaining a courtroom front in the war on terrorism, the government has bet a lot of chips on its prosecution of Salah and his alleged co-conspirators.

Yet there was a point in 2000 when the case appeared to have been dropped. The Justice Department shut down without fanfare its long-running investigation of Salah and Hamas.

The current reversal of that decision epitomizes the Salah case, which besides raising civil libertarians' hackles, is also a saga with more twists and turns than a John le Carre spy novel.

It includes enough bureaucratic infighting to send shivers up the spines of citizens who'd like to think of their government as a shield against a repeat of the World Trade Center tragedy. It even has a cameo appearance by Judith Miller, the former New York Times reporter, who went from hero to goat after refusing to testify in the White House leak investigation.

Submitted as a movie script, the story might elicit a Hollywood producer's critique: "Fascinating yarn, but needs simplifying."

Progress Cutting Off Terror Funds Cited (AP)

The United States has made progress in the last five years in trying to shut down avenues for terrorists to raise and move money but challenges remain, Bush administration officials told Congress Tuesday.

Testifying before the Senate Banking Committee, Treasury Department official Daniel Glaser underscored the importance of the United States working closely with international allies to share information. The goal, he said, is to thwart terrorist financiers and improve coordination of this information among agencies.

Glaser said authorities must stay ahead of terrorist financiers who not only try to use the traditional banking system to move money but also other methods, including cash couriers, trafficking of drugs, weapons and precious metals and jewels.

"We must adjust the development and application of our financial tools as terrorists and other threats adapt their financing methods and as we continue to learn how to improve our efforts," said Glaser, Treasury's deputy assistant secretary for terrorist financing and financial crimes.

The committee's chairman, Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., agreed, saying: "We must be mindful of our enemies' ability to adapt." Even though "memories fade," the country must remain vigilant, Shelby said.

The remarks came one day after observances for the 5th anniversary of the terror attacks on New York and Washington.

Since the attacks, the United States has designated a total of 460 people and entities as providing financial support for terrorists, Treasury officials said. Those actions mean that any bank accounts or financial assets found in the United States belonging to them are frozen and Americans are barred from doing business with them.

Glaser and other Treasury officials testifying at the hearing also told lawmakers about the government's efforts to financially clamp down on Iran and North Korea — two countries with nuclear ambitions. The United States says that Iran is a big source of funds for terrorist groups, including Hezbollah.

The international community needs to do more to put the financial squeeze on Hezbollah, Glaser said.

At times over the last five years, the Treasury Department had come under criticism for its efforts to combat terrorist financiers. The government, however, did get high marks for its efforts from the 9/11 commission.

More recently, some lawmakers expressed concerned that they weren't briefed early on about a secret program, started shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, which gives the government access to a massive international data base of financial information to track suspected terrorist financiers.

The existence of the program was revealed by news organizations in late June, a disclosure that the administration said could hobble future efforts to nab terrorist financiers.

The United States also is focusing more energy on the difficult job of trying to come up with ways to better pin down shell companies in the United States that are used to move money or hide money for terrorist financiers, drug lords and other criminals, Glaser said.

English Woods A Suspected Cover For Terror (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan And Mary Jordan

LYNDHURST, England, Sept. 12 -- Jake, an arthritic Labrador retriever, slept beneath an ancient oak tree in a warm September breeze. Ponies roamed untethered, children kicked pine cones along gravel forest paths, and Edith Jones stood outside her camper wondering how such a tranquil spot had become, according to police, a training ground for terrorists.

Yassin Mutegombwa, 22, a London resident whose family is from Uganda, was charged in court Tuesday with receiving training for terrorism on British soil, the first person to be charged under a law enacted this year. According to a statement from Scotland Yard, he received weapons training in two rural English locations, including "at a woodland area" near Jones's campsite outside this village in southwestern England in late April and early June.

"This hits quite close to home," said Jones, 45, who has been coming to Matley Wood Campsite 80 miles southwest of London for more than 20 years. She said it was hard to believe that her idyllic camp, in the heart of national forest established as a hunting area by William the Conqueror in 1079, is suddenly caught up in the global struggle against Islamic extremism.

The charges against Mutegombwa illustrate increasing worry in Britain that violent extremists are not only being recruited from the country's large Muslim population but also are being trained here. Officials say some of the training may have taken place at popular paintball fields.

A Scotland Yard spokesman on Tuesday said that domestic terror training was "clearly recognized as a problem" and that the Terrorism Act of 2006 specifically included a new broad offense of receiving training that could be used for terrorism.

Police privately said that the camps were not formal military-style camps, but rather places in the countryside where would-be terrorists gathered to bond, plan and sometimes take part in weapons training. As part of the inquiry into the July 2005 suicide attacks on the London public transit system, police have investigated a rafting trip in north Wales by two of the four bombers shortly before the attacks.

British authorities have also said that they suspect some radicals are using the sport of paintball, in which players dressed in combat uniforms shoot one another with balls filled with colored liquid, as a method of learning military-style tactics. A property owner who spoke on condition of anonymity said he had been told that police were monitoring a wooded paintball site in the Lyndhurst area.

In Northern Virginia, 11 men were recently convicted in what prosecutors called a "jihad network" that among other things involved playing paintball in wooded areas of Virginia.

Ian Horton, who runs the Paintball Park in Landford, a few miles north of the Matley Wood camp, said he recalled no suspicious customers at his park and said police would be wasting their time by watching his business for potential extremist activity. "I don't see where a terrorist gets any benefit from paintball," he said.

Peter Neumann, director of the Center for Defense Studies at King's College in London, said "in one sense it's surprising" that young Muslims would engage in terror training in the English countryside. But with 60 million people on an island the size of Minnesota, he said, there are still places to go off and not be seen.

During the court case of radical cleric Abu Hamza Masri, who was convicted this year of inciting murder and racial hatred, Neumann said, evidence was presented that he would take followers out to the countryside for "camping trips" where they could

"try out new weapons, engage in physical exercise and receive religious indoctrination." Neumann said those who excelled in British camps were then sent on to Afghanistan and Pakistan for "serious military training."

Mutegombwa was charged with three counts of receiving training that could be used for terrorism. His younger brother Hassan Mutegombwa was charged with procuring money for terrorism.

A third person, Musa Akmet, 47, was charged with illegal possession of a 16mm mini-flare launcher. Akmet and a fourth defendant, Mustafa Abdullah, were also accused of possessing "a record containing information of a kind likely to be useful to a person committing an act of terrorism."

In a central London court Tuesday, both Mutegombwa brothers, dressed in white sweat suits, waved to people in the public gallery, including women completely veiled except for their eyes, as they were led out of the courtroom.

At Matley Wood about 25 campers were parked at some of the 70 sites set in a forest of oaks and silver birches.

Jones and her husband, Raymond, said anyone acting suspiciously would stand out in a place where many of the regulars have been coming for decades. But they said gunshots in the 220-square mile New Forest National Park are not unusual because park officials shoot deer to reduce the population and poachers sometimes hunt at night. They suggested the British easygoing manner might make it easier for potential terrorists to operate.

"We are a nation of trusting people," Edith Jones said.

Replied her husband: "Maybe we should start to not trust people so much."

4 Men Held In British Raids Are To Remain In Custody (NYT)

By Karla Adam And Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WHITE WALTHAM, England, Sept. 12 — Residents and employees at two recreation sites that have been cited in court documents as possible terrorist training camps expressed puzzlement on Tuesday, though one person said his resort had attracted police attention before.

“This place is not the least bit linked to terrorism,” said Mick Holdaway, the owner of a leafy, 98-acre complex called Pondwood Farm near this town west of London that offers such pursuits as paintball shooting, bungee jumping and fishing.

On Tuesday, four men who were arrested in a series of police raids across London on Sept. 1 were ordered to be kept in custody, one day after they were charged with terrorism-related offenses.

One of the men, Ugandan-born Yassin Mutegombwa, 22, was charged on three counts of weapons training “for the purposes connected with the commission or preparation of acts of terrorism’’ near Pondwood Farm on June 18 and near the Matley Wood Caravan and Camping site in Lyndhurst, on England’s south coast, from April 28 to May 1 and June 2 to June 4.

As Mr. Holdaway, 56, strolled through Pondwood Farm’s 14-acre paintball site, he said the area had been under surveillance by the police Special Branch since just after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and by the antiterrorism squad since 2004.

“The Special Branch came here just after 9/11,’’ Mr. Holdaway said. “They asked, ‘Do you get brothers over in your paintball area doing training?’ Then two years ago the antiterrorism squad came and said, ‘Is it O.K. that we do surveillance?’ I said, ‘Yes’ to both, ‘feel free.’ I’m a family man and if anything like that is going on, I want to know about it.’’

“If someone came here and played paintball but had an ulterior motive for weapons training, well, that’s not at all my fault,’’ he said. “Certainly no one I knew of received any training.’’

The manager of the paintball facility is Shahid Chowdhary, a 42-year-old father of eight who leases the site from Mr. Holdaway and who described himself as a staunch Muslim.

“Every person who plays paintball signs a disclaimer, and not only don’t I know Yassin, I have never seen his name,’’ Mr. Chowdhary said in a telephone interview. The disclaimer, he said, includes personal details to identify those who play paintball.

“The only weapons we have are paintball guns,’’ he said. “If I came across something suspicious, I would tell a policeman straightaway. I abhor terrorism, and it is not Islam.’’

The forest floor where paintball is played was dotted with purple paint pellets on Tuesday. There was one area with rows of knee-high boards that had faces printed on them — including one of Saddam Hussein in military garb — that were splattered with purple paint. There were several wooden shacks and a cluster of log huts and fences that Mr. Holdaway called the Vietcong Village.

Mr. Mutegombwa was also charged with attending a site near Matley Wood Caravan and Camping for weapons training.

Christine Saunders, a 56-year-old retired florist, said she pitched her green mobile home there in March, a month before Mr. Mutegombwa is said to have first visited the area.

"There have been no suspicions or rumors here all summer,'' she said in an interview. "It's quiet here. That's why we like it.''

The four men who appeared at a magistrates' court in central London on Tuesday were among 14 arrested in the Sept. 1 police raids. The raids were part of a police hunt for terrorist recruiters and trainers and not related to the Aug. 10 security alert surrounding what police called a conspiracy by Islamic radicals to bomb trans-Atlantic airliners.

Mustafa Abdullah, 24, and Musa Akmet, 47, were charged with one count of possessing information likely to be useful to a terrorist. Mr. Akmet was also charged with illegal possession of a 16- millimeter mini-flare launcher. Hassan Mutegombwa, 20, Yassin's brother, was charged with one count of procuring financing for terrorism. The British Press Association said the charge was related to seeking money for a one-way airline ticket to Kenya.

Lawyers for all the men except Mr. Akmet said their clients would plead not guilty to the charges.

Even Safety Czar Thinks British Are Too Risk-Averse (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

LONDON, Sept. 12 — One of the received wisdoms about British life is that it is full of picayune rules that are meant to prevent injuries and accidents but are in fact patently ridiculous. Antigovernment newspapers delight in promoting the notion of a country ruled by what they call "political correctness gone mad," describing how, for example, a fire department in Devon removed its traditional firemen's pole last year, apparently on the grounds that it is safer to use the stairs.

So it came as a surprise when Bill Callaghan, who as head of the country's Health and Safety Commission is supposedly responsible for such decisions, appeared on television last month to urge Britons to "get a life." Even more surprisingly, perhaps, he did so while engaging in a relatively high-risk activity: sailing (although he was wearing a life preserver).

But to Britons who have accepted the notion that no one is allowed to do anything fun anymore, and that it is the government's fault, Mr. Callaghan's message was met with some skepticism. Indeed, as he would be the first to admit, his agency has a major public-relations problem. "I was getting pretty angry with all the stories which mentioned Health and Safety — capital H, capital S — as stopping people from doing ordinary, worthwhile things," he said in a recent interview.

His irritation spurred him to action and to his new campaign to put a reasonable human face on the Health and Safety Commission, whose job is to recommend and oversee Britain's safety regulations.

"Our mission is to improve people's health and safety at work, and if people think it's all about petty bureaucratic rules, then we're not being successful," he said. "People say, 'We can't do this because Health and Safety won't let us.' "

Safety at work is no laughing matter, Mr. Callaghan, formerly the chief economist at the Trades Union Congress, said indignantly. Last year, he noted, 220 people were killed on the job. In the late 1960's — before the passage of the landmark Health and Safety at Work Act of 1974, which among other things established his agency and its sister, the Health and Safety Executive — the annual figure was about 1,200 deaths.

Britain has indeed become more risk-averse in recent years, largely because of a pervasive public fear of American-style litigation. But as Mr. Callaghan points out, payouts in liability cases in Britain are far lower than they are in the United States — about one-third as much per capita — and most lawsuits are dismissed before ever getting to trial.

By the same token, he said, he believes that many of the decisions made in the name of health and safety in Britain are indeed asinine. These include schools requiring children to wear protective goggles when playing with nuts that have fallen from trees; schools banning bandages because of fears of latex allergies; and village fairs forbidding people to sell homemade cakes in case they contain contaminated eggs.

But the commission is blamed for them anyway. It set up a myth-busting page on its Web site explaining, for instance, that it was not involved in the decision last April to cancel a St. George's Day breakfast in Wiltshire, after local officials ruled that the volunteer cooks were not formally trained in egg preparation.

Some of the examples are more ambiguous, though, illustrating how hard it can be to walk the line between traditional stiff-upper-lipness and modern caution. In another example on the Web site, the agency rebuts an article claiming that it has forbidden window washers to use ladders, lest they fall off. Ian Greenwood, who is identified as the head of the agency's "Falls From Height Program," is quoted as saying that ladders can indeed be used, as long as the "task is low-risk and of short duration," and all safer, non-ladder alternatives have been ruled out.

Mr. Greenwood notes that 14 people died, and more than 1,000 were injured, after falling from ladders in 2004. He directs interested parties to the agency's sensible-ladder-use campaign, which includes the publication, "Safe Use of Ladders and Stepladders."

Even if it is incorrect, the prevailing notion that every mishap ends with someone suing someone else has irrevocably changed Britons' mind-sets. Children who leave their coats and bags in special containers on field trips to the Science Museum in London, for example, are instructed by posted signs not to put anything on the lids, on account of Health and Safety rules. People buying cups of tea on British trains are ordered to carry them in paper bags for safety reasons — whether they want to or not.

Sailing down the placid Thames a year ago as part of the celebration marking the 200th anniversary of the Battle of Trafalgar, the actor playing Lord Nelson was required to accessorize his vintage admiral's outfit with a contemporary life preserver, which tended to spoil the effect.

Nor are the Health and Safety Commission offices, at the end of Southwark Bridge in East London, immune to dispensing their own cautionary advice. Along with security passes, visitors are issued photocopied pamphlets offering instructions on how to identify the sound of the fire alarm (a "continuous ringing of bells"); where to go if a fire does break out (convene at the location marked on the map on the back); and what to do if they feel sick or fall down (there is a first-aid room on the first floor; all injuries, "no matter how minor," must be reported).

The agency's new charm offensive has had mixed results. "Nanny-in-Chief Confesses," The Daily Mail wrote approvingly about Mr. Callaghan's campaign, as if he were a Mao-era Chinese official engaging in ritual self-criticism. But in The Sunday Times of London, the columnist Roland White said, "For him to attack the nanny state is a bit like the chairman of the Football Association complaining that high wages are ruining the game."

But Mr. Callaghan is on the skeptics' side, he says, having experienced annoyingly overzealous regulations himself. After his 17-year-old son's class traveled to upstate New York for a school ski trip, he said, students were forbidden to swim in the hotel pool with children from other schools, because their school's risk assessors had determined that it was too dangerous.

Mr. Callaghan was just as exasperated as you would be, if it were your child's school, and please don't blame the Health and Safety Commission. "It's not something we would get involved in," he said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House, Dems Divided On Bush Speech (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, September 12, 2006

The White House quarreled with Democrats Tuesday over whether President Bush was trying to win political points by using a Sept. 11 anniversary speech to defend the war in Iraq and his war on terror.

Bush spokesman Tony Snow said although there were "three or four sentences" in the president's 17-minute address Monday night that could be considered controversial, Bush took pains not to be partisan. He said Bush had to discuss the dominant issue of Iraq, but he wasn't "picking fights" or making any demands of Congress.

"This was not a speech that was designed to single out anybody for partisan reasons, but gave the president's honest reflections and reactions to what has happened since September 11, 2001," Snow said. "The president decided that yesterday wasn't a day for partisanship."

Democrats, in a campaign to win control of Congress from the president's Republican Party, charged that Bush was using a national day of mourning for partisan gain. Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said Tuesday that Bush was "more consumed by staying the course in Iraq and playing election-year politics."

"The American people deserved better last night," Reid said in a statement. "They deserved a chance to reclaim that sense of unity, purpose and patriotism that swept through our country five years ago."

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, shot back at Democrats Tuesday: "I wonder if they're more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people," he said at a news conference. "They certainly don't want to take the terrorists on and defeat them."

In the speech broadcast in prime time on the fifth anniversary of the terror attacks, the president described a brutal enemy still determined to kill Americans, perhaps with weapons of mass destruction if they get the chance.

"If we do not defeat these enemies now, we will leave our children to face a Middle East overrun by terrorist states and radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons," Bush said. "We are in a war that will set the course for this new century and determine the destiny of millions across the world."

Bush began with a two-minute tribute to the nearly 3,000 victims of the Sept. 11 attacks, but most of his 17-minute speech was devoted to justifying his foreign policy since that day. With his party's control of Congress at stake in elections less than two months away, Bush suggested that political opponents who are calling for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq would be giving victory to the terrorists.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone," Bush said from the Oval Office, with a photo of his twin daughters and the American flag behind him. "They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

While Democrats have been using public opposition to the Iraq war to argue for a change of leadership in Congress, Bush's prime-time address showed how he has been able to use the power of incumbency to command public attention and make his points. Democrats objected to the tone.

"The president should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning to commandeer the airwaves to give a speech that was designed not to unite the country and commemorate the fallen but to seek support for a war in Iraq that he has admitted had nothing to do with 9/11," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said in a statement. "There will be time to debate this president's policies in Iraq. September 11th is not that time."

On Monday, dozens of lawmakers from both parties put aside the campaigning and joined on the steps of the Capitol to remember the attacks. Together they sang "God Bless America" as they had five years ago.

"Partisanship would have been the one casualty the American people would have accepted following 9/11, but it remains the one thing the president refuses to give up," Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic effort to win control of the House, said after the president's speech.

Snow noted that Emanuel, Kennedy and other Democrats attacked the speech shortly after the president was finished speaking, suggesting they were the ones who injected politics. "It appears that there had been a desire immediately after the speech to go ahead and make partisan points," he said.

Bush said Iraq is part of the United States' post-Sept. 11 approach to threats abroad. Going on offense against enemies before they could harm Americans meant removing the Taliban from power in Afghanistan, pursuing members of al-Qaida and seeking regime change in Iraq, Bush said. At least 2,670 U.S. servicemen and women have died in Iraq.

"I am often asked why we are in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," Bush said. "The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat.

"America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I," Bush said. "But the war is not over, and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

Although his administration has been criticized for trying to link Osama bin Laden to Baghdad, Bush made further comparisons between the al-Qaida leader and Iraq. The president quoted bin Laden as saying the battle in Iraq is the "Third World War" that could bring America's "defeat and disgrace forever."

"If we yield Iraq to men like bin Laden," Bush said, "our enemies will be emboldened, they will gain a new safe haven, and they will use Iraq's resources to fuel their extremist movement. We will not allow this to happen."

Bush delivered a message to bin Laden and other terrorists who are still on the run. "No matter how long it takes, America will find you, and we will bring you to justice," Bush said.

In The Debate On Security, Perhaps A Misstep Or Two (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Elapsed time between the conclusion of President Bush's speech Monday night on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the first Democratic charge that he had politicized the tragedy: 20 minutes.

White House reaction: an appearance of glee.

Next steps: to be determined by conditions on the ground.

With the White House having wrapped up the first phase of its all-out effort to gain control of this fall's political narrative by casting the Iraq war as part of an epochal struggle against tyranny, both parties are confronting questions about their tactics as they head into the homestretch of the campaign.

Did the Democrats play into Mr. Bush's hands when Senator Edward M. Kennedy said Monday night that the president should have been ashamed of his speech, giving the White House a chance to intensify the national security debate against just the kind of liberal opponent it relishes? Did Mr. Bush overplay his hand by turning what had been billed as a nonpartisan commemoration of the attacks into what his opponents called a political defense of the war?

Democrats said they had initially planned to avoid any sort of partisan response to Mr. Bush's address. But they said they changed their minds within minutes and followed up on Tuesday by attacking the administration over its record on port security and other efforts to protect Americans at home. Late Tuesday, they released a letter to the television networks asking for equal time to deliver responses to Mr. Bush's future national security addresses.

At the White House, Tony Snow, Mr. Bush's spokesman, could hardly disguise his eagerness to go before the cameras to engage the Democrats on turf that Republicans have come to consider their own. He invited reporters who posed questions to him in the morning about Democratic complaints about the speech to ask again at his regular televised briefing, where he said Democrats were politicizing the anniversary and reasserted the White House line that a withdrawal from Iraq would turn it into a terrorist base.

On Capitol Hill, Republicans took an even harder line, questioning Democrats' commitment to fighting terrorists. Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, the majority leader, said of the Democrats, "I wonder if they're more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the minority leader, responded, "Haven't we moved beyond the fact that Republicans are trying to save us from the terrorists and Democrats aren't?"

But in a sign that there may be limits to how far each side is willing to go in the debate, Mr. Snow initially dodged questions about whether the president condoned Mr. Boehner's remarks. When Mr. Snow was directly asked whether he believed Democrats were more intent on protecting terrorists than Americans, he answered flatly, "No."

And a senior Republican official, who spoke candidly about political strategy only on the condition of anonymity, expressed some unease with Mr. Boehner's language.

But even some Democrats said they winced when Senator Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, was among the first to criticize the president, allowing the White House, for one news cycle at least, to frame the debate as one between the two men.

At the heart of both parties' calculations are competing visions of what will ultimately move people to the polls this fall. Democrats say they are convinced that with the continued violence in Iraq, a continued stream of threat videos produced by Al Qaeda, and a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, Republicans have handed their national security edge to the Democrats.

"Given the basic environment is in our direction, you have to stand up to them every time and show strength and that you are not afraid of them," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "That's what we have done over the past few weeks, and we are very happy with the results."

Democrats are taking their fight to the Congressional floor. On Tuesday, Mr. Reid sought to add a broad package of Democratic security proposals to a port security measure in the Senate, drawing complaints from Republicans that he was effectively blocking crucial legislation.

In the House, Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, plans to introduce a resolution of no confidence in Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. If the Republican leadership does not allow a vote, as is likely, Democrats will then begin a petition to force the resolution to the floor.

Acknowledging that Democrats have to be careful to look like more than complainers, Jim Jordan, a Democratic strategist, said, "Of course it's better for the party if we are defining ourselves as muscular and ready to defend the country."

But pointing to polls showing a smaller gap between the parties on national security, he said the Democrats had "fundamentally shifted public perceptions of which party is better able to defend the nation just in terms of domestic security."

Republicans disagree, pointing to successive Republican victories in the past two major elections, each of which was fought over national security policy. In both of those campaigns, critics said Republicans were overplaying their hands and predicted backlashes that did not come to pass. And Republicans have been quick to exploit continued divisions among Democrats over how to proceed in Iraq, often seeking to define the Democratic Party on the basis of positions taken by its more liberal members.

"When they make these outrageous statements on national security and try to politicize that issue, that plays to our advantage," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for the House speaker, Representative J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois. "We've chosen the grounds of national security; they're trying to play on our field."

With control of the White House and both chambers of Congress, Republicans say they plan to run the legislative show in the coming days with bills codifying the president's domestic spying program and the military tribunal system for detained terrorism suspects, though Republicans in the Senate, including John McCain of Arizona, oppose crucial parts of the tribunal legislation.

To goad the effort along, Mr. Bush plans to meet Thursday with Congressional Republicans on Capitol Hill for a closed-door session. And Tuesday, after he met with a group of conservative columnists, National Review Online quoted Mr. Bush as saying that he would have faced loud criticism had he not mentioned Iraq on Monday night, and that his goal was to highlight the stakes in this campaign.

Still, even some Republicans had doubts about how much the new national security campaign would help in a climate both sides see as tough.

"I don't think the inside-the-beltway discussion about political tit-for-tat makes any difference in the majority of races around the country," said Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire.

GOP Heightens Security Offensive (RC)

By Susan Davis And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

With cautious hopes that the political winds may be turning in their favor, Republicans in both chambers are accelerating their election-year offensive this week with fundraising pitches, heightened rhetorical attacks on Democrats and a rare Thursday visit from President Bush.

"Hopefully we're back on the offensive on the issues that have worked for us and that Democrats are traditionally weak on," said one senior GOP Senate aide. "We're going to focus on a couple key issues to get traction on and try to ratchet up the momentum."

Echoing the style of his predecessor, former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) fired at Congressional Democrats on Tuesday during his weekly session with reporters, going so far as to suggest Democrats sympathize more with terrorists than their constituents.

"I listen to the questions today and I listen to my Democrat friends, and I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people," Boehner said.

When asked if he intended to imply that Democrats were treasonous, he responded. "No, I made it clear [that] sometimes I wonder — that is what I said — I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists. They certainly do not want to take the terrorists on and defeat them."

Earlier Tuesday, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), along with other senior House and Senate Democrats, had blasted Bush's Monday address to the nation for continuing to equate the Iraq War with a broader war on terrorism.

Pelosi fired back at Boehner, accusing him and other Republicans of resorting "to the desperation politics of fear." Added Pelosi, "It's time for real leadership against terrorism, not just Republicans' half-truths and scare tactics. The American people will see through the Republicans' cynical tactics and choose a new direction in the war against terror."

Yet Republicans are only heightening their offensive on Democrats, with GOP leadership aides coordinating message points and media releases with their rank-and-file members in order to define Pelosi specifically and Democrats in general on national security.

Bush's Thursday visit to the House Republican Conference will add momentum to their efforts as the administration works with Congress to authorize the president's actions, which were recently struck down in courts on military detainees, wire-tapping and surveillance of suspected terrorists.

"I think he has not been up in a while, and he thought it would be a good idea," Boehner told reporters. "I just think having the president interact with our Members has always been good for our team. ... We work closely with the White House and providing this kind of a forum I think is good for the president and good for our members."

Boehner downplayed suggestions that a Bush appearance may not aid vulnerable GOP incumbents, many of whom have been running campaigns that separate themselves from the president on the issues.

"I have not really seen anybody running away from the president. Frankly, I think that would be a very big mistake," he said. "I have no fears about losing our majority, none whatsoever."

On the campaign front, House Republicans will meet at the Capitol Hill Club this morning for the second-to-last fundraising pitch for the National Republican Congressional Committee's Battleground program, which raises money for their most vulnerable incumbents.

House Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) is chairing this year's effort and is tasked with raising $17.5 million for the cycle. Rob Collins, a spokesman for Cantor, said they have collected more than $11 million so far from rank-and-file members.

"We're excited about the progress in that we feel that we're ahead of the aggressive pace Mr. Reynolds set for us," Collins said, adding that Cantor will "absolutely" meet the fundraising goal

Across the Capitol, Republican Senators also are putting in place the final pieces of their pre-election game plan — hoping to put Senate Democrats on the defensive as they push through a multitiered security agenda that puts them back in the political driver's seat.

While Republican House Members will meet with Bush, Senators got some face time Tuesday with White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and Vice President Cheney at their weekly policy luncheon. Republicans in both chambers are hoping to use the next three weeks to push through a series of homeland security measures, beginning with passage this week of port security legislation, and later by passing bills to provide executive authority to engage in terrorist surveillance and to deal with the rights of suspected terrorist detainees.

That legislative agenda will be coupled with a multimillion-dollar message and ground game designed to define Democrats as weak on national security and the broader war on terrorism.

GOP Senators say that unlike their House counterparts, they have little fear of losing their chamber to the Democrats. But they remain worried about holding onto their six-seat hold in the Senate that most observers predict is in jeopardy.

"There's surely a greater focus," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said when asked about the current Republican mood.

On Tuesday, several GOP Senators and aides suggested that while the landscape may not have done an about face, the climate has improved in part because of President Bush's recent media blitz on the war, as well as their own attempts to unify around a keep America safe message. Also adding to their new-found momentum are a series of global events that show Republican strength on defense matters such as the foiled terrorist plot to blow up airliners bound for the United States.

"November is still a long way away," said one Senate Republican aide. "But today's a hell of a lot better than it was two months ago."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said with less than two months to go until the election, he believes there is still time to move voters, saying: "Most people don't make up their mind until 48 hours before."

A high-level Republican Senate aide suggested his party came into September fearing the worst, given the daily dose of media reports and pundit speculation predicting sweeping Democratic success on Nov. 7.

But September has shown some positive signs for Republicans, this aide said, and said that rather than "running around with our heads in our hands, we are being aggressive."

"The expectations were set so high for the Democrats that the fact there isn't a blood bath after August, buoys a lot of people," this aide said. "When you look at the landscape it's not nuclear winter."

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) said he remains optimistic about his party's chances this fall, and believes that Republicans are making clear to voters that they are the best party to keep them safe. If that message is conveyed effectively, the electorate will keep the GOP in charge this November, he said.

"I still think most of my colleagues are in agreement that we will hold our majority in the Senate," Coleman said. "There's no panic. I think we are running scared in a healthy way."

Democrats aren't ceding any ground, however. Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) said voters are wise to the Republicans' election-year maneuvers, and predicted the GOP will fail.

He said Republicans may have seen success on the security platform in the past, but voters no longer side with their foreign policies, and Democrats, for their part, have learned to stand up and fight back.

"The only thing that is going to stunt Democratic momentum is a change in course," Schumer said. "People want a change in course. People aren't happy."

Republicans, Dems Trade Jabs On War (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 13, 2006

GOP leaders in the House have signaled their support for a controversial White House plan establishing the legal framework to try suspected terrorists just as vulnerable Republicans seek to distance themselves from the president.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) pledged strong support yesterday for House language backed by the administration creating military tribunals for detained terrorist suspects.

In doing so, Boehner also seized on remarks made by his Democratic counterpart downplaying the effect of capturing Osama bin Laden.

"I listen to my Democrats friends, and I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people," Boehner told reporters yesterday.

White House spokesman Tony Snow indicated he did not share Boehner's point of view when asked about the comments. And Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) fired off his own vitriolic reaction.

"I wonder if John Boehner is more interested in protecting his majority than protecting the American people," he said in a statement. "Instead of coming up with new ways to scare Americans into voting Republican, George Bush and John Boehner ought to be doing what needs to be done to secure our country."

Over the weekend, Pelosi appeared at a press conference that was supposed to be devoted to taking the administration to task for not doing more in the war against terrorism.

"And if [bin Laden] is caught tomorrow, it is five years too late. He has done more damage the longer he has been out there," she told reporters. "But, in fact, the damage that he has done is done. And even to capture him now I don't think makes us any safer."

Rank-and-file Republicans are expected to join Boehner later this week in attacking the minority leader for her remarks, Republican leadership aides in the House said yesterday.

"We're going to expose how weak the Democrats' rhetoric and record is on national security and fighting terrorism," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "The Democrat leader wants to give up on catching terrorists, provide classified information to terrorist suspects and cut and run from Iraq."

But Republicans may have a problem with this strategy. On Meet the Press this Sunday, Vice President Dick Cheney also expressed doubt over the impact of catching bin Laden.

"He's not the only source of the problem, obviously…" Cheney said. "If you killed him tomorrow, you'd still have a problem with al-Qaeda, with Zawahiri and the others. But bin Laden has been a top priority for us from the very beginning, he continues to be a top priority today."

Pelosi responded by accusing Republicans of resorting to the politics of fear rather than defending their own "failed" record on terrorism.

"If Mr. Boehner has a concern with the Hamdan decision, he should take it to the U.S. Supreme Court, where a majority of the justices found that Mr. Bush was operating outside of the rule of law," she said in a statement.

Pelosi and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) also sent a letter yesterday to the presidents of network news companies calling on them to devote more coverage to House and Senate Democrats if they continue to give extensive airtime to President Bush's national security speeches.

"In order to provide the American people with complete information to make the best choices come Election Day, we ask that you commit your network to providing fair and equitable coverage to the viewpoints of both Republicans and Democrats on these crucial national security debates," they wrote.

The war of words comes as both chambers ready legislation to legitimize military tribunals the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional in June. Republicans have made national security the thrust of their reelection efforts to hold the House despite the increasingly unpopular Iraq war.

Although GOP leaders in the House and Senate continue to support President Bush, rank-and-file Republicans in competitive seats are moving further away from the White House on a number of issues.

House Republicans in suburban Philadelphia, for instance, have run ads and sent direct mail pieces distancing themselves from the president on immigration and Iraq.

Bush is scheduled to address GOP lawmakers in the House tomorrow during a rare closed-door session where he is expected to offer words of encouragement heading into the critical midterm elections.

Pelosi's remarks over the weekend contradicts a major plank of the "real security" proposal congressional Democrats introduced earlier this year; the elimination of bin Laden and the al-Qaeda leadership was a principal objective of that proposal.

Boehner also criticized Democrats for backing proposed changes to the House bill establishing these tribunals that would allow defendants to view classified information being used against them.

"These are terrorists," Boehner said. "Providing a terrorist with classified information puts our troops in jeopardy."

The Supreme Court ruled that the previous program was unconstitutional in part because defendants were not allowed to view some of the evidence used against them.

The rhetorical battle coincides with another potentially tough negotiation with the House and Senate over the creation of these tribunals.

In addition to preventing suspected terrorists from viewing classified evidence being used against them, the House bill, which largely resembles proposed White House legislation, also would allow military prosecutors to use hearsay evidence as well as testimony obtained through coercion.

A trio of powerful Republican senators on the Armed Services Committee, including the chairman, Sen John Warner (R-Va.), as well as Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) raised significant objections last week to all three provisions.

Democrats on the House Armed Serives Committee were expected to meet last night to decide how to respond to their own concerns with these three issues, one Democratic aide said. They were deciding yesterday whether to offer amendments or a substitute bill during today's markup that would allow suspected terrorists to view the classified evidence and prohibit hearsay testimony and testimony acquired through coercion.

As the debate advances, Republicans in the House will even make a small semantics change in the tribunals themselves by calling them "terrorist tribunals" instead of "military tribunals" in order to shift the emphasis to those being tried rather than the people trying them, according to GOP leadership aides.

White House Defends 9/11 Reference To Iraq War (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

President Bush accomplished his goal of calling for unity while portraying the fight ahead of the United States during his Monday night Oval Office address, the White House said yesterday, as it fended off charges that the president politicized the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks.

"The president did not want to try to turn this into a Democrats-versus-the-Republicans thing, but you cannot talk about the war on terror without talking about Iraq," White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday.

"And furthermore, you can't talk about September 11th, especially when Osama bin Laden himself says Iraq is at the center of all this, without mentioning it."

On Capitol Hill, Mr. Bush's speech stiffened the spines of Republicans who have grown weary of defending an unpopular war heading into a tight election season. Yesterday, they were back to skewering Democrats as harshly as ever.

"I listen to my Democrat friends, and I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said yesterday.

In particular, he noted Democratic objections -- shared by a handful of Republicans -- to the Bush administration's handling of terrorism suspects held at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Mr. Bush on Monday night called for unity behind the war on terror and defended Iraq as a central part of that war in a prime-time address from the Oval Office, televised by the major networks.

Almost immediately, Democrats slammed Mr. Bush, with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts saying the president should "be ashamed" and the chairman of both House and Senate Democrats' political campaign committees accusing him of doing a disservice to the day. They objected to his defense of the war in Iraq and said he was wrong to tie it into the terrorist attacks from five years ago.

"To try to make partisan gain out of such tragedy dishonors all those we lost on September 11," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said yesterday, calling the speech an attempt "to distract from his failures in Iraq."

The fight is playing out on Capitol Hill, where the House is considering a resolution commemorating the five-year mark since the attacks.

Mr. Boehner blasted Democrats for refusing to accept what in past years has been a noncontroversial resolution because it contains references to eight pieces of legislation that Congress has approved in the past five years in an effort to combat terrorism.

"What is being objected to is a list of the bills that Congress passed in response to 9/11," Mr. Boehner said yesterday. "All of the bills passed with broad bipartisan support. It is a fact that they passed. And I, for the life of me, I have no idea what the objection is."

Three of the bills mentioned in the draft resolution passed almost unanimously, and two others passed with support from most Democrats. The most partisanvote was last year's immigration legislation, which picked up support from 36 Democrats in the House.

"We're going to expose how weak the Democrats' rhetoric and record is on national security. The Democratic leader wants to give up on catching terrorists, provide classified information to terrorist suspects and cut and run from Iraq," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"They wouldn't even agree to include the national-security record of Congress in the 9/11 resolution."

At the White House, Mr. Snow would not comment directly on Mr. Boehner's statement on the Democrats' priorities, but said he did not think Democrats were more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting Americans.

Mr. Snow walked reporters through parts of Mr. Bush's speech and said there were "three or four sentences" that could be seen as controversial, but said Mr. Bush would have been criticized if he had left Iraq out.

Bush Politicized A Solemn Day, Democrats Say (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — As White House officials sought approval from television executives for a coveted prime-time broadcast of President Bush's Oval Office address commemorating the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, they said publicly that the speech would steer clear of politics.

As late as Sunday, as Bush prepared for a raft of Sept. 11 ceremonies, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow told reporters that the address was "not going to be a political speech — there are no calls to action, there are no attempts to segregate Democrats from Republicans."

But Bush's inclusion in his remarks Monday night of a stout defense of his policies in Iraq — as well as his suggestion that a united front was needed on the subject — sent Democrats scrambling to issue late-night responses and prompted at least one network to adjust its programming to make time for political analysis. And the controversy continued Tuesday, as debate flared over whether Bush inappropriately politicized a day set aside for memorials and solemn reflection.

The dispute comes eight weeks before voters are to decide which party will control Congress for Bush's final two years in office, and underscores how each side is vying to make the issue of national security work to its advantage.

Bush, in a series of recent appearances, and other administration officials have stressed their view that the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq was part of the broader fight against terrorism and that critics were playing into the hands of terrorists.

Democrats have argued that the war has weakened the United States' standing in the world and that Bush's "stay the course" policy only increases the terrorism threat.

The rhetoric escalated after Bush's speech Monday night.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) accused Republicans of employing "cynical tactics" to scare voters, while House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) wondered aloud whether Democrats were "more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

Democrats pressed their case that the White House had misrepresented the tenor of Bush's speech, causing the broadcast networks to give him a prime-time slot without setting time aside for an opposition response or interviews with Democrats.

"The American people, us included, took [White House officials] at their word when they said it would not be a political speech," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) sent letters to network news executives Tuesday asking for more coverage of Democrats' views as part of reporting on Bush's war-related speeches.

Bush mused Tuesday about the dispute over his speech, telling a group of conservative columnists during an Oval Office interview that he would have been attacked either way.

"Imagine what they would have said if I hadn't talked about Iraq — 'Failed policy, won't talk about it,' " he said, according to an account posted on the National Review Online.

The first indication that Monday night's address might go beyond a Sept. 11 commemoration came about three hours before Bush delivered it, when the White House press office distributed advance excerpts. It included one line declaring that winning the war on terrorism "will require the determined efforts of a unified country," and that Americans "must put aside our differences, and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

Still, the excerpts contained no mentions of Iraq — and the headline on the news release alerted reporters only that Bush's speech would "remember those who lost their lives five years ago today and pay tribute to the heroes whose acts of courage that day saved so many lives," and reflect on "what Sept. 11 has meant to America and how we can move forward together to win the war on terror."

On NBC, which like the other two major networks interrupted regular programming to televise Bush's remarks, Washington bureau chief Tim Russert told viewers before the speech that the president would be assuming the role of "commander in chief, healer in chief, comforter in chief; all alone in the Oval Office with one big megaphone for the country and the world to hear."

But Bush wasted little time in his 17-minute address before reverting to the oft-repeated lines of his election-year speeches defending the invasion of Iraq.

"I'm often asked why we're in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," he said. "The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat…. The world is safer because Saddam Hussein is no longer in power."

Bush went on to quote Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden predicting that defeat in Iraq would mean America's "defeat and disgrace forever," a line the president has often used to criticize Democrats who have endorsed a timetable for withdrawing troops.

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," Bush said.

With those and other passages, a speech that had been advertised as nonpolitical was sounding like the president's campaign speech.

Once the themes of Bush's remarks were clear, NBC changed plans and allowed time after the speech for additional analysis. During that segment, Russert predicted that Democrats would no doubt accuse Bush of playing "politician in chief."

A network news executive, speaking on condition of anonymity due to the sensitivity of relations with the White House, said Tuesday that the speech would prompt greater scrutiny of future White House requests for air time.

"On a scale of zero to 100, with 100 being a speech of national significance and zero being purely partisan, this clearly was not a 100 on that scale," the executive said. "And I guess over time if that pattern kept occurring, then … you'd start to look long and hard at those formal requests."

Reid took to the Senate floor to criticize Bush for, in his view, injecting politics into the Sept. 11 commemoration.

Reid recalled that the attacks had "brought America together like never before." He said that when Bush, a few days after the attack, "stood upon that mound of rubble at ground zero with bullhorn in hand, he spoke for all of us" in pledging retribution against the plotters.

But Reid said that on Monday night, "the president spoke for his administration, not for the nation. No bullhorn, only the bully pulpit of his office, which he used to defend an unpopular war in Iraq and to launch clumsily disguised barbs at those who disagree with his policies there."

Snow on Tuesday stood by his earlier characterization of the speech as nonpolitical — in the sense that Bush did not specifically argue that Democrats opposing his Iraqi policies were jeopardizing America's security, as he has done on the campaign trail.

"What I told you was there would be no drawing of partisan distinctions, and there wasn't," Snow said.

"The point is that the use of the term 'partisan,' I think, is being now tossed around as a way to fend off the debate [on Iraq] or say, 'How dare the president talk about it,' " Snow said.

A Reprise Of The Grand Old Party Line (WP)

By Dana Milbank

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) was his genial self at a meeting with reporters yesterday morning, showing off his golf-ball-pattern tie and talking of a conversation he once had with Jack Nicklaus about the baby-blue cravat.

But 15 minutes later, Boehner had moved from the necktie to the jugular: He speculated that Democrats may be guilty of the capital crime of aiding and comforting the enemy.

"I listen to my Democrat friends, and I wonder if they're more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting the American people," he said.

One of his listeners, offering Boehner the chance to rescind that charge, asked if he really meant to accuse Democrats of treason. "I said I wonder if they're more interested in protecting the terrorists," he replied, repeating more than clarifying. "They certainly don't want to take the terrorists on in the field."

The majority leader's charge of treachery was no accident. Two months before Election Day, Republicans have revived the technique used with great success in 2002 and 2004: suggesting that the loyal opposition is, well, not so loyal.

Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) seemed to have the same talking points yesterday. In a fight for his political life, Santorum worked himself into a rage on the Senate floor, hollering: "If you listen to the Democratic leader, our lesson is: . . . Let's put domestic politics ahead of the security of this country. That's the message."

The arrival of Treason Season, heralded by the charged address President Bush gave on Monday's 9/11 anniversary, is right on schedule.

Back in 2002, Bush declared on Sept. 23 that Senate Democrats were "not interested in the security of the American people." Republicans gained seats in the midterm elections.

Two years later to the day, Bush went to the Rose Garden to say that Democrats' statements about Iraq "can embolden an enemy." A few days earlier, Republican John Thune said the words of his opponent, Senate Democratic leader Thomas Daschle (S.D.), "embolden the enemy." Bush and Thune won in November.

The aid-and-comfort line may not work as well this time, if only because polls show broad disenchantment with Bush and congressional leadership. And, unlike in 2002, Republicans have unified control of the government and find their security agenda being hamstrung by GOP holdouts as well as Democrats. But don't discount the influence of Treason Season: A Zogby poll released yesterday showed Santorum closing the gap with Democratic challenger Bob Casey.

As is often the case, Vice President Cheney launched the current round of sedition suspicions. The idea "that we should withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq," he told NBC's Tim Russert on Sunday, "validates the strategy of the terrorists."

Bush picked up the thread in his televised address Monday night, saying: "The worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. . . . If we yield Iraq to men like bin Laden, our enemies will be emboldened." That was milder than Cheney, but not exactly the non-political speech the White House promised when it requested network time.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) rushed to the floor yesterday morning to denounce this "ploy" by Bush, saying the president "obviously was more consumed by staying the course in Iraq and playing election-year partisan politics than changing direction."

This threw Santorum into a rage, resulting in a 15-minute tirade by the agitated Pennsylvanian. "The very people that planned the attacks are the people who are in Iraq," he stipulated, drawing a conclusion different from the one the Senate intelligence committee reached. He said Democrats "can't face the reality that we have a dangerous enemy out there, an enemy that wants to destroy everything we hold dear."

Boehner, giving reporters an off-camera briefing in his office, was decidedly calmer. In shirtsleeves and sipping a Diet Coke, he told the group coolly: "I have no fears about losing our majority. None." Five minutes later, after making and repeating his supposition that Democrats prefer terrorists to Americans, Boehner added somewhat incongruously that Democrats "are the ones out there making statements."

The flap landed 90 minutes later on Tony Snow's podium in the makeshift White House briefing room. The spokesman declined multiple invitations from the press to disavow Boehner's formulation. "Do you want to let a statement like this stand from a Republican leader of Congress?" NBC's David Gregory finally asked.

"I'll get back to you on it," he said.

The exasperated Gregory tried another tack: "Can you describe how it's possible to oppose the president on the war on Iraq without emboldening the terrorists?"

"Yes, absolutely," Snow said. But not if it means pulling out of Iraq. "That," the spokesman said, "would embolden the terrorists."

With No Ideas, The GOP Seeks To Scare (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Wasn't it just a couple of years ago that Republicans were boasting that they were the party of ideas? They would privatize the commonwealth and globalize democracy, while Democrats clung to the tattered banner of common security in both economics and national defense. The intellectual energy in America, it seemed, was all on the right.

That, as they say, was then. In 2006 the campaigns that the Republicans are waging in their desperate attempt to retain power are so utterly devoid of ideas that it's hard to believe they ever had an idea at all.

With fewer than 60 days remaining before the November election, the only two Republican strategies left standing are to scare the public about the Democrats collectively or to slime the Democrats individually. There's nothing new about these strategies, of course, but this year they exist in a vacuum. Having run both the executive and legislative branches for the past two years with nothing but failure to show for it, the Republicans can no longer campaign as the party that will balance the budget, reform entitlements, lower energy costs, fix the immigration problem, create a more secure world or find a suitable way out of their endless war of choice in Iraq. What's left is a campaign of scaring and sliming, with the emphasis on the latter.

The scare campaign is simply harder to wage this year than it was in 2002 and 2004, when Bush, Rove and company convinced just enough voters that the Democrats couldn't be trusted to take on the terrorists. This week, for instance, House Republicans will bring up their annual resolution commemorating the horror and heroism of Sept. 11, 2001, which this year comes complete with some additional language that reaffirms their deport-'em-all approach to immigration. That, the Republicans hope, may just force some Democrats to vote no -- proof positive of their secret sympathies for al-Qaeda.

A similarly threadbare calculation lies behind the Republicans' sudden rush to force a vote on rules governing the tribunals that will judge the 14 leaders of al-Qaeda whom the president abruptly decided to put on trial. The administration's bill establishes procedures clearly designed to repulse sentient beings, such as a provision denying defendants the right to see the evidence introduced against them. The political problem for the Republicans is that there are a few sentient beings in their own ranks, notably Sens. John McCain, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, a former military reserve judge who has said that a court would strike down that provision "in 30 seconds." With McCain, Warner and Graham gumming up the works by insisting on trials that reflect the influence of the Enlightenment, Democrats have been able to stay mum on a controversy that exists only because it was supposed to embarrass them.

It was all so much simpler in the days when the Democrats' reservations about the war in Iraq could be depicted as revealing their irresolution in the fight against terror. Today, alas, most Americans see Iraq as the horrific sectarian conflict it has in fact become, and in a recent poll for Time magazine, 54 percent said our involvement there was actually hurting our efforts to combat terrorism. The president, though, persists in depicting the war as the front line in the war on jihadists; to admit otherwise would be to admit that those who propose redeploying some of our forces, as Democratic congressional leaders have advocated, aren't necessarily soft on bin Laden.

But the public isn't falling for the third iteration of the scare campaign -- not yet, anyway -- so the Republicans have fallen back on slime. According to a report in Sunday's Post by Jim VandeHei and Chris Cillizza, the National Republican Congressional Committee "plans to spend more than 90 percent of its $50 million-plus advertising budget on what officials described as negative ads" that attack Democratic candidates on their business dealings, legal battles and legislative votes that can be taken out of context.

What's a party to do when its high road leads nowhere but down? The Republicans tried privatizing Social Security, but their numbers never added up. They tried spreading democracy with unilateral, preventive war but instead unleashed a sectarian bloodbath. So the party of big ideas, of Milton Friedman and the neoconservatives, is now just one big Swift Boat flotilla, its ideas sunk of their own dead weight, kept afloat solely by its opposition research. For their part, the Democrats still champion common security; they call for a government that can build dikes and reduce the costs of college and medication and that knows that remaking the world becomes more plausible when some of the world is actually willing to go along with us. Those are, in the campaign of 2006, just about the only ideas in play.

Politics Jeopardize Ports Security Bill (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, September 12, 2006

Ports security legislation that most senators agree would make the country safer was stuck Tuesday in election-year politics as Republicans threatened to scrap it if Democrats forced in a wide range of provisions.

Facing an impasse, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist set a Thursday deadline to vote on the bill that was earlier considered a sure thing.

The Democratic plan "will kill the bill," said Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska. "We have a bipartisan bill to start with. ... All these amendments are just coming out of the sewer right now. There's just too many of them, and they're just nothing but attempts to block this bill."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said his plan would also bolster security on trains and buses and at chemical plants, strengthen U.S. intelligence missions overseas and approve all of the 9/11 Commission's recommendations, half of which are still undone.

"Let's see if they'll vote against this," said Reid, D-Nev., hoisting a thick stack of white papers.

Reid acknowledged that the port security bill, even without his additions, would be better than nothing. "But why don't we try to improve that? And that's my point. Try to improve it. That's all I'm trying to do," he said.

Voters have ranked national security among top election concerns this fall, which marks the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 terror attacks, and candidates from both parties are scrambling to portray themselves as stronger on the issue than their opponents. Congress made port security a particular priority after a February fight over a buyout that put a Dubai company in control of some operations at six American ports.

The Democratic plan would put Republicans in the awkward position of voting against security measures that many voters believe are long overdue.

Stevens, however, said the plan would delay progress on port security, including putting monitors at the nation's 22 largest seaports to screen for materials to make radiological "dirty" bombs or nuclear weapons. The bill would have to be considered by multiple congressional committees to work out differences between House and Senate bills, he said.

David Heyman, homeland security director at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the flare-up could scuttle the entire bill.

"Everybody wants to go back to their constituents and say they've done something to make us more secure," Heyman said. "If something gets done, everybody benefits. But if nothing gets done, Democrats will benefit because if you look at polls, people believe Congress isn't doing its job, and voters want change."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, testifying before a Senate panel earlier Tuesday, urged lawmakers to approve the port security legislation, calling it "a tremendous contribution" to measures the Bush administration has already undertaken.

As part of the bipartisan ports security bill, senators also approved several measures Tuesday, including:

_Requiring the government to send emergency alerts to cell phones and pagers.

_Eliminating a hiring cap on Transportation Security Administration screeners.

_Bringing the total number of new Customs and Border Protection officers to 1,000.

U.S. Can't Protect All Targets, Chertoff Says (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Congress and the American public must accept that the government cannot protect every possible target against attack if it wants to avoid fulfilling Al Qaeda's goal of bankrupting the nation, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told a Senate committee Tuesday.

Osama bin Laden, Mr. Chertoff said, has made it clear that scaring the United States into an unsustainable spending spree is one of his aims. In a 2004 video, Mr. bin Laden, the Qaeda leader, spoke of "bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy."

"He understood that one tool he had in waging war against the United States was to drive us crazy, into bankruptcy, trying to defend ourselves against every conceivable threat," Mr. Chertoff said at a hearing of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. "We have to be realistic about what we expect and what we do. We do have limits, and we do have choices to make."

The direct reference to Mr. bin Laden echoes what is now a week's worth of tough talk by the Bush administration about him, a move Democrats call a politically motivated effort to refocus the nation, and its voters, on the war on terror instead of the troubled conflict in Iraq.

Mr. Chertoff said his message was not political, but simply a recognition of reality and the tough choices he must make.

Moving ahead will require billions of dollars in spending to finish installation of radiation detection equipment at ports by next year, build fences or high-tech barriers at borders to control illegal immigration, enhance railroad safety programs and install new explosives detection equipment at airports.

In the short term, money will be spent to inspect all cargo packages delivered by individuals to the airports, closing what has been a loophole in the security system. The department, in the next month, will also announce new freight rail regulations for trains that carry highly toxic chemicals. The rules may limit how long railcars are allowed to sit in place and how they are built.

But the list of initiatives cannot be limitless, Mr. Chertoff said. A mandate, for example, that every cargo container headed into the United States be X-rayed and subject to a radiation scan before it leaves a foreign port to search for a possible nuclear bomb is not now feasible, he said.

Senator Frank R. Lautenberg, Democrat of New Jersey, was trying on Tuesday to persuade him to consider such an effort.

"I put my daughter in my car," Mr. Chertoff told Mr. Lautenberg. "If I wanted my daughter to be 100 percent safe, I'd put a five-mile-an-hour speed limit cap on the car." But that is not an option, he added, "because that's more safety than we can afford."

Mr. Lautenberg seemed unimpressed. "If we inspected one out of 20 people going into the White House for tours, or coming into this place, would we feel secure?" he said. "I don't think so."

Others who spoke at the hearing, including Richard A. Falkenrath, the deputy commissioner for counterterrorism at the New York City Police Department, questioned just how good a job Mr. Chertoff was doing divvying up his limited resources.

Mr. Chertoff, since he was named secretary in February 2005, has talked of the need to make spending risk-based, but his department has also been lambasted for compiling a list of possible targets that included a petting zoo, a bourbon festival and a popcorn factory, while at the same time it cut antiterrorism grants to high-risk cities like Washington and New York.

Mr. Falkenrath said the department was focusing too much on screening cargo containers, when the greater threat in American ports, like the attack on the destroyer Cole in Yemen in 2000 showed, was from a small boat packed with explosives pulling up aside a ship or a ferry. It is spending $9 on security per airplane passenger, he said, but less than half a penny on each mass transit rider.

"There's something wrong with this," said Mr. Falkenrath, a former White House deputy homeland security adviser. "Terrorists are attacking the subway system worldwide."

Newly Banned Items Often Fly Past Airport Screeners (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Wendy Shanker was passing through security at the St. Louis airport Friday when the X-ray machine detected a potential weapon inside her carry-on bag. A screener dug into the satchel and found a pair of scissors that Shanker used for knitting. The scissors' blades were shorter than the 4-inch federal limit so the screener plopped them back into the bag.

But he missed something else: Shanker's two-ounce container of Neutrogena hand cream, a substance banned since federal authorities clamped down last month on allowing liquids and gels into airline passenger cabins.

"They focused in on the scissors and didn't seem to see the cream," said Shanker, who didn't realize it was in her bag until she was on her way to Washington Dulles International Airport.

Like Shanker, many people are inadvertently taking banned liquids and gels through security in their pockets and carry-on luggage, according to interviews with several dozen travelers at local airports and with pilots and security officials.

Others, however, say they're simply not going to tolerate the new rules. They admit that they ignore the restrictions, slipping expensive cologne, perfume, lip gloss, lotion and other ointments into their carry-on bags or into their pockets in hopes of sneaking them past security. Some of the items get flagged by screeners, others do not.

Unlike Shanker, the cream and liquid smugglers refused to give their full names. One woman said she slipped her Blistex lip balm into a pocket because her lips dry out on flights; another stashed her perfume in her carry-on because she didn't trust baggage handlers; another kept a small container of body lotion in her purse to apply in the aircraft lavatory.

A business executive said he always traveled with hand sanitizer in his pocket because he worries about germs on planes. He has made about 10 trips since the restrictions went into effect and hasn't been caught.

Since the rules went into effect, most travelers have abided by the law, packing their hand cream, hair gel and toothpaste in their checked luggage or leaving the items at home. The flouters, however, say they hate the hassle of long waits at baggage carousels and worry that their expensive bottles of perfume will be broken or stolen if placed in their checked luggage.

A 33-year-old teacher, who was traveling with her 7-year-old son and 9-year-old daughter, brought her cosmetics case in her backpack on a trip from Orlando to Dulles Friday morning.

She would give only her first name, Nicole, saying that she worried about getting in trouble. At first, she admitted to a reporter that she was carrying a $75 hydrating gel in her backpack. Then, she revealed lip gloss, toothpaste, a bottle of expensive Chanel perfume and a $300 container of facial cleanser neatly packed in a bulging cosmetic case. Screeners never noticed the items, which she had no intention of checking, she said.

"There is no way I'm putting my Chanel in a checked bag," she said. Then she looked down at her two children: "Who knows what's in their bags?"

The federal government banned most gels and liquids from passenger cabins last month after British authorities said they had foiled a plot to bomb transatlantic flights with liquid explosives. Officials with the Transportation Security Administration said they were confident their security efforts in place at the time would have prevented the plotters from getting through security checkpoints at U.S. airports. But they said they couldn't take any chances and hastily enacted the ban early on Aug. 10.

TSA officials have no way of tracking people who succeed in disobeying the ban, but screeners have caught people trying to sneak items through checkpoints, said Ellen Howe, an agency spokeswoman. Anyone caught could face fines of several hundred dollars, Howe said, although she said it was too difficult to determine whether any fines have been levied.

TSA officials point to a 20 percent increase in checked bags as an indication that most travelers seem to be complying with the rules.

"Travelers must realize this isn't a game," Howe said. "The threat is real and it continues, and we appreciate the public's cooperation. Is it the perfect system? No. But does it make it right to sneak things through security? No, it doesn't."

Security experts said the experiences of travelers interviewed at Reagan National and Dulles airports highlighted what they say are security gaps in the current product bans. A well-trained screener must notice the sometimes-subtle signatures of containers of gels and liquids on X-ray machines. The devices are much better at picking up the shapes of dense and metal objects, such as knives, guns or bomb components, security experts said.

Metal detectors at security checkpoints cannot sense plastic items that may contain liquids or gels.

"There are obviously limitations to this ban," said Clark Kent Ervin, a former inspector general at the Department of Homeland Security.

Ervin supports the restrictions but thinks they are flawed because authorities rely heavily on screeners' interpretations of X-ray images.

"It depends entirely on screeners' alertness and training," he said, "and there are problems with both."

Pilots groups have criticized the measures, saying they notice the security holes all the time. They say authorities should focus more on developing systems to identify potential terrorists, not just their weapons.

Gary Boettcher, a pilot and president of the Coalition for Airline Pilots Association, a trade group that closely tracks security issues, said he constantly sees people drinking from illicit bottles of water or putting on lip gloss when he walks through the passenger cabin. Most of the time, he said, it doesn't bother him.

"They are just doing their routines like they always did," Boettcher said. "An old woman drinking a bottle of water doesn't concern me. . . . The whole screening process is a facade to make the public feel safe, to show that the government is doing something."

Passengers said they didn't feel any safer after reaching their destination and realizing they had inadvertently left a banned item in their carry-on bags.

Libby Cole, 21, who flew into Dulles from Vermont on Friday, said she rushed to catch an early plane and didn't know until she landed that she had two lip glosses in her carry-on bag.

On a past trip, TSA screeners caught one out of two lip glosses, she said.

"I don't think this does anything, because obviously, if this can get through," she said, holding onto one of her lip glosses. "I think it's just kind of a pain."

Backups From Ban At Airport Checkpoints Short-lived (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Security lines at U.S. airports returned to normal less than a week after a terror scare last month created some of the worst checkpoint backups ever, a USA TODAY analysis of security data shows.

Transportation Security Administration (TSA) records show that five days after airline passengers were barred from carrying most liquids on airplanes, security lines wereroutine at almost all of thenation's 80 major airports.

Travelers waited 90 minutes or more at 13 of the airports on Aug. 10, when the ban took effect after British authorities said they stopped an alleged plot to bomb U.S.-bound airplanes using liquid explosives. Five airports had lines of two hours or more, the data show.

By Aug. 15, only four airports had lines exceeding 30 minutes.

The fast rebound "gives the TSA wiggle time to test and deploy technology that will deal with liquid explosives," said aviation-security consultant Douglas Laird. "The public isn't going crazy."

The TSA has said the ban will remain in place indefinitely.

Many passengers are using checked luggage instead of carry-on bags. Mike Restovich, TSA's security-operations chief, said the reduction in carry-ons helped checkpoint lines come "back to normalcy" by giving screeners fewer bags to check.

Caleb Tiller of the National Business Travel Association said the TSA did a good job explaining the ban after early confusion. The rules "are well-understood," Tiller said.

Many travelers now spend extra time waiting to check and retrieve luggage, he said.

Timing helped ease lines. Late August and September are slow air-travel periods. Some airlines lost passenger volume after Aug. 10, said James May, CEO of the Air Transport Association, an airline trade group.

Orlando International Airport screener Don Thomas said travelers are following the liquid ban "surprisingly well." Even so, he warned, "If it was holiday time, it would be really bad."

Man Seized On Flight To Dulles (WP)

By Martin Weil

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

An unruly passenger who reportedly tried to yank open a cabin door in an airliner en route to Washington was jumped last night by fellow passengers who helped federal air marshals subdue him.

United Flight 890, from Los Angeles, was about two hours from Dulles International Airport when the incident occurred about 6:30 p.m. EDT. The full Airbus 320 arrived a few minutes early, officials said.

The man, who reportedly wore a camouflage jacket and spoke Portuguese, was questioned at Dulles last night by airport police, according to an airport spokeswoman.

No motive was readily apparent, but a spokeswoman for the FBI emphasized that the incident was not terrorism-related.

"There is no terrorism nexus," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0062111

The plane, which according to a Web site can carry 180 passengers, left Los Angeles at 12:50 p.m. PDT. About halfway into the flight, shouting broke out in the rear of the cabin, a passenger said after arriving at Dulles.

The man "was pulling on the rear-door release handle," said the passenger, Stephen Lockwood of Northern Virginia.

A flight attendant ordered the man to stop, but he continued to pull on the handle.

Two or three passengers standing nearby intervened, Lockwood said he was told by others onboard.

"They jumped him," Lockwood said. "He resisted," and a vigorous scuffle ensued.

"The guy took quite a beating," Lockwood said. No one else was reported injured.

Out of the tumult, the passenger said, a federal air marshal appeared. He showed his shield and placed plastic handcuffs on the man.

"The passengers clapped when they took him forward," Lockwood said.

Amy Kudwa, a spokeswoman for the Transportation Security Administration, said that she lacked details of the incident but that she understood two air marshals had subdued the man.

It was not clear how often air marshals have been called on to subdue passengers on flights into or out of Washington. The number of flights that carry marshals is not disclosed.

Intervening in such situations is "part of [the air marshals'] mission, Kudwa said.

It also was not clear whether the door could have been opened in flight. Lockwood said he was told later by airline personnel that the doors cannot be opened while the cabin is pressurized.

According to Lockwood, the man was taken to the first-class section of the airplane, where at least one passenger talked with him in Portuguese.

Courtney Prebich, a spokeswoman for the Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority, which operates both Dulles and Reagan National Airport, said airport police were called to meet the plane upon its arrival.

An FBI spokeswoman said the bureau was interviewing the unruly passenger last night. She said few details were immediately available.

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

Then and now

"Back in 2003, when CBS planned to broadcast a docudrama titled 'The Reagans,' which smeared Ronald and Nancy Reagan, I wrote a column for National Review Online condemning it," Ed Morrow writes at www.nationalreview.com.

"I advised viewers to not watch it and to write CBS protesting its broadcast. In the last few days, I've had the dubious pleasure of having that column quoted by Clintonites attacking ABC's 'The Path to 9/11.' Supposedly, conservatives like me, who criticized the Reagan smear, are hypocrites for not objecting to this miniseries because Bill Clinton and members of his administration believe it falsely depicts their actions before 9/11," Mr. Morrow said.

"But those who cry hypocrisy are often the most splendid hypocrites. I don't recall many liberals leaping to Reagan's defense. ...

"Now, when the Clinton administration appears to be getting a little rough treatment, conservatives are supposed to saddle up and ride to their rescue. ...

"While the Democrats have complained the most about 'The Path to 9/11,' the Bush administration doesn't get reverential treatment in it. ... Wisely, the Republicans didn't demand the editing that the Democrats have. To put it mildly, the Democrats went nuts.

"Clinton's lawyers threatened to sue, and various Democratic congressmen and senators promised to use their offices to punish ABC. In protesting 'The Reagans,' conservative critics called for a boycott and strove to expose its falsehoods.

"I don't recall anyone setting a pack of lawyers on CBS, or Republican politicians threatening to use the power of the federal government to put them out of business. The heavy-handed tactics of the Democrats have gotten them the changes they wanted, but have left the impression that the miniseries was gutted to hide errors made by Clinton that might politically damage the Democratic Party."

He's back

Filmmaker Oliver Stone, who surprised many with the patriotic flavor of his new film "World Trade Center," hinted in Moscow on Monday that he is considering a more controversial follow-up investigating the "conspiracy" around September 11.

"There is a great story in a movie, a conspiracy by a group of people in the American administration who have an agenda and who used 9/11 to further that agenda," he told reporters in Russia.

There could be a "fascinating project [on] what happened after September 11," the director said at his packed press conference on the fifth anniversary of the attacks.

Mr. Stone accused President Bush of mishandling the fight against Osama bin Laden's terrorists and using the crisis to stoke fear and bolster his own power at home in a way that was "right out of George Orwell."

A confession

The campaign of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's Democratic rival acknowledged yesterday that it downloaded -- and leaked to the press -- a recording of a private meeting in which the governor described a Hispanic legislator as having a "very hot" personality.

But Cathy Calfo, campaign manager for Democrat Phil Angelides, said the campaign had done nothing wrong because the file was available publicly on the governor's Web site.

"No one hacked," the spokeswoman said at a press conference to address the role played by the Angelides campaign, first reported by the Sacramento (Calif.) Bee. "They accessed information that was available to the public."

However, Mr. Schwarzenegger's legal-affairs secretary, Andrea Lynn Hoch, said Monday that the sound files were stored "in a password-protected area of the governor's office network computer system." She said she forwarded the Internet protocol address used to download the file to the California Highway Patrol, which is investigating how the files became public.

Sounds familiar

Republican Vernon Robinson, who describes himself as a black Jesse Helms, is mimicking the former North Carolina senator's most famous ad in his first foray into television.

In his 1990 victory over former Charlotte Mayor Harvey Gantt, Mr. Helms depicted a pair of white hands crumpling a job rejection letter. "You needed that job," Mr. Helms' ad said. "And you were the best qualified. But they had to give it to a minority because of a racial quota."

Mr. Robinson, who counts the former Republican senator as a political idol, shows a pair of black hands crumpling a letter.

"You needed that job," the ad says. "And you were the best qualified. But they gave it to an illegal alien so they could pay him under the table."

Mr. Robinson, a long-shot candidate for a U.S. House seat from North Carolina, invested $30,000 in the cable television spot, the Associated Press reports.

Casey's ad

Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, wrote that both parents shouldn't work outside the home if they can survive on one income. Democratic rival Bob Casey is using those words against him.

Mr. Casey started a statewide television ad campaign yesterday featuring Debbie Balcik, a working mother who argues that the comment is ridiculous.

"He doesn't understand how hard it is in order to make ends meet," Mrs. Balcik says. "I would like Rick Santorum to come to my house at the end of the month when we're doing our bills and tell me how we can live on one income. I'm not like a U.S. senator. I can't vote my own pay raise."

Mr. Casey, the state treasurer, is challenging Mr. Santorum, the No. 3 Senate Republican, in one of the nation's most competitive races.

The ad refers to a passage in Mr. Santorum's book, "It Takes a Family: Conservatism and the Common Good," which was published last year.

DOJ_NMG_0062113

In it, Mr. Santorum writes, "In far too many families with young children, both parents are working, when, if they really took an honest look at the budget, they might confess that both of them really don't need to, or at least may not need to work as much as they do."

Virginia Davis, a Santorum spokeswoman, said Mr. Casey was taking the words out of context, the Associated Press reports.

A proud voter

If Hillary Rodham Clinton was in doubt, Sen. Charles E. Schumer assured the senator she had his vote in yesterday's Democratic primary.

Mr. Schumer hosted a press conference on port security, and explained his fellow New York Democrat's absence was a result of her primary election.

Asked by a reporter if he had voted for the former first lady, Mr. Schumer grinned.

"I did, and proudly," he said.

The Rise Of The Homeland Security Practice (LAW)

By Joe Crea, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 13, 2006

As he surveyed the lifeless bodies surrounding him, André Hollis was certain he should have been one of them.

The windows of his office in the E-ring on the second floor were blown in, and 22 co-workers in neighboring offices were killed. Combined with the passengers on American Airlines Flight 77 that crashed into the Pentagon that morning, a total of 189 people perished at the nation's military headquarters.

By dumb luck, Hollis says, he was at a conference in northern Virginia's Crystal City the morning of the attacks. The former deputy assistant secretary of defense for counternarcotics eventually worked his way back to the Pentagon, where he navigated the shattered complex, helping the wounded out and onto the south parking lot until 2 the next morning.

For Hollis, who is now a homeland security lobbyist at Van Scoyoc Associates, the work he currently does has distinct meaning: "It's personal," he says, clasping his hands together and banging them firmly and repeatedly on a table as his eyes close. "It's personal."

With photos of three close friends killed in the Iraq and Afghanistan wars pasted on a side panel of a bookshelf in his office, in clear view of his desk, Hollis says it's a challenge not to sound too fatalistic to potential clients about the dangers the country still faces. "I remember walking through the Pentagon, and I couldn't see my hands," he says of the smoke that surrounded him.

The attacks of Sept. 11 gave rise to a new world on K Street: the homeland security practice. Born out of the tragedy are scores of lawyers and lobbyists fine-tuning their young practices at some of the top firms in town, such as Van Scoyoc and McKenna Long & Aldridge.

"It's truly an outgrowth of 9/11, and then again it isn't," says Joe Whitley, a partner at Alston & Bird and the first general counsel at the Department of Homeland Security. "So much of what is being packaged as homeland security is a lot of old wine -- old wine and some new wine in a new bottle."

LONG-TERM SECURITY

The Department of Homeland Security was officially launched in March 2003, dumping 22 legacy agencies with different philosophies and temperaments, including the Federal Emergency Management Agency, United States Customs and Border Protection, the Coast Guard and the Secret Service, under one giant umbrella. The Cabinet-level agency is already on its second secretary, Michael Chertoff.

"They each have unique cultures that have been utterly changed by being pushed together," says Hunton & Williams partner Steven Solow, whose homeland security practice primarily involves the area of risk management and integration of security matters with regulatory issues. "It's obviously a work in progress, which isn't always pretty, but it's what we have and what we have to learn to work through."

Many lobbyists say they are motivated to work in this field by a desire to protect and secure the nation. But money is not a bad motivator, either.

DOJ_NMG_0062114

Bruce Aitken, president of the nonprofit Homeland Security Industries Association, says that before Sept. 11, homeland security was a $5 billion-a-year government-contracting industry. When Congress passed an aviation security bill in November 2001, the measure moved $50 billion from the private sector into government contracting.

And the money is still increasing.

According to the Homeland Security Research Corp. (HSRC), the United States and the international community spent $44 billion on homeland security in 2005. The research firm estimates that by 2015, $174 billion will be dished out globally. The statistics are based on an "ongoing crisis" scenario, a "medium-level, painful but not devastating terrorist activity," according to HSRC reports.

"Our worst nightmare has already happened in other countries, and, I'm sad to say, once that happens here you will see a huge public outcry," says Aitken, who is also co-chairman of Aitken Berlin. "We will get attacked again, and at some point al-Qaida will stop trying to throw the proverbial Hail Mary by going after monuments and will go after shopping malls and frighten the hell out of the public."

Though fortunes are already being made now by smaller companies, Aitken predicts they will increase exponentially should a series of attacks by terrorists occur against institutions like churches and sports arenas.

But entering this line of work is anything but simple. Since the terrorist attacks, Washington firms have all too easily slapped the homeland security label onto their marketing brochures, but lobbyists and lawyers entrenched in the daily grind say the work is difficult and the three-year-old department is a maze. And the big matters at hand often involve the nuances of regulation and compliance law versus contract acquisition and appropriations. The Washington firm Cassidy & Associates, for example, has branded its practice a "national security" one, claiming on its Web site that the practice is more comprehensive than a straight defense or homeland security one.

"Many firms want a homeland security practice, although they may not fully know what that entails," says Jason Klitenic, a partner at McKenna Long & Aldridge who was the former deputy general counsel at DHS, the agency's second-ranking legal officer.

CHECKING THE BOXES

And, indeed, the work is difficult and better suited to a law firm with a lobby practice than a nonlaw firm like Van Scoyoc or Cassidy, some say.

"I think a law firm has a lot more in the way of resources to draw on, particularly if they have a robust government contracts practice," says James Burnley IV, a partner in Venable's homeland security group and secretary of transportation during the Reagan administration. "Mostly, lobby firms hold themselves out as being helpful, but you really have to have lawyers who practice in the government-contract field."

But Gregg Hartley, a lobbyist at Cassidy, disagrees. "If you're a general lobbyist like me ... I have great Hill connections. I won't be helpful, personally, to help someone get a contract at Homeland Security or the Pentagon," he says, "but I don't think a lawyer who knows the regulatory process will be beneficial, as well. But the people who know how to get you down that corridor to get those boxes checked are the people who've worked in that process before."

Some firms, such as DLA Piper, began establishing practices shortly after the terrorist attacks. Former Rep. Dick Armey, R-Texas, who joined DLA Piper in January 2003, was hired primarily because he was involved early on in creating the department.

But Armey, who co-chairs the firm's homeland security practice, says no one knew in the early days of the practice how the new department was going to develop. Armey, who was involved in one of the biggest overhauls of government since the Department of Defense was created a half-century ago, is surprised at the different shapes the department has taken.

"The initial attitude that prevailed on K Street was that this was going to be a big market and everyone was going to be selling something," he says. "Well, areas like compliance and regulations have become much more important. The work is deeper than it is a matter of schmoozing the client through the appropriations process."

Of chief frustration to many lawyers and lobbyists is figuring out who at the department is in charge of what.

"This is often the most challenging assignment," says Burnley. "They've reorganized reporting relationships in the short history of the department, and they've had a fair amount of turnover. They get burned out."

DOJ_NMG_0062115

Van Scoyoc has sought to minimize this roadblock by hiring Tim Cook, who spent 20 years in the Coast Guard, three of them as the Coast Guard Senate liaison officer. He specializes in homeland security along with Hollis.

"Your access and assistance to them [officials at Homeland Security] will be based primarily on personal relationships," says Cook. "If you don't have that with the upper leadership like André [Hollis] does, or with lower folks like me, you won't be as successful."

Lawyers and lobbyists have also found success in other aspects.

Brian Finch, a former homeland security attorney at McKenna, joined Dickstein Shapiro's homeland security practice this year and has done work with companies seeking liability exemptions for products with an anti-terror component.

But even in the short time this practice has been around, there's even been turnover on K Street. Mark Holman, a former senior principal at Blank Rome and deputy assistant to the president at the White House Office of Homeland Security, has returned to Pennsylvania to work on Lynn Swann's Republican bid for governor. And Asa Hutchinson, the former undersecretary of Homeland Security who used to run Venable's practice group, is running on the Republican ticket for governor of Arkansas.

But for now, lawyers and lobbyists just want some stability at the new department.

"Hopefully, more people are thinking of staying rather than leaving," says Whitley. "The knowledge of the agency is hard to come by when you don't have that many people who've been there for a while. Some think it will take eight years for the department to be on its sea legs."

New Orleans Mayor Pleads For Patience In Meeting Goals (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 12 — Another anniversary passed for Mayor C. Ray Nagin on Tuesday — the first 100 days since his re-election — with a plea from him for patience and "perspective" amid continued restiveness over the city's slow recovery from Hurricane Katrina and his role in it.

After his election victory May 20, Mr. Nagin pledged a strong focus on improving services in his first 100 days. Three of his electoral rivals, two of whom were regarded as policy heavyweights during the campaign, signed on as unpaid advisers.

But two blocks from City Hall, street signs are still askew from last summer's storm, some traffic lights downtown are nothing but boxes of dangling wires and previously bustling storefronts in the Central Business District remain empty.

The message Tuesday was mixed, the mayor's advisers recited what they pictured as a litany of progress, even as Mr. Nagin repeatedly reminded the reporters at a news conference in City Hall of the size of the remaining recovery effort, "a task of epic proportions," as he put it.

"No one has gone through what we've gone through," the mayor said. "The road to recovery is long and arduous."

The mayor has frequently been out of town: fund-raising in Philadelphia, drumming up investment in New York and speechmaking in Indianapolis, among other trips. His absences have become a target of jokes and speculation.

A radio talk-show host here calls him "Ray Nay-gone," and a new Web site, wheres<129>nagin.com, chronicles his travels side-by-side with a list of the city's yawning potholes.

Reporting on the first three months of his second term, Mr. Nagin appeared unfazed by recent jibes, casually dismissing reports of a recall effort and mixing in breezy cheerleading with reminders of difficulties that remain. He was at pains, though, to reassure citizens that "things are starting to pick up" and that he was on the job.

Mr. Nagin put forward a dual message Tuesday: while insisting that he is working hard, he also emphasized his trademark laissez-faire approach. It is not he but the "citizens" who are in the driver's seat in the city's recovery, the mayor said.

He said he did not plan to dictate the city's contours, or where citizens could live, even though many neighborhoods remain vulnerable and devastated by last year's storm.

"We chose to go forward with a market-driven recovery effort," Mr. Nagin said. "I believe citizens can make intelligent decisions about where to live. It is my position that government investment will follow citizen investment."

In practice, this means, as Mr. Nagin put it, that "for the most part the redevelopment of our city is going to be done by our citizens." With more than half the city's pre-hurricane population still elsewhere, including many of its poorest citizens, early indications are that it is mostly those with some resources who have been able to move back.

Against that hands-off stance, several advisers were left to chronicle small steps forward. Water pressure has improved to pre-storm levels, one said. Murders dropped in August. Most abandoned cars have been picked up. Sales taxes are at 77 percent of pre-storm levels.

The city has begun to cite homeowners who fail to comply with a one-year deadline for the cleanup and gutting of flooded houses. Universities are functioning, though enrollment is down. The city's bonds have "junk" status, but Moody's recently upgraded the city's debt rating to "stable," officials said.

Still, the city has a "huge cash flow need," said the mayor's economic adviser, Virginia Boulet. "We've got to find billions of dollars to fund the recovery of New Orleans," she said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has paid only 247 of 806 claims by the city, though 634 have been approved, said Ms. Boulet, a former challenger of Mr. Nagin.

Meanwhile, Mr. Nagin pleaded for patience. "Everybody wants it to happen yesterday,'' he said, "and it's just not going to happen yesterday."

Residents Will Define New Orleans' Recovery Plan (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, September 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — City government will not design a new look for Katrina-flooded neighborhoods, nor will residents be told where they can rebuild, Mayor Ray Nagin said Tuesday in a briefing on the first 100 days of his second term in office.

"For the most part, recovery will be done by citizens' investment," Nagin said. "We are giving all citizens the right and opportunity to return home."

Responding to criticism that the city's recovery is slow in part because there is no blueprint for rebuilding, Nagin said he'll have a comprehensive plan by the end of the year. But he said the city is taking "the road less traveled" by allowing residents to decide where they want to live.

"There are very few areas where we will be totally redesigning this city," he said.

The Urban Land Institute, which Nagin hired to come up with ideas, recommended last fall that some hard-hit areas be closed to redevelopment. Less than half the population of New Orleans has returned since Katrina flooded 80% of the city for weeks. Shrinking the city's footprint would save money and encourage development on higher ground, the institute said.

"We chose a market-driven effort" instead, said Nagin, who rejected the recommendations last winter.

Gary Solomon, who served on Nagin's Bring New Orleans Back Commission, said there is still no direction in the city's recovery. "If every street is allowed to be rebuilt and there's less people here, something doesn't make sense to me," he said.

When he was re-elected, Nagin vowed to make measurable progress in the first 100 days of his second term. That period ended Friday. He cited improvements in water pressure, which had been so low that many businesses were forced to close for a day or more. He also said the city has begun to cite residents who missed a deadline for gutting flooded homes and businesses.

Many challenges remain, Nagin said. Katrina left the city's government with damage totaling almost $500 million, including more than 350 damaged or destroyed city buildings.

WAR NEWS:

Rice Says Afghanistan Needs World's Help (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 12, 2006

STELLARTON, Nova Scotia - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice acknowledged "difficult going" fighting a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, but insisted Tuesday that the world cannot afford to pull out now.

DOJ_NMG_0062117

"We owe it to the people of Afghanistan to help them finish the job," Rice said as she thanked Canada for its role as a leader of NATO forces in the country. Canada's combat role is unpopular at home, as is the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

Afghanistan is struggling with the deadliest militant violence since U.S.-led forces toppled the hard-line Taliban regime five years ago. The United States blamed the Taliban for incubating al-Qaida as a terrorist force and for harboring Osama bin Laden after the Sept 11., 2001 terrorist attacks.

Canada has 2,200 troops in Afghanistan and has lost at least five soldiers there.

Opponents of the Afghanistan mission suggested Rice's visit to Canada was an attempt to persuade Canada to commit more forces. But Rice and her host, Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, said she made no such request.

"I know it's very difficult going in Afghanistan," Rice said in an address to Conservative supporters and others in this small town north of Halifax.

MacKay invited Rice to accompany him to his home district where polite but cheeky protests greeted the pair.

"Condi, We Don't Want Your War Machine," read one sign hoisted along the road to a museum Rice and MacKay visited. Other signs made light of the tandem visit by the two unmarried diplomats. "Condi + Peter Make Love Not War," read one, decorated with a large, red heart.

During a news conference with MacKay, Rice said the United States left too soon after supporting Afghanistan in the 1980s civil war. "Afghanistan became a failed state" and a haven for terrorism, Rice said. "We all came to pay for that."

The deadliest fighting since the fall of the Taliban government has killed more than 500 people, mostly militants, since mid-May and confirmed fears of a Taliban military resurgence in southern Afghanistan, where NATO took command from a U.S.-led coalition on Aug. 1.

Britain, Canada and the Netherlands have taken lead roles, pumping in around 8,000 troops and bringing NATO forces in Afghanistan to about 20,000. The alliance claims to have inflicted grave insurgent losses, including more than 250 in an offensive near Kandahar this month.

But at least 35 British and Canadian soldiers have died in a little more than a month, and militants show no signs of giving up.

Don't Abandon Afghanistan, Says US, As NATO Digs Around For Back-up (AFP)

AFP, September 12, 2006

On the eve of a NATO meeting to round up more troops for Afghanistan, US officials urged its partners there to stay the course, amid fresh fighting and kidnappings in the turbulent country.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a rallying call not to abandon Afghanistan as it struggles to build a stable democracy.

"If you allow a failed state in that strategic location, you will pay for it," she warned, speaking on a trip to Canada where she expressed her gratitude for Canada's 2,300-strong troop deployment to Afghanistan.

Her comments coincided with stark warnings of the threat posed by the fighters of the Islamist Taliban militia who are waging a bitter insurgency against foreign forces posted there after the Taliban was ousted from power in 2001.

Addressing European parliamentarians in Brussels, Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf said the Taliban had overtaken Osama bin Laden's Al-Qaeda network as his region's biggest threat to security.

With NATO countries set on Wednesday to discuss finding extra troops to shore up their deployments in Afghanistan, a senior US official said it was too soon to know details of likely reinforcements.

Richard Boucher, the assistant US secretary of state for south and central Asian affairs, told journalists in Brussels that it was "probably a little too early" to "draw any conclusions about the efforts to get more troops".

He highlighted the dangerous situation in Afghanistan, where NATO and Afghan forces are making forays into areas held by Taliban fighters.

"As we challenged them in these areas they've challenged us back and there's been a high level of violence," Boucher said, speaking at the US embassy here.

DOJ_NMG_0062118

His comments came ahead of Wednesday's meeting at NATO's military headquarters in Belgium aimed at drumming up more troops for Afghanistan.

The alliance's military chief, US General James Jones, has called for reinforcements of up to 2,500 troops to deal with increasing Taliban attacks.

The situation on the ground in the war-ravaged central Asian country turned grimmer meanwhile, as NATO pressed on with a major offensive.

Security forces killed 26 Taliban rebels and captured 28 others in separate operations across Afghanistan. Rights groups said at least 25 Afghan civilians were believed killed and 7,000 families displaced in the southern province of Kandahar since the start of the NATO operation this month.

Elsewhere, police said unknown assailants had kidnapped a Colombian aid worker and two Afghan colleagues employed by a French organisation in Wardak province, central Afghanistan.

In Britain, Lieutenant General David Richards, commander of NATO's International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan, insisted the war against the Taliban was being won, even as the bodies of 14 British airmen who died in a plane crash in Afghanistan were brought home.

The Taliban regime was toppled by US-led forces weeks after the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States. The US accused it of providing a safe haven for the Al-Qaeda network and its leader, Osama bin Laden, blamed for the attacks.

NATO now leads more than 8,000 troops in the restive south, and some 20,000 more soldiers from 37 countries deployed throughout Afghanistan. Nevertheless, the Taliban have dramatically stepped up their insurgency this year.

In Cuba, a summit of countries of the Non-Aligned Movement issued a draft closing statement expressing support for Kabul and their "profound" concern over "terrorist groups including former Taliban" in the south and east of Afghanistan.

Nato Plea For Afghan Troops Is Rebuffed (FT)

By Stephen Fidler, Daniel Dombey, Neil MacDonald, Mark Mulligan, And Hugh Williamson In Berlin And Tony Barber

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Nato's plans to provide reinforcements for its hard-pressed troops in Afghanistan suffered a setback on Tuesday, as a series of countries ruled out providing further soldiers and controversy mounted over the alliance's tactics.

Officials conceded that a meeting on Wednesday, intended to obtain pledges for up to 2,500 extra soldiers, was extremely unlikely to meet its target.

Last week, General James Jones, Nato's military chief, called for the reinforcements – to be led by a 1,000-strong reserve battalion – as a matter of urgency. At present Nato has 20,000 soldiers in Afghanistan.

"We do not have the capacity to send more," said a German defence ministry spokesman. "Our upper limit remains 3,000 troops and we already have almost 2,900 on the ground."

Turkey has also said it will not be able to provide further soldiers, having just announced it is sending 1,000 troops for the new United Nations force in Lebanon.

Italy, which is making the biggest contribution to the Lebanon force, is in a similar position. And this week, José Antonio Alonso, Spain's defence minister, said his country's 690 troops in Afghanistan were "more than sufficient".

Nato has even sought troops from Serbia, the country it fought a war against in 1999.

But Zoran Stankovic, defence minister, says Belgrade is offering fewer than five mid-rank officers, with technical roles in airport security and logistics.

The lack of response makes it more likely that the UK will, in the words of one military analyst, have to "cobble together a battle group" of perhaps 900 troops to augment Nato's forces. Canada is reportedly planning to reinforce its contingent of 2,300 with 15 heavy tanks and 300 personnel.

Meanwhile, an internal dispute is mounting over Nato's tough fighting tactics, which have seen the alliance claim it has killed hundreds of Taliban in an offensive around the southern city of Kandahar this month.

"I have doubts about our military strategy," said one Nato official, who argued that the alliance could have focused more on development.

Even American officials have questioned whether such an approach – in part designed to emphasise that the Taliban is a losing cause – is sustainable in current circumstances.

"The level of fighting has not been a result of a change in our strategy but because the circumstances on the ground require it," said an official with Nato's forces in Afghanistan.

He emphasised that Lieutenant General David Richards, the head of the alliance's force in the country, still spent the bulk of his time on development issues.

Taliban Adopting Iraq-style Jihad (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN

Even in near-total darkness, the wounded Taliban fighter insists on masking his identity, his head and face covered by a tightly wound white cloth. Only two bright eyes and a confident voice tell how Afghanistan's Islamist militants are ramping up their fight against US and NATO forces.

He speaks a warning, of how the "new" Taliban has become more radical, more sophisticated, and more brutal than the Taliban ousted by US-led forces in 2001 - and of how its jihadist agenda now mirrors that of Al Qaeda, stretching far beyond Afghanistan.

Among the keys to the Taliban resurgence - which is sparking lethal violence on a scale unknown here for almost five years - are crucial lessons drawn from Iraq.

"That's part of our strategy - we are trying to bring [the Iraqi model] to Afghanistan," says the fighter. "Things will get worse here."

Those "things" include suicide attacks, assassinations of government officials, moderate clerics, and civilians, along with guerrilla tactics now in use against Western forces in the southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, where NATO claims to have killed more than 500 insurgents in 10 days of intense fighting.

Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf, speaking in Brussels Tuesday, said the Taliban now pose a greater danger than Al Qaeda. "The center of gravity of terrorism has shifted from al Qaeda to the Taliban," he told European lawmakers."

"This is a new element, a more dangerous element, because it [the Taliban] has its roots in the people. Al Qaeda didn't have roots in the people," he said.

On Tuesday, Afghan police said that they had arrested more than 30 people suspected of planning attacks; the US military reported detaining eight others.

"The Taliban have tried their best to avoid murdering civilians, but they finally found if they don't get active, they will lose this opportunity" to attack "infidel" Western troops, says the fighter. "Now you are seeing explosions everywhere."

Among the most recent suicide attacks was one near the US Embassy last Friday, killing two US soldiers and 14 Afghans.

"I'm very happy about the murder of the Americans, though I am a little bit sad about the death of the Afghans - but this is wartime," says the fighter matter-of-factly. Such deaths, he says, are "inevitable," even if they cause a popular backlash.

"The shift has taken place," warns Hekmat Karzai, head of the Center for Conflict and Peace Studies (CAPS) in Kabul, which analyzes terrorism trends. The Taliban still have local concerns, he says, but embrace global jihad as never before and believe in encouraging a "clash of civilizations."

"Taliban commanders talk of jihad in Fallujah in the same terms they speak of jihad in [the eastern Afghan province of] Kunar," says Mr. Karzai. "They think: 'Just as they are battling there, we are battling here.' "

Figures tabulated by CAPS indicate a recent 60 percent increase in attacks across Afghanistan, from 85 in July to 136 in August. Police have borne the brunt, with deaths jumping more than fourfold in that period. Civilian deaths have tripled, with 92 losing their lives in August.

"The world is small now, and just as McDonald's is being globalized ... so can violence be transmitted from one place to another," says Waheed Mozhdah, a Taliban-era Foreign Affairs Ministry official, and author on the Taliban.

"The tactics have been imported from Iraq: suicide bombers, remote-controlled roadside bombs," says Mr. Mozhdah. "These things we didn't have in the [past] jihad, and they have been very effective...."

Other tactics have also changed. Prior to 2001, the Taliban would take on the Northern Alliance by charging through their front lines - despite high casualties from mines. Today, they use more guerrilla-style strikes.

Another factor chills many Afghans. "[The Taliban] have become more violent. They slaughter people, beheading them, and this didn't exist before," says Mozhdah. "They used to regard video cameras as haram [forbidden by religion], but now they use these videos as a tool. It shows how Al Qaeda has affected the Taliban."

Indeed, coming from a group that in the late 1990s draped checkpoints with wads of magnetic tape - pulled from video and music cassettes banned by the Taliban - that is quite a change. Recent videos show commanders, including, apparently, the rarely seen fugitive Taliban chief Mullah Omar - directing operations from the front line. In one, Mr. Omar is shown with binoculars, inspecting a small rocket launcher in a bid to counter charges of cowardice from President Hamid Karzai.

Other footage shows one Afghan suicide bomber after another - as well as at least one Pakistani - making strident statements and collecting chits for their explosives. The clips also list the number of "crusader troops" killed in each attack.

But even by the gruesome standards of global jihad, which include taped beheadings by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq, and similar deaths of Russians by Chechen militants, the Taliban footage is brutal.

"The greatest achievement of video like that is to instill fear in the hearts of the population, making them believe that the government and international forces can't protect them," says Karzai of CAPS, who estimates that Taliban material is on 30 percent of an estimated 4,000 jihadi websites. "It is a psychological component that shocks people, who ask: 'They are Afghans. They are Muslims. How can they do that?' "

Karzai says the message is clear: "It is ... telling people: 'This can happen to you.' The consequence is that many people stop working for government institutions. They ask if it is more important to get $200 a month - more like $60 - or to stay alive."

"They are very dangerous, because they think that anyone who is not pro-American should come to them or leave the country," says Idriss Yusefi, an Afghan medical resident whose uncle was a key player in the Taliban's despised "vice and virtue" squads. "They think the people of Kabul are all pro-American, and so [they] can kill them."

The "biggest fear" of youths, says Mr. Yusefi and his friends, is that the Taliban will retake power. Most analysts say the Taliban is still no strategic threat to the fragile government, a view challenged by militants like the wounded fighter.

Schooled in the extreme Deobandi strain of Islam followed by most Talibs, he joined 18 months ago, prompted, he says, when US troops arrested his cleric father from their home in Kandahar after a roadside bomb went off nearby. The father's body was dropped off at the hospital by US forces 10 days later, the militant claims.

"I want two things: revenge and martyrdom. Martyrdom is the hope of every true Muslim," declares the 26-year-old. His mother stopped his two older brothers, the fathers of seven, from joining the Taliban. But she could not stop this son.

"Every jihad fighter has the best morale - you can't compare it to any other type of fighter," he says, tightening his head wrap in the dark. "In this country, there are many religious people and they want a reason to fight for God, for martyrdom. They welcome this opportunity to ... go to Paradise."

While he recovers in Kabul, the militant keeps in contact with Taliban networks, and claims that the NATO figure of more than 500 insurgents killed during "Operation Medusa" in the south is a "total lie." NATO commanders say the sustained fighting has at times been fiercer than in Iraq. The militant says the Taliban grow stronger daily, with support from locals fed-up with insecurity and corruption.

"The Taliban have increased their attacks, because people came and asked for help to bring back justice," he says. "Security was ensured under the Taliban. We will reintroduce sharia law."

Still, he was wounded when local "spies" gave away the location of a safe house during fighting in Panjwayi in Kandahar. Two Americans and two Talibs were killed in the raid.

But the fighter is certain of victory. "It's the will of God," he says, adding there must be a reason he is not yet a martyr. "Maybe God wants me to fight more."

Musharraf: Taliban Real Terrorist Threat (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2006

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf warned the West on Tuesday that Taliban insurgents are a more dangerous terrorist force than al-Qaeda because of their broad support in Afghanistan. "The center of gravity of terrorism has shifted from al-Qaeda to the Taliban," he told European Union lawmakers in Brussels. Pakistan is a counterterrorism ally of the EU and United States. Musharraf blamed the West for breeding terrorism in his country by bringing in thousands of mujahedin to fight the Soviet Union in neighboring Afghanistan in the 1980s and then leaving Pakistan to face the militants a decade later. "We armed the Taliban and sent them in. We did it together," he said.

Ex-commander guilty in Rwanda genocide

A United Nations tribunal in Tanzania sentenced former Rwandan military commander Tharcisse Muvunyi to 25 years in prison on four counts of genocide and crimes against humanity for his role in the 1994 slaughter of minority Tutsis. Judge Asoka de Silva of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda said Muvunyi's troops were behind the systematic killing of at least 140 students and Red Cross workers.

Muvunyi, a former army lieutenant colonel, incited hatred and oversaw roadblocks where Tutsis were separated from Hutus before being executed, the judge said. The court acquitted Jean Mpambara, a former mayor in Rukara. Since its inception in 1994, the court has convicted 26 people and acquitted four.

Pro-Western bloc wins in Montenegro

Montenegro's ruling pro-Western coalition led by Prime Minister Milo Djukanovic won Sunday's parliamentary elections, the State Election Commission said. The coalition won 41 of 81 seats in the parliament of the world's newest nation. Djukanovic led the Balkan state to independence from Serbia this year.

Gordon reaches hurricane strength

Tropical Storm Gordon strengthened into a hurricane over the open Atlantic on Tuesday, forecasters said. Hurricane Gordon, with top sustained winds of 75 mph, was to remain over open waters and will not threaten land, the National Hurricane Center said. "At this point, it looks like it will recurve out into the Atlantic," said Jamie Rhome, a hurricane specialist.

Pakistan's Separate Peace (WP)

SECRETARY OF Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld didn't say who he was thinking of when he warned in a controversial speech last month about people who think that "countries can negotiate a separate peace with terrorists." In fact the most obvious candidate is that enduring favorite of the Bush administration, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Mr. Musharraf, whose country has been the main base for leaders of both al-Qaeda and the Taliban since 2002, last week concluded a peace deal with tribal leaders in North Waziristan, a territory near the border with Afghanistan. The Pakistani strongman agreed to withdraw his army from the area and release prisoners in exchange for promises by militants not to attack the Pakistani army or set up a parallel government.

The Pakistani tribesmen also promised to stop cross-border attacks into Afghanistan and to disarm the many foreign terrorists in their midst -- but few analysts expect them to follow through on those pledges. Instead, both North and South Waziristan -- where a similar truce was agreed on earlier -- are likely to become territories where members of al-Qaeda and the Taliban operate without fear of challenge.

Why would Mr. Musharraf strike this deal? The simple answer is that his army was defeated in its attempt to eliminate the al-Qaeda sanctuary by force; since launching the campaign in 2003, it had suffered more than 500 killed. Mr. Musharraf, who tried to dress up his maneuver by visiting Afghanistan the next day, said he was worried about a full-scale uprising in the area. Though he didn't say so, the general is surely hoping that the truce will add to his personal security: He has survived at least two assassination attempts by al-Qaeda.

The cost of his decision will be borne by American and NATO troops in Afghanistan, whose commanders already say that the ability of Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters to retreat to Pakistan greatly complicates the challenge of defeating their escalating attacks. So why did Vice President Cheney call Mr. Musharraf "a great ally" just days after his separate peace? Administration officials seem more willing to forgive their autocratic friend than they are domestic critics of the war on terrorism.

Iraqi Leader Asks Iran For Help With Security (NYT)

By Edward Wong And Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 12 — In his first state visit to Iran, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki today discussed the security situation in Iraq with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran and asked for Mr. Ahmadinejad's support in quelling the violence that threatens to fracture this country.

"We had a good discussion with Mr. Ahmadinejad," Mr. Maliki said at a news conference in Tehran, the Iranian capital, after the two met. "Even in security issues, there is no barrier in the way of cooperation."

Mr. Ahmadinejad said that "Iran will give its assistance to establish complete security in Iraq because Iraq's security is Iran's security."

For Mr. Maliki, the visit was a kind of homecoming, since he had spent a part of his exile years during Saddam Hussein's rule living in Tehran. Many members of Mr. Maliki's Shiite political group, the Islamic Dawa Party, fled to Iran to escape the wrath of Mr. Hussein's security forces. Iranian leaders are close to Dawa and other religious Iraqi Shiite parties, because Iran is governed by Shiite Persians.

Ordinary Iraqis are generally more suspicious of the Iranian government because the two countries waged war from 1980 to 1988, and because the Persians have been the traditional rivals of Arabs for influence in the Middle East.

It was not clear what form Iranian support on security would take, or how it would be received by the American authorities. Mr. Maliki's visit came at a time when the American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, and American military commanders have increasingly accused elements in Iran of stoking violence in Iraq.

American generals have said people or groups in Iran are providing training and financing to Shiite militias here. Mr. Khalilzad said last month that Iran was urging Shiite militias to step up attacks against the American-led forces in retaliation for the Israeli assault on Lebanon.

The United States has also been pressuring Iran to end its uranium enrichment program, which White House officials say could result in a nuclear weapon.

The initial American reaction today was cautious. In Washington, Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, told reporters: "As you know, though, we've repeatedly expressed our concerns, as have others, about Iranian interference in Iraq's internal affairs. That is something that we remain concerned about.

"And while certainly we would welcome any statements of support for Iraq's government and democracy, and any pledges to act in a responsible way that does not interfere in the internal affairs of Iraq,'' he said, "we certainly want to make sure that any statements made were followed up by real concrete actions to address some of the concerns that are out there.''

Mr. Maliki said today that the American accusations of Iranian interference in Iraq will not affect economic deals that have already been signed between the two countries.

"All the political, security and economic accords that have been signed with the Islamic republic's officials will be carried out," he said.

Mr. Maliki is leading a large delegation that includes Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the Iraqi national security adviser, who is close to some Iranian officials. The Iraqis are scheduled to meet on Wednesday with Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the Iranian supreme leader, and Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a powerful former president. Mr. Maliki's predecessor, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, visited Iran in July 2005.

In the southern Iraqi city of Najaf, another Shiite leader close to Iran, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, defended his decision last week to ask Parliament to endorse a mechanism allowing Iraqi provinces to form autonomous regions. Mr. Hakim's move has roiled Iraqi politics, spurring the legislators who answer to Moktada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric, to unite with the Parliament's main Sunni Arab and secular blocs to try to sink Mr. Hakim's plan. The Sunni Arabs are especially opposed to the idea of regional autonomy, called federalism in the Iraqi Constitution, because their provinces lack oil resources.

"We think that federalism is one of the administrative ways that helps to secure our rights, remove oppression and prevent sectarian discrimination among people of one country and one belief," Mr. Hakim said.

In Anbar Province, the western region that is home to the Sunni-led insurgency, the American commander of forces in the area said he agreed with a classified intelligence assessment filed last month by a colonel that said Anbar was in a precarious state and could continue to deteriorate.

But the commander, Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, said he believed he had enough troops to do his job, which he said was to train Iraqi security forces to fight the insurgency and not to win against the insurgency with his own troops.

"Given what our mission is, what we're trying to achieve out here, I think our force levels are about right," he said in a telephone conference call to reporters.

Elements of the intelligence report have been published in newspapers the last two days. One conclusion of the report was that without the addition of another American division to the province, "there is nothing" the American forces there "can do to influence the motivation of the Sunni to wage an insurgency," according to a military officer familiar with the assessment. The report also describes Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia as an "integral part of the social fabric" of Anbar.

Violence flared across parts of Iraq tosday. In western Baghdad, a car bomb aimed at an American convoy killed six civilians and wounded 15, an Interior Ministry official said. A homemade bomb killed one policeman and one civilian and wounded six civilians. An Iraqi policeman was shot dead in southwest Baghdad, and two bodies and a human head were discovered in three different parts of the city. The head had a note attached: "This is the destiny of those who work with the Americans."

Two civilians were killed in separate shootings in Diyala Province.

A police captain in Mosul was assassinated, and Iraqi Army soldier was killed and three wounded by a roadside bomb explosion south of Kirkuk.

Judges in the trial of Saddam Hussein for genocide against the Kurds continued to listen to testimony from witnesses today.

Iran Offers Talks On Nuclear Issue (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

PARIS, Sept. 12 -- Iran's confidential response three weeks ago to an international proposal over its nuclear program offered extensive negotiations to resolve the standoff, but only if proceedings against Iran in the U.N. Security Council were stopped.

In a detailed and sometimes rambling document given to foreign governments, Iran stopped short of rejecting demands to halt its nuclear enrichment program, saying the issue could be resolved in talks. The response, closely held for weeks, was made public on a Web site Monday.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran does not intend to reject the whole issue unilaterally, and is ready to provide an opportunity for both sides to share their viewpoints on this issue and try to convince each other and reach a mutual understanding," the document says.

But ending enrichment should not be a prerequisite to negotiations, as demanded by the United States and other countries, the proposal suggests. And if Security Council deliberations aimed at imposing sanctions on Iran continue, the document warns, "the positions expressed in this response would be void and the Islamic Republic would choose a different course of action."

Iran was responding formally to a package of political and economic incentives offered to it in June by the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China. The countries hope to persuade Iran to stop enriching uranium, which some foreign governments feel is intended for nuclear weapons. Iran contends that the program is peaceful, aimed at making fuel for electrical power plants.

The incentives included the possibility of direct talks with the United States for the first time since relations between the two countries were severed in 1979.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, have been in preliminary talks in recent days over Iran's proposals. On Monday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice suggested that a temporary suspension might be enough to clear the way for formal negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0062124

In the document, posted on the Web site of the Institute for Science and International Security on Monday, the Iranian government repeatedly refers to its rights under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty to develop a peaceful nuclear program, saying it "cannot accept deprivation from its legal rights." As for allegations that it is pursuing weapons, the document demands that Iran be granted a presumption of innocence, in the absence of any proof that it is has a nuclear weapons program.

Iran "is against production, stockpiling, development and proliferation of nuclear weapons," the document says.

It calls for "simultaneous mutual confidence-building" that would include a commitment by the foreign governments "to seriously follow up the fulfillment of a nuclear free zone in the Middle East, particularly the commitment to disarm [Israel] from weapons of mass destruction and in particular nuclear arms." Israel is widely believed to have a nuclear arsenal, but it has never acknowledged having such weapons.

The document also seeks assurances that if Iran engages in nuclear negotiations, it will not be attacked or subjected to economic sanctions.

In the document, Iran portrays the current standoff as the beginning of a negotiating process, saying the foreign governments' proposal "has elements which may be useful for a constructive approach."

But the document complains that the package "lacks any reference to irreversible and irrevocable guarantees" for any ultimate agreement. "Such guarantees are particularly essential on access to advanced nuclear technology and equipment, erection and commissioning of nuclear power reactors, nuclear fuel supply, and transfer of know-how and technology," it says.

The document also seeks a clear statement by the foreign governments of Iran's rights under the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

The document suggests that the secretiveness of Iran's nuclear program was forced upon it by the hostility of other countries, which it said tried to constrain its legitimate and legal rights to develop nuclear technologies under the treaty.

"We have no interest in limiting or suspending inspections of our nuclear facilities and activities," the document says. But "a quarter century of denial and deprivation" forced Iran to develop a nuclear program "on the basis of independence and self-reliance."

U.S. Dismisses Iran's Ideas About Nukes (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 12, 2006

The Bush administration was dismissive Tuesday of Iranian suggestions that it might suspend uranium enrichment for up to two months to set the stage for negotiations over its nuclear program and to head off U.N. sanctions.

"To the best of my knowledge, there has been no Iranian proposal," State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said. "There's been no change in the Iranian position."

Casey said, "They have not agreed to suspend uranium enrichment activities for any length of time that I am aware of."

The spokesman said the Bush administration was proceeding with discussions with other nations on pursuing sanctions against Iran in the U.N. Security Council.

Casey's comments came a day after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left the door open to pursuing a possible compromise with Iran, based on reports that Tehran had proposed a temporary enrichment suspension.

Rice had said Iran had not made a formal offer, and she added that she had not had a chance to learn all the details of the Iranian suggestion. But rather than rule it out, she said, "The question is, are they prepared to suspend verifiably so that negotiations can begin?"

Casey said it was unfortunate that Iran has not given any indication that it would be willing to suspend uranium enrichment activities to pave the way for negotiations.

Casey said Rice will take up the sanctions issue with other diplomats attending the special session of the U.N. General Assembly next week in New York.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns held a telephone conference with officials of other governments Monday and Tuesday and will continue with the talks later in the week, Casey said.

DOJ_NMG_0062125

Casey said suspension of uranium enrichment remained a condition for negotiations with Iran over a package of incentives offered by the United States and the European Union. This included a U.S. offer of technical assistance to Iran for civilian nuclear power development.

The outlook for the Bush administration succeeding in pushing sanctions through the Security Council is not clear.

Russia and China have expressed reservations about imposing sanctions on Iran and called for further diplomacy. Both have the power to veto any resolution and thereby kill it. Some European governments also have seemed dubious about punishing Iran at this stage.

The council threatened Iran with sanctions in July if it did not suspend uranium enrichment as well as work on plutonium for nuclear weapons by Aug. 31. Iran let the deadline pass. It insists it is not trying to make nuclear weapons.

Europe Set For Nuclear Talks With Iran (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Gareth Smyth, And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Europe is poised to compromise on Iran's nuclear programme, in a step that could break the year-long stand-off over Tehran's atomic ambitions.

A deal, floated by Tehran at a weekend meeting in Vienna, would rein in the most sensitive part of the programme as soon as formal negotiations began with the west. In response, the European Union is watering down its insistence that a suspension of enrichment activities must come before talks. But European diplomats stress that they will require Iran to allow United Nations inspectors to carry out spot-checks on its nuclear facilities to ensure that the Islamic republic has kept its side of the bargain.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, appears to have thrown his weight behind Tehran's new proposals, which would suspend uranium enrichment for up to two months once negotiations began. Enrichment can be used to produce both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

The remaining issue of nuclear inspections will be at the centre of a meeting between Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, and Ali Larijani, Iran's senior nuclear security official, scheduled for Thursday. Both sides said the two men's previous encounter, at the weekend, was "constructive".

A deal could pave the way for formal talks with the western powers and the first top-level contact between Tehran and the US since the 1979 revolution. "The dynamic has changed," said a European diplomat. "The key is the inspectors."

But the compromise on offer would be hard for Washington to accept, raising the possibility that the US and Europe could be split on the issue. Washington would be unhappy with any suspension that halted enrichment only for two months, since the United Nations Security Council has already demanded as a matter of course that Iran halt uranium enrichment.

The US said on Tuesday it was not aware of any Iranian proposal to suspend. But some European diplomats warned that the US would be "isolated" if it held out against Tehran's initiative to halt enrichment work if talks got under way.

Tehran's formal proposals refer to the possibility of "suspension of enrichment activities by Iran through negotiations".

The Iranian document also envisages that Iran could "consider voluntary steps towards implementation of the Additional Protocol", an extension to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation treaty that would give UN staff the right to carry out snap inspections of Iran's nuclear facilities.

The document also seeks to confront fears in the west that Iran could, at a later date, leave the NPT and legally develop nuclear weapons.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said on Tuesday Washington would continue its consultations on the text of a UN sanctions resolution.

Grim Report Out Of Anbar Is Disputed By General (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — The senior Marine commander in Iraq said Tuesday that he had sufficient forces to carry out his mission but that the mission did not include defeating the insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0062126

"For what we are trying to achieve out here I think our force levels are about right," said Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, who defined his primary mission as training the Iraqi forces who ultimately would be responsible for security in the area.

"Now, if that mission statement changes — if there is seen a larger role for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight — then that is going to change the metrics of what we need out here," General Zilmer added.

The Marine general commands a force of 30,000 troops who are charged with securing Anbar Province, a vast region in western Iraq that borders Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia. He spoke to reporters in a telephone interview from his headquarters at Camp Falluja.

The Pentagon arranged the interview after articles in The Washington Post and The New York Times reported that General Zilmer's senior intelligence officer had submitted a grim assessment about the political and security situation in Iraq.

The intelligence assessment concluded that Al Qaeda of Mesopotamia, the dominant insurgent group in the area, is an "integral part of the social fabric" in Anbar. It described the region as marked by violence and criminality. It reported that Sunnis had lost confidence in the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government.

The classified intelligence assessment, according to military officials familiar with it, also said that the region would continue to deteriorate unless there was an infusion of aid and a division was sent to reinforce General Zilmer's command, known as MNF-W, for Multinational Force-West.

In his telephone discussion with reporters, General Zilmer declined to discuss the specifics of the report but indicated that he agreed with the intelligence assessment.

At the same time, he insisted that the United States was winning the war, while acknowledging that the effort was hampered by sectarian differences and the belief among Iraqis in Anbar that the Baghdad-based government was not meeting their needs.

"Until those things change, until those long-term effects are realized, then trying to solve the insurgency out here is going to be problematic," he said.

General Zilmer said that sending additional American troops would help in the short run, but was not the key to "achieve long-term security and stability out here in Anbar" because that ultimately depended on the Iraqis.

The general's comments contrasted with those of some of his subordinate officers in the field. Regimental Combat Team 7, which reports to General Zilmer, has recommended that additional forces be deployed in its sector, its officers have said.

The general's account of his mission — training Iraqi forces — was also a narrow one.

President Bush has suggested an expansive strategy to achieve victory by using American forces to clear contested towns of insurgents, holding them with Iraqi security forces and then spending funds to rebuild the infrastructure and win the support of the Iraqi people.

A White House fact sheet issued in March described this process as the "Strategy for Victory: Clear, Hold and Build." At the White House, Tony Snow, the president's spokesman, asserted that Mr. Bush was prepared to send more troops to Anbar if they were requested. "He has made it absolutely clear to generals that the job is to win," Mr. Snow said. "And the first thing you have to do is, to the best of your ability, cut through that fog of war and tell him what the situation is and what they need to get the job done."

Mr. Snow added, however, that the intelligence assessment did not account for the accomplishments of American forces in Iraq. General Zilmer made a similar point in a statement that was released early Tuesday.

"Recent media reports fail to accurately capture the entirety and complexity of the current situation in the Al Anbar Province of Iraq," the statement said. "The classified assessment, which has been referred to in these reports, was intended to focus on the causes of the insurgency. It was not intended to address the positive effects coalition and Iraqi forces have achieved on the security environment over the past years."

General Affirms Anbar Analysis (WP)

But Zilmer Also Cites 'Progress'

DOJ_NMG_0062127

The U.S. commander in western Iraq said he agrees with the findings of a pessimistic classified report recently filed by his top intelligence officer but also insisted that "tremendous progress" is being made in that part of the country.

"I have seen that report and I do concur with that [intelligence] assessment," said Marine Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, speaking to reporters yesterday by telephone from his headquarters near Fallujah, Iraq. He said he found "frank and candid" the analysis by Col. Pete Devlin, the Marine intelligence chief in Iraq, who concluded that prospects for securing Anbar province are dim.

Although the U.S. military can achieve tactical victories daily, the general continued, the insurgency will be "problematic" in western Iraq until comparable success is achieved politically and economically.

According to several Defense Department officials who have read the report, Devlin also argued that the lack of political progress has created a political vacuum in the province. He wrote that the gap is being filled by the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq, said one Army officer who read the assessment. Zilmer did not address that point in his comments to reporters.

"I'm really uneasy" about discussing specifics of the report, the general said, noting that it remains classified.

Until now, the U.S. military view of Iraq has tended to be more optimistic than that of much of the rest of the government, such as the CIA and the State Department. Devlin's report has been received respectfully at the Pentagon and in intelligence circles, where it has been much discussed since it was filed in mid-August.

During a hearing on Capitol Hill on Monday, senior Pentagon official Eric S. Edelman confirmed a Washington Post article about the intelligence assessment and discussed some of its findings.

White House spokesman Tony Snow treated the Devlin report gingerly yesterday when asked about it at a news briefing. "It is conceivable that other people have differing assessments," Snow said.

In his telephone news conference, Zilmer became much more upbeat than his intelligence chief, saying he saw long-term trends as positive. "I think we are winning this war," he told reporters. "We are certainly accomplishing our mission," which he defined as developing Iraq security forces.

In a statement posted on the Web site of the U.S. military in Iraq, Zilmer said that recent news reports "fail to accurately capture the entirety and complexity of the current situation." He also said that Devlin's analysis focused on the causes of the continuing insurgency in Anbar, not on the positive news there.

Zilmer said the number of Iraqi police officers has been growing steadily, and he predicted that he will have an adequate number in the province by next year.

The 30,000 U.S. and allied troops are "stifling" the enemy in the province, Zilmer told reporters. But he would not say insurgents are being defeated. The violence won't be "solved," he said, until progress is made politically, socially and economically.

Devlin suggested in his report that persistent shortages of troops in Anbar have undercut U.S. operations there. Zilmer said he believes that having more U.S. forces would "provide a temporary solution," but that in the long run, the insurgency will be put down only by social and economic advances.

Snow, the White House spokesman, said that President Bush will speak later this week with Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq. "If the president gets a recommendation from the combatant commanders to send more troops to al Anbar province, they will get them," he said.

General Says Sunni Area Not Yet Lost (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — The top American general in insurgency-ravaged western Iraq acknowledged that his troops were far from pacifying Al Anbar province but insisted that the U.S. fight there was not a lost cause.

"We are not where we intended to be," Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said in an unusual telephone news briefing from Marine headquarters in Fallouja. But, he added, "we are not in our end state yet."

The general acknowledged that two key objectives — training Iraqi forces and establishing a functioning local government — lagged in the vast, strategically vital province.

The general was called in to rebut reports, first published this week in the Washington Post, that a secret Marine intelligence assessment last month had concluded that the prospects for securing Al Anbar were dim. The province covers nearly one-third of Iraq.

Word of the intelligence finding came as the Bush administration was trying to put the best face possible on the war before midterm elections and amid a major offensive in Baghdad deemed crucial to any eventual U.S. success here. The strikingly frank findings by the top Marine intelligence officer in the region, which have not been released publicly, are said to have unsettled U.S. policymakers and top brass at the Pentagon.

Zilmer did not dispute the intelligence appraisal: "I have seen that report, and I do concur with that assessment." But he argued that it had been misinterpreted in media accounts.

"It was not intended to address the positive effects coalition and Iraqi forces have achieved on the security environment over the past years," the general said in a statement released Tuesday.

It was unclear whether the report cited a lack of military strength in the region, where about 30,000 U.S. troops work alongside about 13,000 American-trained Iraqi soldiers and 6,400 Iraqi policemen. But the general, echoing other senior U.S. commanders, insisted that he had sufficient American personnel to do the job in an area that encompasses much of the "Sunni Triangle" and such sometime insurgent strongholds as Fallouja, Ramadi and Haditha.

Some U.S. critics have argued that the Bush administration's plan for Iraq has suffered from a shortage of troops since the American-led invasion in March 2003 that toppled Saddam Hussein. But Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and other top officials have insisted that troop strength is sufficient to defeat the insurgency and bring a stable government to war-torn Iraq.

Al Anbar, with its immense open spaces, palm-fringed Euphrates River valley villages and long borders with Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Syria, has been a hotbed of the Sunni Arab-led insurgency since shortly after the invasion.

The region is considered the Sunni heartland, and its residents have been hostile to the U.S.-backed, Shiite-led government that came to power after the fall of Hussein, a Sunni who oppressed the nation's Shiite Muslim majority.

Many Al Anbar residents see U.S. forces as agents of a regime that intends to disenfranchise and marginalize Sunnis while forging alliances with Shiite Iran, Iraq's historical rival.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, a Shiite, has vowed to reach out to Sunnis and form a unity government.

To some critics, the U.S. effort in Al Anbar and elsewhere in Iraq also has suffered from the unduly optimistic forecasts of American commanders. Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler, who headed the Marines in Iraq at the time of a concentrated 2004 attack on Fallouja, declared that November that the operation had "broken the back of the insurgency."

In fact, the rebellion has continued in Al Anbar, Baghdad and elsewhere as the death toll for U.S. troops in Iraq has topped 2,600. Zilmer acknowledged Tuesday that Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups in the region were mostly composed of fighters "largely from within Iraq," not foreigners.

Zilmer said his chief mission was to train Iraqi soldiers and police to replace U.S. troops. Despite setbacks, the general said, he envisioned a full Iraqi police contingent and independently operating Iraqi army units to be ready by late spring.

"The Iraqi face on the soldier, the Iraqi face on the police that are here, is very threatening for the insurgency," Zilmer said.

The development of security forces in Al Anbar has long been slowed by desertions, discord within the ranks and a lack of trust among the region's mostly Sunni population.

Insurgents frequently target police and soldiers. Many residents resent the large numbers of Shiite troops deployed there from the largely Shiite south. Local recruiting has often proved difficult because of the insurgency. Widespread illiteracy also has disqualified many military applicants, the general said.

Pentagon officials requested that Zilmer go on a media offensive to correct what the Marine command and some defense officials considered an oversimplified portrait of what was going on in Iraq.

"Clearly there are parts of local governance working better than others," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

Whitman suggested that the possible problems in Al Anbar "shouldn't overshadow the fact there is much progress throughout Iraq."

In a House hearing Monday, Eric S. Edelman, the undersecretary of Defense for policy, acknowledged that the insurgency in Al Anbar remained a problem and said the Marine intelligence assessment was important as "a snapshot in time."

DOJ_NMG_0062129

The report states that military power alone will not solve Al Anbar's problems, Edelman said.

"I think it's clear to all of us who have been involved in this issue for a while that Anbar has been the epicenter of the insurgency for some time — that a purely military solution to any insurgency is not possible; it needs a political solution as well," he said.

Zilmer: U.S. 'Stifling' Iraq Insurgency (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 12, 2006

A senior American commander in Iraq said Tuesday that U.S.-led military operations are "stifling" the insurgency in western Anbar province but are not strong enough to defeat it.

Marine Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer told reporters in a telephone interview from his headquarters in Fallujah that he has enough U.S. troops — about 30,000 — to accomplish what he called his main mission: training Iraqi security forces.

"For what we are trying to achieve out here I think our force levels are about right," he said. Even so, he said the training of Iraqi soldiers and police had not progressed as quickly as once expected.

"Now, if that mission statement changes — if there is seen a larger role for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight — then that is going to change the metrics of what we need out here," he added.

Zilmer, who has commanded U.S. forces in western Iraq since February, said increasing the number of U.S. troops there would help in the short term, "but at the end of the day I don't think it's going to be the significant change that is necessary to achieve long-term security and stability out here in Anbar."

What is needed, he said, is progress on the economic and political fronts that will undercut support for the insurgency.

The situation in Anbar, with its heavily Sunni population, is a barometer for the entire Sunni Arab minority, which lost its favored position to the majority Shiites and the Kurds when Saddam Hussein's regime collapsed in 2003.

As long as the insurgency rages, it is unlikely that Sunni Arab politicians in Baghdad can win over significant numbers of Sunnis to support the government of national unity, which took office May 20.

Some areas in Anbar have shown significant progress, such as the border city of Qaim, once an al-Qaida stronghold. Trouble has increased in other areas, like the rural stretch between Ramadi and Fallujah. Insurgent killings of Iraqi police in Fallujah have become commonplace, according to officials there.

Zilmer dismissed a reporter's suggestion that the war in Anbar — a province the size of North Carolina that stretches west from Baghdad to the borders of Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia — has been lost.

"I think we are winning this war," he said.

In the long run, the war will not be won on the battlefield, Zilmer said. The outcome will be determined by the Iraqis' ability to compromise on their political goals, accommodate their sectarian differences and demonstrate to ordinary people that a democratic central government can serve their needs.

"Until those things change, until those long-term effects are realized, then trying to solve the insurgency out here is going to be problematic," he said.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said President Bush would be talking to Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, later this week.

"If the president gets a recommendation from the combatant commanders to send more troops to al-Anbar province, they will get them," Snow said.

As of Monday there were 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, the highest number since December 2005. Most of the recent increase was for Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi forces are trying to avert a civil war.

Pentagon officials hastily arranged the interview with Zilmer in response to a series of news reports about a classified report by the chief of intelligence for the Marines in western Anbar province, Col. Pete Devlin. Zilmer said he agreed with the assessment by Devlin, who works for Zilmer, and he did not dispute news reports that characterized it as depicting Anbar as locked in a military stalemate with inadequate political progress.

The classified report was first reported by the Washington Post.

The New York Times reported Tuesday that the Devlin report concluded that Anbar's political and security situation will continue to deteriorate unless it gets a major infusion of aid and substantially more U.S. troops.

Zilmer would not discuss specifics of the Devlin report, but said he did not want more U.S. troops as long as his mission did not include defeating the insurgency.

The Devlin assessment was made in mid-August.

Before the telephone interview, Zilmer issued a written and a video statement.

"Recent media reports fail to accurately capture the entirety and complexity of the current situation," Zilmer said in his written statement.

He added that the assessment "which has been referred to in these reports, was intended to focus on the causes of the insurgency. It was not intended to address the positive effects Coalition and Iraqi forces have achieved on the security environment over the past years."

Zilmer acknowledged, however, that "there is an active insurgency in Anbar. The enemy we face has no concern for the welfare of the Iraqi people, nor any peaceful vision for their future. We believe the Iraqi people want something more and are willing to fight and die for it."

General: Force Too Small To Beat Insurgency (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — A senior American commander in Iraq said Tuesday that U.S.-led military operations are "stifling" the insurgency in western Anbar province but are not strong enough to defeat it.

Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer told reporters in a telephone interview from his headquarters in Fallujah that he has enough U.S. troops — about 30,000 — to accomplish what he called his main mission: training Iraqi security forces.

"For what we are trying to achieve out here, I think our force levels are about right," he said. "Now, if that mission statement changes — if there is seen a larger role for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight — then that is going to change the metrics of what we need out here."

Pentagon officials arranged the interview with Zilmer in response to news reports about a classified report by Col. Pete Devlin, the chief of intelligence for the Marines in western Anbar province.

Zilmer did not dispute news reports that said Devlin depicted Anbar as locked in a military stalemate with inadequate political progress. The classified report was first reported by The Washington Post.

Zilmer, who has commanded U.S. forces in western Iraq since February, said increasing the number of U.S. troops there would help in the short term. What is needed, he said, is progress on the economic and political fronts that will undercut support for the insurgency.

Zilmer dismissed a suggestion that the war in Anbar had been lost: "I think we are winning this war."

In Iraq on Tuesday, former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein railed against "agents of Iran and Zionism" and vowed to "crush your heads" after listening to Kurdish witnesses at his genocide trial tell of atrocities against them nearly two decades ago.

The outburst came after witnesses talked about the campaign in 1987-88 to suppress a Kurdish revolt in northern Iraq. The prosecution claims about 180,000 Kurds lost their lives. If convicted of genocide charges, Saddam and the six other defendants could face death by hanging.

Also, at least 24 people were killed around Iraq overnight and Tuesday.

More Troops For A Shrinking Battlefield (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

President Bush's forceful and, of course, nonpartisan 9/11 commemoration speech Monday night obviously didn't suit some of his critics.

"The safety of America," he said, "depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." This linking of the "Global War on Terror" with the war in Iraq naturally brought howls of protest from the usual naysayers and cut-and-runners.

But the address also may have disappointed those conservative supporters who think things aren't going exactly swimmingly in Iraq.

For example, early and staunch war backers such as the Weekly Standard's William Kristol and the National Review's Rich Lowry called on Bush yesterday "to stop the downward slide in Iraq" by putting "substantially more troops" there. (Lowry was among several conservative journalists who met with Bush later yesterday.)

Kristol and Lowry didn't talk numbers, but it shouldn't require that many.

After all, Anbar province (Sunnistan) is looking pretty much gone -- and that's 30 percent of the country. Kurdistan in the north, about 20 percent of the county, is quiet for now pending a Kurdish move to push out the Shiites in Kirkuk. And Shiastan in the south, except for some squabbling, is quiet in its own 30 percent of the country. So it really comes down to greater Baghdad.

Meanwhile, the number of U.S. troops in Iraq has quietly inched up to about 140,000, and nearly 300,000 Iraqi forces have been fully trained, though many have yet to "stand up" -- except to run for it.Worth a Thousand Words

Despite Bush's fine speech, it's unclear whether the State Department is fully on board. A colleague reports that, as of last week, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's photo has yet to replace that of former prime minister Ibrahim al-Jafari in the Bush Diplomatic Hall of Glory photo array at the department.

It's been nearly five months since Maliki took over, but still no photo. Are they thinking he's a short-timer and trying to save on framing costs?Do Speak, Don't Tell

Attention, native speakers of war-on-terrorism languages! The Pentagon will pay "full scholarships" -- $14,000 in tuition and an $11,000 "living stipend" -- for a six-month intensive training program at Georgetown University.

It's the first of its kind: the English for Heritage Language Speakers Program, being offered to "native speakers of Arabic . . . Hindi, Indonesian, Pashto, Persian (Farsi or Dari), Urdu or Punjabi." Speakers of Chinese (Mandarin or Cantonese) are also welcome.

The program, funded by the Pentagon's National Security Education Program, is for folks who want to "develop English skills for careers in the federal government," according to a recent ad.

"Apply now!" the ad says. Applications must be received by Oct. 2. Get your forms at http://ehls.georgetown.edu . There are only 16 slots.

Now, you may be wondering: "But will there be a job for me when I graduate?" No problem. There are certain to be plenty of openings. A 2005 Government Accountability Office report found that since 1993, about 300 language specialists -- 55 of them in Arabic -- have been booted out of the military because of the "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gay men and lesbians.

So don't worry. Sign up now!An Unintended Warming

What happens when you say something, anything, acknowledging your opponent's effectiveness? Your competitor uses it to generate money and publicity. Take politician extraordinaire Al Gore , speaking a few months ago on National Public Radio, when he was asked to name "an organized campaign to discredit the science of global warming."

"One of the many front groups that's funded by these polluters, the Competitive Enterprise Institute," Gore said, "is running television ads right now, and the tag line is, the announcer says, 'CO2, they call it pollution, we call it life.' It almost falls off its own absurdity," Gore said, "but over 20 years, I have seen them have a tremendous effect."

Next thing you know, the last part of that statement appears prominently in a CEI fundraising brochure. Then a couple of days ago, when Gore was on Australian television, the announcer played one of CEI's ads attacking his cause cÃ©lÃ¨bre. Gore was then obliged to respond.

"Despite his prominence in our fundraising brochure," CEI general counsel Sam Kazman notes, "we have yet to receive a contribution from him, even though it would be fully tax-deductible." Best not to hold your breath.The Bin Laden Effect

Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, ripped into a comment by "Democrat" leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who had said of Osama bin Laden : "Even to capture him now, I don't think makes us any safer."

Hunter said that Pelosi's "statement can only have a demoralizing effect on American troops and intelligence personnel who are currently risking their lives" pursuing bin Laden.

Of course, the president and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have also played down bin Laden's importance in the overall fight against terrorism.

60 Bodies Found Scattered Around Baghdad (AP)

Associated Press, September 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- Police said Wednesday that they had found 60 bodies dumped around Baghdad, the majority in predominantly Sunni Arab areas.

The bodies were found overnight, 45 in mostly Sunni parts of western Baghdad and the rest in majority Shiite areas of eastern Baghdad, police said.

All the bodies were bound, bore signs of torture and had been shot, police 1st Lt. Thayer Mahmoud said. Such killings are usually the work of sectarian death squads.

Meanwhile, violence killed at least two dozen people across Iraq on Tuesday, including six who died when a car bomb blew up in western Baghdad.

The attack also wounded 18 people in Mansour, an upscale neighborhood that has been the scene of repeated bombings and kidnappings.

Northeast of the capital, at least four people were killed and two dozen wounded when a roadside bomb exploded next to a market in the town of Middadiyah.

And in the northern city of Mosul, gunmen attacked and killed four Kurds and injured another, said Ahmed Abdul-Aziz, a doctor at Jumhouri Hospital.

Police in the Anbar province capital of Ramadi, meanwhile, reported that three people were killed in an explosion in the city west of Baghdad.

The violence came as deputies argued over a bill that Sunni Arabs fear will split Iraq into three sectarian and ethnic cantons.

A group of lawmakers tried Tuesday to take advantage of the unpopularity of U.S. troops among many Shiite and Sunni legislators to seek approval of a resolution setting a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops - something the Shiite-dominated government has refused to do.

Sponsored by supporters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and some Sunni Arabs, the resolution managed to gather 104 signatures in the 275-member parliament before it was effectively shelved by being sent to a committee for review.

That committee will need at least six months to examine the resolution and present its findings to parliament. If it were to be approved, such a resolution would be binding on the government.

"We do not want another kitchen in which decisions are cooked away from the representatives of the people and away from the hearing of the Iraqi people," complained Falah al-Mishaal, the Shiite legislator who presented the resolution.

No headway was made on an even more contentious proposal: legislation that would set in place the mechanism for establishing autonomous regions as part of a federal Iraq. Debate on the matter was put off until Sept. 19.

Sunni Arabs have vehemently opposed the legislation. Both the north, already controlled by Kurds, and the south, where Shiites are dominant, are rich in oil, and Sunnis fear they will end up squeezed into Baghdad and Iraq's western provinces, which have no natural resources.

"People are more preoccupied now with the deteriorating security situation and in order to have federalism, we should have democracy first. But with this deterioration in security, it difficult to achieve federalism," argued Naseer al-Ani, a member of largest Sunni Arab political group.

Although federalism is part of Iraq's constitution, and there is already an autonomous Kurdish region in the north, legislation and a referendum would be needed to turn Iraq into a full federation.

Iraq's most powerful Shiite politician and leader of its largest party, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, called on fellow clerics to support the bill.

The coalition al-Hakim leads in parliament, the United Iraqi Alliance, submitted the bill last week. It would be the first step in creating a separate autonomous state in the south much like the region run by Kurds in the north.

Federalism Plan Dead, Says Iraqi Speaker (WP)

By Amit R. Paley And K.I. Ibrahim

DOJ_NMG_0062133

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 12 -- The speaker of the Iraqi parliament said Tuesday that a controversial plan to partition the country into three autonomous regions is politically dead.

Mahmoud al-Mashhadani said in an interview that legislation to implement a concept known as federalism, which threatened to collapse the country's fragile multi-sect government, would likely be postponed indefinitely after a meeting of political leaders on Wednesday.

The federalism plan would create a Shiite region in southern Iraq much like the autonomous zone in the north controlled by the Kurds. Sunnis have generally opposed the plan, on grounds that it would leave them only with vast swaths of desert in the country's middle, devoid of the oil reserves in the other regions.

The constitution that Iraq adopted last fall allows for a form of federalism. Sunni parties supported the charter only reluctantly and joined the current government on condition of a resumption of federalism discussions, in which they hoped to kill the concept.

"If federalism is to be applied now, it will lead to the secession of the south and the establishment of an Islamist extremist state in the center of the country," said Mashhadani, an outspoken Sunni Arab who is the third-ranking official in the government. "It is not possible to venture or to start the application of federalism now."

"Look, Iraqi blood is more important than federalism," he said.

When asked to predict the likely outcome of Wednesday's meeting of political leaders, he said: "We could agree on the principle and then postpone the topic for four years."

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the largest Shiite political coalition in Iraq, is the strongest backer of legislation that would begin translating the constitution's vague concepts of federalism into law.

In the Shiite holy city of Najaf on Tuesday, Hakim issued a full defense of federalism, which he described as a basic constitutional right of all Iraqis. Analysts say Hakim hopes to become the leader of the Shiite region, which would comprise about nine of Iraq's 18 provinces.

"We believe federalism is one of the administrative methods that would help the people gain their rights, undo the injustices, and prevent discrimination on the basis of ethnic origin, sect or religion," Hakim said.

But support for the plan began to erode after a vast array of Sunni, Shiite and secular groups boycotted parliament on Sunday to protest the plan. Mashhadani said Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the most revered Shiite cleric in Iraq, had ordered Shiite politicians to back off from the plan in order to prevent bitter infighting.

Mashhadani said the country is not prepared for federalism because its government is not strong enough to provide security and services, and because of troubled relationships with some neighboring countries.

"The United States is a federated system and it is leading the world. But this was after the Civil War," Mashhadani said. "So must we go through a civil war in order to achieve federalism?"

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, in his first state visit to Iran, discussed ways to improve the security situation in Iraq with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. American officials have accused Tehran of fomenting violence in Iraq by supporting Shiite militias.

"Iran will provide assistance to the Iraqi government to establish full security," Ahmadinejad said, according to the official Islamic Republic News Agency. "We believe strengthening the Iraqi government is tantamount to promoting security, peace and friendship in that country."

Violence continued across Iraq on Tuesday. At least 32 people were killed or their bodies were found in separate incidents in different parts of the country, authorities said. In northern Baghdad, 14 students were kidnapped after completing their exams, the Iraqi military said. No further details were released.

Kurd's Testimony Includes Taunt For Hussein: `You Are In A Cage' (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062134

BAGHDAD — A Kurdish villager mocked Saddam Hussein in court Tuesday as the man recalled the disappearance of his relatives during a 1980s military campaign in northern Iraq.

"Congratulations! You are in a cage," said the witness, Ghafour Hassan Abdullah, addressing Hussein and his six codefendants seated behind metal grates in the courtroom.

The former strongman's patience failed as a defense lawyer described Iraqi Kurdish rebels as freedom fighters.

"No, they are not! They are collaborators for the Zionists!" Hussein shouted during his trial on charges that his forces killed as many as 100,000 people during the campaign against Kurdish militants. "We will crush the heads of all Zionists and their collaborators!"

Several witnesses testified Tuesday at the trial, which is expected to last until at least December, about abuses by Hussein's military.

Akram Ali Hussein, 41, described what he said was a chemical attack in 1987 on the village of Sikanyan.

"We saw all the bushes had turned white," he said.

The following year, he said, the village was bombarded again and a dozen relatives, including his mother, sister and brother, were imprisoned. Later, he said, he learned that two cousins had died of hunger and that their bodies had been eaten by dogs at the prison.

"I want the whole world to know what he did," the witness said of the former Iraqi leader.

Hussein seemed exasperated on several occasions.

"When I am right I cannot be scared, and I don't think there is a power on Earth that can shake even one hair of my mustache," Hussein declared. "But I have noticed today that there were too many insults. And when you put a lion in a cage, any coward can put a stick in the cage and frighten him."

The Iraqi parliament, meanwhile, on Tuesday shelved a measure that would have forced American authorities to present a schedule for the withdrawal of U.S. and other foreign troops from Iraq.

"We demand a timetable to rebuild our Iraqi forces and to rehabilitate our army," said Dhafir Ani, a representative of the minority Sunni Arab bloc. "This gathering today is the first step for a political stance against the occupation and to unite Iraq."

The Bush administration has refused to give a timetable for withdrawal, saying it would embolden the insurgency.

The resolution is said to have the support of more than 100 lawmakers, including followers of militant Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr.

But the Shiite leadership in the 275-member parliament opposes a strict timetable, and the proposal was sent to a committee for study.

It was another violent day in the capital, where a car bomb killed six people and wounded 15 in the upscale Mansour district, the site of frequent attacks and kidnappings. The bomb targeted a passing U.S. patrol, authorities said, but no U.S. troops were reported injured.

Elsewhere, the country's communal slaughter persisted amid grisly new finds of bodies.

A hospital source said authorities discovered six beheaded bodies in Baghdad's Ghazaliya neighborhood. Ghazaliya is one of a number of districts "cleared" during a recent U.S.-led sweep that reduced violence. But there has been a resurgence of violence in the district since most U.S. forces moved on to other neighborhoods.

The bodies of 10 young men, all gunshot victims, were found in various parts of Baghdad and delivered to the morgue, an official said. Most had signs of torture. Four other bodies were found south of Baghdad, authorities said.

In the troubled, mixed-sect province of Diyala, northeast of the capital, officials said two Sunni mosques were attacked and burned Tuesday. Those assaults followed an attack Monday on a Shiite mosque. Factions also fired about 40 mortar shells, officials reported. There was no word on casualties.

A hospital source in the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi said three people were killed and five injured in clashes between gunmen and U.S. forces. There was no confirmation from American authorities.

The Associated Press reported that at least four people were killed and two dozen wounded in a bomb explosion near a market in the town of Miqdadiya, northeast of the capital, and that gunmen shot and killed four Kurds in the northern city of Mosul. Kurds and Arabs have been battling in Mosul and in Kirkuk, a key northern city.

Soldier Describes Anguish In Revealing Murder Allegations (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, September 13, 2006

On a night in June, Pfc. Justin Watt lay in his cot in Iraq, anguishing over whether to tell Army investigators that he suspected soldiers from his own platoon had raped a 14-year-old girl and then killed her and her family.

He decided to call his father back home. "If you knew something bad about your brothers," Watt asked him, "would you come forward?"

The satellite phone link between Iraq and South Carolina was clear, and Rick Watt remembers that his son sounded distraught.

An Army veteran, the elder Watt asked for details, but Justin Watt would offer none. Finally, Rick Watt told his son that whatever had happened would have to be monstrous. "Heinous," he said, "is the only reason for giving up a brother."

Hours later, Justin Watt, 23, of Tucson, told authorities what he had learned from talking with another soldier from their platoon in the 101st Airborne Division. That soldier is one of four now accused of the killings March 12 in Mahmoudiya, Iraq.

In the months since, the four soldiers have been charged in a military court in Iraq with rape and murder. Another soldier is accused of failing to report the crime. And Steven Green, a platoon member discharged from the Army since the crimes, faces rape and murder charges in federal court in connection with the case.

If the allegations prove true, the assault by American soldiers would be among the worst atrocities of the Iraq war. "It is extremely damaging to the standing of the United States," Samir Sumaidaie, Iraqi ambassador to the United States, told ABC News, "(and) hurts the fight against terrorism."

By coming forward, Watt became — in the eyes of his father and one Army officer — a different kind of war hero, one whose valor wasn't immediately commended and who now lives with the fear of payback from other soldiers. A U.S. senator has told the Army that Watt has "received threats," and the Army says it is investigating whether Watt is in danger.

In interviews by telephone and over the Internet from Iraq, Justin Watt recounted for the first time details about his decision to come forward. He declined to discuss the criminal case or any threats against him because they are under investigation. But he explained how the violence that racked his platoon all year and claimed so many of his friends drove his decision.

Since being assigned to a different unit and moved away from those who may resent what he did, Watt says he feels isolated and misses his buddies.

"I'm an ordinary guy in an extraordinary situation who is dealing with a stupid amount of stress right now," he says. "This investigation hasn't changed the fact that I'm at war. I still deal with that every day. The only difference is, now when I come home, in the back of my mind I'm thinking, 'Could something happen to me because of this?' I don't know."

'We'd come through hell'

Mahmoudiya is in a region south of Baghdad known as the "Triangle of Death," an area patrolled since October by Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 502nd Regiment of the 101st Airborne.

Bravo, particularly the 1st Platoon in which Justin Watt served, has suffered heavy casualties. "There was a saying," Watt recalls, " '1st Platoon is in no shortage of very good, but very unlucky, men.' "

He would later testify in a military court: "We'd come through hell with each other."

His best Army friend and former roommate, Pfc. Tyler MacKenzie, 20, of Evans, Colo., died in a roadside explosion in November. Four 1st Platoon soldiers were killed in a 12-day period in December. In February, an electrical fire swept through the company barracks. Watt lost letters and pictures from home, a digital camera, an iPod and a knife that was a gift from his father. By then, he says, he was convinced he would not survive Iraq.

On March 12, in the midst of the platoon's hard-luck tour, the bodies of Abeer Qassim al-Janabi, 14; her 5-year-old sister, Hadeel; their mother, Fikhriya Taha; and their father, Qassim Hamza, were found in their Mahmoudiya home. The Army initially blamed the assault on insurgents.

Three months after the Iraqi family was found slaughtered, the 1st Platoon suffered a devastating attack. Insurgents overran a checkpoint in Youssifiyah on June 16, killing Spc. David Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., and capturing Pfc. Kristian

Menchaca, 23, of Houston, and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. Watt was close friends with Tucker and Menchaca, who were later found tortured and killed.

Watt says he could barely sleep after the kidnappings. When he did, he had nightmares about dead Iraqi children or slain comrades, talking to or staring at him. The bodies of Tucker and Menchaca were discovered June 19.

What he learned

Shortly after the kidnappings, Watt spoke with another Bravo Company friend, Sgt. Anthony Yribe, 22. According to testimony Watt later gave in court, reported by a small group of journalists allowed inside the hearing, Yribe disclosed a terrible secret: He suspected that 1st Platoon soldiers had attacked the Iraqi family March 12.

Shaken, Watt later approached another soldier in 1st Platoon, Pfc. Bryan Howard, 19. Howard, Watt testified, told him a gruesome story. The details emerged during a so-called Article 32 hearing held in Baghdad last month. In such hearings, an investigator listens to evidence and decides whether to recommend a court-martial.

The Article 32 hearing considered charges of rape and murder against the four soldiers: Howard, Spc. James Barker, 23, Sgt. Paul Cortez, 23, and Pfc. Jesse Spielman, 21. A fifth, Yribe, is not alleged to have taken part in the attack and is charged with dereliction of duty for failing to report the crimes.

The official transcript of the hearing has not been released. According to the testimony reported by a pool of journalists and made available to news outlets, the rape victim and her family lived about 220 yards from a traffic-control point in Mahmoudiya. For several days before the killings, Howard, Barker, Cortez, Spielman and then-Army Pvt. Steven Green staffed the checkpoint.

Army investigator Benjamin Bierce testified at the hearing that Green repeatedly spoke of his desire to kill Iraqis and emerged as the leader of the attack, the media pool report said.

The soldiers also talked about the 14-year-old girl, whom they had seen passing through their checkpoint, Bierce testified.

Bierce testified at the Article 32 hearing that on March 12, the group had a plan to assault the girl. With Howard acting as lookout, Barker, Cortez, Spielman and Green entered the family's house, Bierce testified. Green herded the parents and the 5-year-old into a bedroom, according to the pool report of a statement made by one suspect, Barker.

At the hearing, there was conflicting evidence about who raped the girl, according to the pool coverage. Army investigator Michael Hood, for example, testified that Spielman passed a polygraph test in which he denied raping or shooting anyone during the attack. Cortez, in his statement, denied raping the girl. Howard's lawyer, Army Capt. Megan Shaw, argued that he did not believe the attack was actually going to happen.According to Barker's statement, Cortez pushed Abeer, the 14-year-old girl, to the floor, lifted her dress and tore away her underwear as she struggled. Barker said in his statement that he and Cortez both attempted to rape the girl.

Barker also said he heard gunshots from the bedroom, and an agitated Green emerged holding an AK-47, the media pool report said. "They're all dead. I just killed them," he told the others, according to Barker's statement.

Green then raped the girl and shot her to death, Barker told investigators, and her body was set on fire.

'Put yourself in my shoes'

Watt says he struggled over what to do about what he had learned from Howard and Yribe. He would later testify at the Article 32 hearing that the Army excels at teaching soldiers everything from hygiene to rifle assembly. "But there's nothing I've read that says what to do if your buddies have raped and murdered a family," he said in court, according to the media pool report.

"Put yourself in my shoes," Watt says in an interview. "My roommate's dead. A bunch of my friends are dead. Two of my buddies are being tortured to death. Green is back in the States. He doesn't have to suffer at all. These good men are dead."

Watt says he's not religious. But months before, when so many friends were killed, he had prayed for God to give him strength. As he wrestled with a decision, he says he sensed God was watching. "I felt like if I didn't do the right thing, I wasn't holding up my end of the deal," Watt says. "If I didn't do anything, I was dead. Lost my grace with God."

That's when he called home. Watt says he had already decided to go to authorities before the call home to his father. But he says he needed — if only briefly — to connect with his dad. "I knew there was a world to go back to where people cared about me," he says. "I didn't feel so alone."

After the call, Watt asked to speak to a mental health counselor. Subsequent media reports said that a soldier receiving counseling suddenly had reported the attack on the Iraqi family.

Watt says there was nothing sudden about it.

He asked to speak with a mental health counselor because he wanted to bypass what he thought would be a skeptical command structure and get an audience with Army investigators, he says. Through the mental health counselor, Army investigators were notified and interviewed Watt.

Documents in the federal court proceeding against Green say investigators were tipped off June 20. By that time, Green had been sent home from Iraq and discharged from the Army in May with a "personality disorder," according to the documents.

After Watt came forward, the FBI arrested Green in North Carolina on June 30. He has pleaded not guilty, and his arraignment in federal court on rape and murder charges in the Mahmoudiya case is scheduled for Nov. 8 in Louisville.

Based on the evidence presented at the Article 32 hearing for the five soldiers charged in Iraq, Army Col. Dwight Warren issued a report Sept. 3 recommending that they face a court-martial. A final Army decision on that recommendation is pending.

The four soldiers charged with rape and murder, who could face the death penalty if convicted, were recently transferred to a stateside military jail in an undisclosed location, Army spokesperson Kelly Tyler says.

Two weeks after testifying in the Article 32 hearing, Watt was moved from Bravo to Charlie Company. Capt. William Dougherty, Charlie Company's commander, wrote to Watt's parents Aug. 2 praising their son. His comments were the first accolades from the Army the family has received.

"I am proud of him for coming forward. It took moral courage," Dougherty wrote in an e-mail Watt's father shared with USA TODAY. "I know that he has been through a lot."

Dougherty did not respond to a request for comment.

Rick Watt, 55, a demolition consultant from North Charleston, S.C., believes his son deserves a medal. "I'm amazed at the content of his character and his courage," he says.

Due to come home soon

Watt is the oldest of Rick and Vivi Watt's three children.

The couple separated last year, but the family remains close. Rick Watt says he worked hard to instill honesty in his children. "I'm a firm believer that when we leave this world, the only thing we take with us is the imprint we've made on other people, and our own reputation," he says.

Justin, considered by family members as the most sensitive and introspective of the three kids, seemed the least likely to choose the Army and combat, his brother Darin and his father say.

Watt dropped out of high school at age 17 and passed his high school equivalency exam so he could pursue his dream job: working for an Internet gaming company. The company failed within a year, and after working various jobs,Watt surprised his family by enlisting.

Like so many other soldiers in Iraq, he created a page on MySpace .com, a popular collection of personal Web pages. There, he listed his dad as his hero. Until Justin Watt took the page down from the Internet, it was a place to vent his frustrations and fears about war.

He noted on June 26: "Nobody will ever know that I brought justice to a murdered family."

When his name surfaced in the media, Rick and Vivi Watt pleaded for help from U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz. Kyl wrote the Army on Aug. 2, warning that Justin Watt had "received threats" and demanding that his safety be a priority. Kyl also questioned whether Watt should be shifted out of the 101st Airborne for his own security and provided a lawyer.

In a response Aug. 11, Army Brig. Gen. Bernard Champoux wrote that Watt has been provided a lawyer "although he is not suspected of any wrongdoing." Champoux also says that the Army is investigating Watt's claim that he has been harassed and mistreated since he came forward.

"In Pfc. Watt's sworn statement and his conversations with his chain of command, he expressed that he has never been personally threatened," Champoux wrote. "He was told about possible threats by another member of his (original) unit."

Watt's father shared with USA TODAY the exchange of letters written by Kyl and Champoux. Andrew Wilder, a spokesman in Kyl's office, confirmed that Kyl sent and received the letters.

Rick Watt says he is still not satisfied with the steps the Army has taken to keep his son safe.

DOJ_NMG_0062138

"I am legitimately concerned," he says. "I guarantee you, if anything happens to my son, there will be careers lost and people will be prosecuted who are wearing brass today. Because I won't stop until it happens."

Watt is now stationed in Latifiyah, a few miles from Mahmoudiya, and his unit is due to rotate home in a few days. He remains stunned by all that followed his decision to come forward.

"I don't regret it by any means," he says. "But, God, I had no idea it was going to be like this."

He says the Army has promised new assignments that he cannot discuss. "That's all I want," he says, "a fresh start."

Army Secretary Reveals Combat Death Plan (USAT/AP)

USA Today/AP, September 13, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Army Secretary Francis Harvey says he is aiming to "achieve perfection" in a new drive to inform families of soldiers killed in combat about the circumstances of their deaths.

In a memo obtained Tuesday by the Associated Press, Harvey outlines a far-reaching review he recently initiated of some 2,000 casualty reports from Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere.

In the Sept. 1 letter to Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., Harvey reveals a previously unknown element of the reforms: Commanders in the field must investigate even if the cause of death was apparent. Previously, such investigations were conducted only when there was uncertainty about the circumstances, Army spokesman Paul Boyce said.

The review follows highly publicized mistakes in what families were told about their relatives who had died. The best-known error involved Cpl. Pat Tillman, who quit professional football to join the U.S. Army Rangers and was killed in Afghanistan in April 2004. His family was originally told he had been killed by enemy fire, but five weeks later they learned that fellow Rangers had accidentally shot him.

Harvey offers heart-rending new details on the mishandling of one such case: A medic apparently misjudged a soldier dead and ordered other wounded soldiers treated first.

"As part of this program, numerous improvements have been made to the casualty reporting, notification, and assistance process in order to prevent the mistakes of the past, such as those that were made in (the) Sgt. McCaffrey and 1st Lt. Tyson case," Harvey wrote in the memo to Boxer.

He referred to two California soldiers shot to death in June 2004 by Iraqi civil-defense officers whom they were training: Spc. Patrick McCaffrey Sr., promoted posthumously to sergeant, and 1st Lt. Andre D. Tyson.

The Army initially told the men's families that they had died in a conventional ambush. Two years after their deaths, and nine months after its investigations were completed, the Army informed their survivors that the two were deliberately killed by Iraqi trainees patrolling alongside them.

According to Harvey, the mistake was the result of a bureaucratic oversight. The soldiers' unit had redeployed by the time Army investigators completed their probe in September 2005. By then, the soldiers' brigade had "lost visibility" of the investigation.

Additionally, the Army Casualty and Memorial Affairs Operations Center did not know of the existence of that last investigation, he said.

The Army secretary said he remains deeply involved in the reforms he recently initiated. "I personally review this program monthly," Harvey wrote, adding that he tracks individual cases where families have raised concerns about information they have or have not received.

"The objective is to achieve perfection — no errors at any time in any part of the process," he wrote.

Attached to the memo is a 2 1/2-page list of answers to questions Boxer had posed to Harvey regarding the circumstances of McCaffrey and Tyson's deaths.

McCaffrey's mother, Nadia McCaffrey, believes her son was left to bleed to death after he was shot repeatedly. According to the investigation completed in September 2005 and obtained previously by the AP, a crew of medics rushed to the scene to treat the wounded soldiers, driving straight into the "kill zone" with little protective cover.

A medic who assessed the wounded soldiers' condition said McCaffrey was dead. But another combat lifesaver checked McCaffrey's pulse and couldn't tell whether he had one or not, so he helped load him onto a truck, then gave him CPR. About halfway back to Camp Anaconda the soldier heard faint gurgling from McCaffrey and later felt a faint pulse, he wrote in a sworn statement the next day.

McCaffrey had a bullet and bullet fragments in his lungs, plus one in his abdomen and another in his chest cavity.

The document obtained Tuesday says, without naming names, that "the soldiers responding to the incident prioritized the casualties," starting with Tyson, who had a bullet in his brain, the projectile entering just below where his Kevlar helmet's protection stopped. "Other soldiers also at the scene related that Sgt. McCaffrey appeared dead due to the extensive visible injuries."

"This medic needs to be punished," Nadia McCaffrey said in a telephone interview.

The Army Criminal Investigation Command, which conducted the 2005 investigation, has found no other cases in which Iraqis who infiltrated the country's young security services have deliberately killed U.S. soldiers, according to the memo to Boxer.

Vote Of 'No Confidence' Would Be Unprecedented (RC)

By Emily Yehle

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

Now in their sixth year of complaining about Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Congressional Democrats have found a creative new way to make their case — borrow from Britain.

Last week, Senate Democrats tried and failed to force a vote on a "sense of the Senate" resolution calling on President Bush to "replace the Secretary of Defense." And while the text of their resolution didn't include the phrase, Democrats in both the House and Senate have taken to calling their effort a vote of "no confidence" in Rumsfeld.

Those two words that garnered so much media attention have a decidedly British twist — "no confidence" is the name of a motion in Parliament that can mean the end of a prime minister's reign.

Once those words left their homeland, however, they lost the power to force an official to resign or call a new election. In Congress, the term would have only a symbolic effect; a passed resolution with the phrase "no confidence" simply would relay the disappointment of Congress.

But perhaps Rumsfeld should feel honored: It's also a term that has never been used in legislation to oust a Cabinet official, Associate Senate Historian Don Ritchie said.

And such an action has "certainly never happened during a war with the Secretary of Defense," said James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University.

History, alas, was never made. The resolution, presented by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) on Sept. 6, didn't contain the words "no confidence" and the measure never reached a vote, as the GOP procedurally blocked it from being attached to the Defense appropriations bill.

The wording in Reid's measure is slightly different than that of a similar resolution sponsored by Rep. Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.) in 2003. That piece of legislation was more forceful; it used words such as "immediately," "resign" and "failure." It also named Rumsfeld, whereas the recent proposed resolution only referred to the "current Secretary of Defense."

Congress hasn't impeached a Cabinet official since the 1870s, but executive officials have since left their post because of their unpopularity in Congress, Ritchie said. Sometimes, officials resign to preclude a more formal rebuke — impeachment.

In 1983, Anne Gorsuch resigned from her position as the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency after Members of Congress merely discussed the possibility of impeachment.

Democrats have not laid out impeachment as a strategy to force Rumsfeld out of office, but they still seemed attached to that other phrase borrowed from their parliamentary cousins. On Friday, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) sent to his organization's e-mail list an urgent appeal: "Demand a Vote of No Confidence in Secretary Rumsfeld."

Mideast Peril Growing Concern: Terrorist Havens In 'Failed States' (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

In April, Saudi Arabia disclosed plans for an unusual and hugely expensive project: a multibillion-dollar electrified fence along its 560-mile border with Iraq.

The move angered U.S. and Iraqi officials, but Saudi officials said Iraq's growing instability left them little choice. They said they were concerned about militants infiltrating from Iraq to carry out attacks aimed at either toppling the ruling family or inciting Saudi Arabia's restive Shiite minority to seek independence.

Concern about extremism seeping out of Iraq underscores a painful irony in the five-year-old war against terrorism: The U.S. and its allies now face the distinct possibility that the same kind of "failed state" that gave terrorists a haven when the Taliban ruled Afghanistan -- leading to Sept. 11 -- could be forming again, in more than one place.

Both Iraq and Lebanon are threatening to degenerate into states with weak central governments where extremists can thrive. Iraq already appears to serve as a kind of finishing school for young radicals seeking battlefield experience. In Lebanon, Hezbollah's war with Israel this summer both destabilized the country and enhanced the reputation of Hezbollah extremists, who in the past have demonstrated a desire to extend their reach beyond Lebanon's borders.

To make matters worse, Afghanistan itself now appears to be sliding backward so much that it could again become an international terror breeding ground.

Forces from the U.S. and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization are locked in the bloodiest fighting in Afghanistan since late 2001. U.S. casualties are running at more than twice last year's rate. U.S. military commanders speak openly of an "Iraq-ification" of Afghanistan: Once-rare suicide bombings and roadside bombs have become common, and both arms and militants flow over mostly undefended borders. Much as in Iraq, the bulk of the Afghan insurgency is local, but there are signs al Qaeda-linked foreign fighters are participating.

Attack in Syria

The violence and instability roiling the Middle East spread to another country yesterday, as Islamic militants armed with machine guns, grenades and an explosives-filled van mounted a brazen but unsuccessful attack on the U.S. Embassy in Damascus, Syria. The attack in Syria, which borders both Iraq and Lebanon, left three of the attackers and one Syrian guard dead.

This unwelcome picture is forcing changes in America's posture across the region. Most significantly, the U.S. in midsummer abandoned a plan that Gen. George Casey, the top American commander in Iraq, had crafted that would have had the U.S. withdrawing some of its forces beginning this month.

Instead, the number of American forces in Iraq is increasing. In recent weeks the U.S. has shifted thousands of troops to Baghdad as part of an effort to secure the city, which means the U.S. has had to increase the overall number of troops in Iraq. Last week, the Pentagon said there were 145,000 troops, or 18,000 more than in late July and the highest level since the start of the year.

Senior military leaders say their top priority is to ensure that Iraq doesn't become a failed state. That has caused shifts in how U.S. forces operate on the ground. In places such as Tal Afar in northern Iraq and Tarmiyah, a Sunni stronghold northeast of Baghdad, U.S. military forces are reaching out to insurgent leaders in search of some sort of compromise that would get them to participate in the political process and move away from terror groups. As a result, American officers today are negotiating with Sunni leaders who only a couple of years earlier had been in jail.

U.S. officials acknowledge their main goal in Iraq now is to prevent it from turning into a place run by fundamentalists who export terrorism to the region. The administration's public comments also have shifted markedly in tone, from stressing the benefits of a democratic Iraq to citing the threats that failure in Iraq would pose to U.S. national security.

"If we abandon the Iraqi people before their government is strong enough to secure the country," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at an American Legion convention last month, "we will leave the makings of a failed state in Iraq, like that one in Afghanistan in the 1990s, which became the base for al Qaeda and the launching pad for the Sept. 11th hijackers." She added: "And we should not assume for one minute that those terrorists will not continue to come after the American homeland."

Similar concerns are leading the West to adopt a more aggressive strategy for extending the strength and reach of Lebanon's government. After several years of a U.S. policy of benign neglect toward the country, Ms. Rice threw herself into crafting and ensuring implementation of a United Nations resolution to create a peacekeeping force that the U.S. hopes will keep

Hezbollah at bay. The U.S. Treasury Department has launched an effort to shut down the flow of money to Hezbollah from Iran. And partly to try to limit Lebanese citizens' attraction to Hezbollah -- which provides extensive local social services -- the U.S. pledged millions of dollars in aid and got involved in projects to clean up oil spills and rebuild wrecked schools.

The picture in Lebanon and Afghanistan, to say nothing of Iraq, is an uncomfortable one for the Bush administration. After Sept. 11, 2001, Mr. Bush announced a far-reaching policy shift. No longer, he said, would the U.S. allow what he called failed states to be havens for terrorist groups plotting attacks outside their borders. If the countries were unwilling or unable to root out extremist groups, the president said, the U.S. would strike both the groups themselves and the governments that sheltered or tolerated them.

Now the U.S. is forced to try to keep extremists from taking deeper root in the very places it hoped would be footholds for stability -- most notably Iraq.

There, a typical battle against the resilient and elusive guerrillas began one spring night on a trash-strewn lot in Samarra. U.S. soldiers quietly surrounded the house of a suspected leader of an insurgent cell. As the advance team took down the front door and burst inside, Army Capt. Chris Brawley climbed over mounds of garbage and trained his rifle on a back alley. A shadow went flying over a narrow alleyway separating two houses, as the suspect scurried across an adjacent roof and then merged into the darkness.

The nighttime sweep did net several other suspects. Soldiers roused a man named Ayoob from his bed, stepping around the dinner leftovers of fries and sausage on the floor of his decrepit living room. A man named Mahmoud was grabbed next to a hollowed-out vehicle that looked like a car bomb in the making. Soldiers also rounded up a skinny man with a scraggly goatee who had a bag of suspicious-looking circuit-breakers stashed in his house.

Back at their base, soldiers checked the detainees' names and photos against military intelligence reports. The reports said Ayoob was reported to have received training from al Qaeda-linked groups. Mahmoud had fought the U.S. in Fallujah and now specialized in small arms and roadside bombings. The skinny man's circuit-breakers were parts for improvised explosive devices.

The emergence of this new generation of experienced militants in Iraq -- along with the critical issue of how much political violence they may carry out in neighboring countries -- is a source of deep concern for counterterrorism officials.

Until now, Iraq's violence has largely been contained within the country's borders, except for the bombings that killed 60 people in Amman, Jordan, in November. Intelligence officials worry that extremists are building a durable foothold in the vast and lawless Sunni province of Anbar, in center-west Iraq, as a future base for attacks in neighboring countries like Jordan or Saudi Arabia.

Last week, President Bush cited an al Qaeda document found in Anbar that laid out a detailed governing structure for the province. It included education, justice and social-services departments plus an "execution unit" -- responsible for "sorting out, arrest, murder, and destruction."

A senior Jordanian official says that since the Amman bombings, Jordan is bolstering its long border with Iraq with motion-detectors, cameras and other electronics. After discovering that the bombers had entered with forged Iraqi passports, Jordan instituted a two-step system for entering Iraqis: Border personnel search them, while others study their passports for evidence they were faked.

The U.S. faces a diplomatic cost as three allies in the region -- Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey -- increasingly chart their own courses because they see a possible threat to their security from extremists in Iraq. The U.S. communicated "unease" to Saudi Arabia after it announced plans for its fence, according to a U.S. official familiar with the exchange. The U.S. saw it as a slap in the face of the new Iraqi government. But the Saudis said they would press ahead.

The U.S. has renewed its push to build a force that can hold Iraq together. In the early days after the 2003 invasion, U.S. officials were hesitant to build too strong an Iraqi army. The concern was that if the army became the most powerful instrument in the country, it would dominate political affairs, and instead of a flowering democracy Iraq might begin to look like other Middle Eastern states.

Today, the U.S. military's focus is building as strong an Iraqi army as possible to impose some semblance of order. Often that means empowering Iraqi commanders who have little faith in or loyalty to the current government. At Camp Taji, a U.S.-run base in central Iraq, many senior officers in Iraq's sole armored division are Sunnis who once were officers in Saddam Hussein's military.

Many of the officers express little faith in Iraq's current Shiite-led government. Some complain openly that the current Iraqi prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, is little more than a puppet of Shiite-dominated Iran. To enlist these officers' support, U.S. commanders have used the promise of a steady paycheck, as well as appealing to their wish to stem chaos in their country.

In Lebanon, the government's inability or unwillingness to curb Hezbollah has given the group a better base from which to carry out attacks. Hezbollah has long shown a willingness, but limited ability, to attack outside the Mideast. Now, the State Department's most recent "Patterns of Global Terrorism" report says Hezbollah "has established cells in Europe, Africa, South America, North America and Asia." That contrasts with other militant groups in the area such as Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, which restrict their operations to Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Hezbollah's history worries terrorism experts even though its last known overseas strike was more than a decade ago. A few months ago, Argentine prosecutors announced that the deadliest act of terrorism in their country -- a 1994 suicide bombing at a Buenos Aires Jewish community center that killed 85 -- had been carried out by a Hezbollah member, Ibrahim Hussein Berro.

Israeli intelligence officials say that in 2002, representatives of Hezbollah and other Islamic fundamentalist groups met in a South American area called the tri-border region (the intersection of Brazil, Argentina and Paraguay) to discuss possible strikes. "Hezbollah thinks globally, not regionally," maintains Ilan Berman, an Iran expert at the right-leaning American Foreign Policy Council.

Meanwhile, amid mounting concerns that Lebanon and Iraq are becoming terrorist havens akin to Afghanistan under the Taliban, Afghanistan itself appears to sliding back toward disarray.

U.S. and NATO commanders cite three big problems there. The Hamid Karzai government is deeply unpopular in many rural areas, seen as a U.S. puppet. Opium-poppy production is skyrocketing, with Afghanistan now supplying 92% of the world's supply of the heroin ingredient, according to the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime. The biggest threat is a military one: A resurgent Taliban has triggered the heaviest fighting since the U.S. toppled the fundamentalist Islamic group's rule in 2001.

Taliban offensives have left more than 1,000 people dead in the past four months and greatly complicated reconstruction efforts. In just the past few days, a suicide bomber killed a provincial governor, and then another suicide bomber attacked at his funeral.

NATO commanders in southern Afghanistan have been surprised by both the intensity of the Taliban attacks and the tactics used. They say the Taliban have shifted from ambushes to larger-scale ground assaults, in which the militants stand and fight rather than melt back into the countryside. On Thursday, NATO's top commander, Gen. James Jones, asked the alliance's 26 member states to send more soldiers, warplanes and helicopters to reinforce the allied forces battling the Taliban.

Some veteran observers of Afghanistan are watching the violence with alarm. In 2004, Joseph Collins, who had recently left a senior Pentagon post, wrote a scholarly paper saying the U.S. was successfully blending three missions in Afghanistan: combat operations, humanitarian aid and peace-keeping work. He called it "Afghanistan: Winning the Three Block War." If he wrote it today, Mr. Collins says, "There'd be a question mark in the title, if not two or three."

Young Anger Foments Jihad (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

During Monday's commemorations of the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11, 2001, I found myself wondering what the world will look like on the 10th anniversary, or the 20th. Will the catastrophe that began five years ago become a permanent feature of life -- a "long war" that won't end for many decades? Or will it gradually wane with time?

President Bush made an emphatic case for the long war in his speech to the nation Monday night. In his account, America is locked not simply in a war but in a meta-conflict, "the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century and the calling of our generation." He described a global enemy of Muslim fanatics that imprisons women in their homes, beats impious men and attacks Americans at will. I admire Bush's toughness, but I disagree with his analysis.

As it happened, I spent the hours before Bush's speech moderating a discussion of the meaning of Sept. 11, which was hosted by the World Affairs Council here. One of the panelists was Marc Sageman, a man who comes to these issues with an unusual background -- he was a CIA case officer in Pakistan and then became a psychiatrist. I found in his comments a similarly unusual clarity.

Sageman argues in his book, "Understanding Terror Networks," that we are facing something closer to a cult network than an organized global adversary. Like many cults through history, the Muslim terrorists thrive by channeling and perverting the idealism of young people. As a forensic psychiatrist, he analyzed data on about 400 jihadists. He found that they weren't poor, desperate sociopaths but restless young men who found identity by joining the terrorist underground. Ninety percent came from intact families; 63 percent had gone to college; 75 percent were professionals or semi-professionals; 73 percent were married.

What transformed these young Sunni Muslim men was the fellowship of the jihad and the militant role models they found in people such as Osama bin Laden. The terrorist training camps in Afghanistan were a kind of elite finishing school --

Sageman likened it to getting into Harvard. The Sept. 11 hijackers weren't psychotic killers; none of the 19 had criminal records. In terms of their psychological profiles, says Sageman, they were as healthy as the general population.

The implication of Sageman's analysis is that the Sunni jihadism of al-Qaeda and its spinoff groups is a generational phenomenon. Unless new grievances spawn new recruits, it will gradually ebb over time. In other words, this is a fire that will gradually burn itself out unless we keep pumping in more oxygen. Nothing in Sageman's analysis implies that America should be any less aggressive in defending itself against terrorism. But he does argue that we should choose our offensive battles wisely and avoid glamorizing the jihadist network further through our rhetoric or actions.

Sageman's focus on the generational arc of violence got me thinking about my recent trip to Iran. The revolutionary intensity hasn't disappeared there, but it is certainly further down the curve than is the Sunni world. When I attended Friday prayers at Tehran University, I was struck by how old the people shouting "death to America" were. I would guess the average age was well over 40. The generation of the Iranian revolution is getting long in the tooth. The only sure way to ignite revolutionary zealotry in the younger generation would be for America to go to war with Iran -- something I dearly hope we can avoid.

There's another small detail about Iran that strikes me as relevant, now that I'm back home. As I explained in an earlier column, Tehran is a city of crazy drivers who nearly collide at every intersection. But the police are quite strict about requiring seat belts -- something I don't often see in the Muslim world. Even fatalistic taxi drivers buckle up. Another surprise: When I was traveling last week from Tehran to the holy city of Qom, there were actually police on the highway with radar guns, stopping pilgrims who might be tempted to speed. And I'm told the new mayor of Tehran, Mohammad Qalibaf, who succeeded the rabble-rousing Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has created a special hotline so people can call and get potholes filled and trash collected.

Now I submit to you: A nation that is wearing seat belts is probably not a mortal enemy of the United States.

This is a week when we remember, with horror, that there are dangerous killers in the Muslim world. But unless we make big mistakes, we should not find ourselves condemned to a permanent war, much less a clash of civilizations.

Justice's Next Level Of Protection (GCN)

By William Jackson, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, September 13, 2006

IT security program focuses on database vulnerabilities

A key element of the Justice Department's security program is managing vulnerabilities in its IT systems. According to director of IT security Dennis Heretick, when it comes to compliance with the Federal Information Security Management Act, this is even more important than implementing operational controls.

"Vulnerability management has been the emphasis of our program," Heretick said. "That is what FISMA is all about. What are your weaknesses, and what can you do about it?"

The department started with network and configuration scanning, using tools such as FoundScan from Foundstone Inc. (now a division of McAfee Inc.) and the open-source Nessus scanner, managed by Tenable Network Security Inc. of Columbia, Md. This year the department is expanding its scanning capabilities to assess application security, beginning with database software.

Two Justice offices, the FBI and Office of Justice Programs, already had been using the AppDetective scanner from Application Security Inc. (www.appsecinc.com) of New York. Other offices in the department were making plans to use it, Heretick said. "We expanded that with an enterprise license" this summer, he said. "We've started scheduling our training now."

AppDetective is AppSecInc's flagship product. It is a network-based scanner that can work with other tools such as FoundScan, but it is specialized for identifying and fixing database—rather than network—vulnerabilities. Heretick said he had been aware from the beginning of the need for application-level assessments, but the network and security configurations came first.

"There is so much to be done, we had to prioritize," he said.

AppDetective performs two primary functions: discovery and assessments.

"You need to know your inventory before you can secure it," Heretick said.

Application discovery is more than a formality, even for databases that can cost up to $1 million a year to maintain, said AppSecInc's vice president of marketing Ted Julian.

"In almost any organization we are in, they usually find a significant number of databases they were not aware of," Julian said.

Organizations change over time. People leave, and detailed knowledge of assets can be lost. Auditing organizations that keep track of resources tend to be centralized, while the rest of the enterprise is decentralized, allowing some valuable assets to fall into the cracks. But just because a database doesn't appear on an inventory list doesn't mean that it's an orphan. Somebody is usually maintaining the program, and it's likely to contain valuable data that requires protection.

Once an inventory has been created, App-Detective performs automated penetration tests and inside audits. Penetration tests are done from a hacker's-eye point of view, with no access privileges required for the device. "If we can see it, we can assess it," Julian said.

AppDetective also performs an inside audit of databases and their applications to assess security levels. The scanner supports most common databases, including MySQL, Oracle, Sybase, IBM DB2 and DB2 on Mainframe, Microsoft SQL Server, Oracle Application Server and Lotus Notes/Domino. The company recently announced it was seeking Common Criteria certification for the software through the National Information Assurance Partnership. Testing will be performed by Science Applications International Corp. in its Columbia, Md., lab.

AppDetective can run as a standalone product, with licenses costing $900 for each database scanned. For scaling in larger enterprises, the App- SecIncConsole provides centralized management and reporting for the scanner.

Reports rank vulnerabilities according to level of severity, with detailed information and links to vendor patches or data on workarounds. Automated routines are also available to fix common problems such as changing or shutting down default passwords and accounts. "We build the scripts, and the administrators can plug in their own values," Julian said.

The FBI and Justice programs began using the database scanner in 2004. Those infrastructures must have been more tightly managed than most, for few unknown databases were uncovered.

"I don't think there were any surprises," Heretick said. "There were vulnerabilities."

AppDetective was able to spot them well enough to convince Heretick to get an enterprise license. He'll also be implementing the $10,000 console for management as AppDetective is rolled out through the department. As training on the scanner progresses, Justice will pilot it throughout the department.

Vulnerability scanning and assessment is not a one-time event. Because of the dynamic nature of networks and the time needed to correct problems, repeated if not continuous scans are necessary to keep track of vulnerabilities and track progress in remediation.

The ability to document remediation and security postures is helpful in meeting FISMA certification and accreditation requirements, Julian said. Heretick said vulnerability assessments during system development will be valuable for creating secure systems.

Database application security is not the end of the security road for Justice, Heretick said.

"There are other things still on the radar, such as Web applications," he said. "The list of things you have to do never stops."

He said work has begun on Web application vulnerability assessment tools, but nothing has been selected for an enterprise license.

Accenture Nabs Justice Debt-collection Outsourcing Deal (WASHTECH)

By Roseanne Gerin, Staff Writer

Washington Technology, September 13, 2006

Accenture Ltd. won a contract potentially worth $54 million from the Justice Department to construct a new, integrated debt collection system.

Under the contract, Accenture of Hamilton, Bermuda, will consolidate multiple legacy systems into an integrated system. The management and technology consulting firm also will operate and maintain the system.

The Justice Department and all of its component agencies, including the U.S. Attorneys Offices, tax and litigation divisions, and the offices of the chief finance officer and CIO, will use the system.

Accenture, which has more than 133,000 employees and had annual revenue of $15.6 billion in fiscal 2005, ranks No. 24 on Washington Technology's 2006 Top 100 list of the largest federal IT contractors.

Accenture Receives Two Federal Government Contracts (WASHBIZ)

Washington Business Journal, September 13, 2006

Management consulting and technology services company Accenture said Tuesday that it won two federal contracts, one each with the Department of Justice and the Department of Homeland Security.

Accenture, which has local offices in D.C. and Reston, says the Justice contract calls for the company to deliver a new integrated debt collection system to the department and all its component organizations, including U.S. attorneys' offices.

Accenture will also provide operations and maintenance to support the new system, which will help the Justice Department improve its communications and reporting and provide better financial controls.

The contract is valued at $54 million if all options are exercised.

Under the Homeland Security contract, Bermuda-based Accenture (NYSE: ACN - News) will support the department's program for acquiring information technology services over the next five years.

Accenture officials say the value of this contract isn't yet known.

The consulting giant employs more than 133,000 people in 48 countries.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Boardroom Fallout Dunn Resigns As H-P Chairman Amid Furor Over Phone Probes (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman And Joann S. Lublin

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. named Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd to succeed its embattled chairman, but the computer maker faced a graver legal threat as California's attorney general said he has enough evidence to bring criminal charges against people at the company.

Mr. Hurd will succeed Patricia Dunn, H-P's nonexecutive chairman, in mid-January 2007. Her efforts to catch boardroom leakers last year led the Palo Alto, Calif., company to hire a contractor that scrutinized the private phone records of H-P's own directors and nine journalists.

H-P has said those records were improperly obtained by outside investigators through the use of "pretexting," or masquerading as the directors and journalists in order to request their records from phone companies. Mr. Hurd and Ms. Dunn apologized for the company snooping yesterday, though Ms. Dunn reiterated boardroom leaks had been a substantial problem for H-P.

In addition, H-P said George Keyworth, a former presidential science adviser and H-P's longest-serving director, resigned from the board. Mr. Keyworth was identified in Ms. Dunn's probe as a leaker of information to the press.

A spokesman for California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, confirming a remark made by Mr. Lockyer in an interview on the NewsHour with Jim Lehrer, said state investigators have "sufficient evidence to bring criminal charges against individuals inside Hewlett-Packard as well as outside the company." In the interview, Mr. Lockyer said: "People's identities were taken falsely, and it's a crime. People accessed computer records that have personal information. That's a crime."

Yesterday's resignations reflected a tense compromise worked out among some of H-P's disaffected board members, brokered by Mr. Hurd and H-P's outside attorney, Lawrence Sonsini. The compromise addressed the bitter infighting on H-P's board but it failed to deal with many of the questions that lie behind a host of investigations, including Mr. Lockyer's.

Among the welter of questions still unanswered: Besides Ms. Dunn, who knew within the company and the board that personal phone records were being scrutinized? Why didn't that practice raise alarm bells, even if it wasn't clear that the records were obtained via "pretexting"? Why didn't Mr. Hurd, who was given the results of the investigation two months before they were presented to the board in May, kill the probe before it blew up?

An H-P spokesman said Mr. Hurd focused only on the leaker when he first heard the results, not the methods used in the investigation. The CEO found out only in recent weeks that pretexting was involved and that journalists were targeted, and he worked with the board to turn the matter over to outside lawyers for investigation, the spokesman said.

People familiar with the matter said H-P has told them one of the outside investigators it used is Ronald R. DeLia of a small Boston firm called Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. (See related article3.) An H-P spokesman reiterated that the company isn't commenting on who did its investigative work.

The H-P board met by phone Sunday morning and the meeting ended inconclusively after about three hours. The directors couldn't figure out how to satisfy both Ms. Dunn and her two main adversaries -- Mr. Keyworth and Thomas Perkins, a venture capitalist and former H-P director.

Outside the boardroom on Sunday and Monday, negotiations continued among high-powered lawyers representing the principals. The board reconvened Monday night with Ms. Dunn apparently resistant to the notion of her stepping down.

To break the impasse, H-P agreed to issue two statements yesterday. In the first, H-P announced Ms. Dunn's resignation as chairman -- the main demand of the Keyworth-Perkins side. She will stay on as a director after the resignation takes effect in January. Ms. Dunn apologized for the methods used in the leak probe, saying they "went beyond what we understood." She defended the probe itself as an "important investigation that was required after the board sought to resolve the persistent disclosure of confidential information from within its ranks."

The second H-P statement, delayed several minutes yesterday morning as the lawyers haggled over final wording, announced Mr. Keyworth's resignation. It included explicit regrets from Mr. Hurd and Ms. Dunn for violating the privacy of Messrs. Keyworth and Perkins. The two are old friends, and Mr. Perkins resigned from H-P's board in May to protest the leak investigations.

The second statement also described Mr. Keyworth's role in leaking information, without H-P authorization, to a reporter with CNET News in January. The statement said H-P's board recognized that Mr. Keyworth was trying to "further H-P's interests." The statement added that Mr. Keyworth often had met with reporters at H-P's request. He was described as "an important member of the H-P family."

H-P announced no action yesterday against Ann Baskins, its general counsel. Her office handled the leak investigation with outside private investigators. She is married to a partner at Wilson Sonsini, the company's outside law firm.

A U.S. House of Representatives committee is seeking information from H-P about the leak investigation, including the identity of private investigators that H-P used.

A spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation said yesterday an investigation started by the agency on Monday hasn't determined whether anyone in the case violated federal laws. LaRae Quy, a special agent in the FBI's office in San Francisco, said the investigation is focused on how the confidential information was obtained, not on H-P itself. The FBI normally doesn't discuss ongoing investigations but made an exception because there is "such a national interest," Ms. Quy said. H-P says it is fully cooperating with all the investigations.

Investors didn't seem worried about the remaining questions: H-P's stock rose 1.5%, amid broad gains in the market, and reached a five-year high. Since arriving at H-P, Mr. Hurd has overseen a surge in profit as the computer maker has won market share from rival Dell Inc.

As H-P's board deliberated, it had to wade through a thicket of legal and personality issues. It hesitated to disclose much about the privacy intrusions because of the active investigations by federal and state authorities. Meanwhile, Mr. Perkins and Mr. Keyworth, who is a protégé of the late H-P co-founder David Packard, were adamant that Ms. Dunn step down for triggering the leak probe and acting on the information gained via the privacy violations, people familiar with the discussions said.

Ms. Dunn said she would step down if asked but argued that she was only doing her job as chairman in ferreting out boardroom media leaks that could move stock prices and cause legal problems for H-P.

She had a particularly bad relationship with Mr. Perkins, the former H-P director. He accused her of betraying him by presenting the leak investigation to H-P's board in May rather than dealing with it more privately among a subset of the board, say people familiar with the situation. Other knowledgeable people say Ms. Dunn was told by Mr. Hurd and H-P's lawyers that she needed to present the information to the full board. Mr. Perkins went on to challenge H-P for its use of pretexting and hire his own lawyer.

Mr. Keyworth's associates have argued that the only evidence H-P has produced of Mr. Keyworth's leaking was the CNET story in January, which these people say was complimentary to H-P and didn't include many inside details. They say Mr. Keyworth felt that his long career in business and government was tarnished when he was branded a habitual leaker. His phone records were among those improperly scrutinized by H-P's investigators.

People close to Ms. Dunn have said there were a total of 10 leaks from late 2004 through March 2006, with seven of them linked to Mr. Keyworth. H-P hasn't gone that far in its public disclosures. A company Securities and Exchange Commission filing last week described "multiple leaks of confidential" information and said they dated "to at least 2005." The filing singled out Mr. Keyworth as a leaker, but it didn't say how often the company believed he had leaked information. The only incident of leaking H-P cited yesterday was the CNET article this year.

An executive familiar with H-P says leaks were a chronic problem before Mr. Hurd was named CEO in March 2005 but ceased as a major issue after that except for the CNET case. That leak disturbed top levels of H-P's management, said company spokesman Robert Sherbin, and prompted Ms. Dunn to reopen a previous leak investigation that had been inconclusive.

Mr. Keyworth declined to comment. An associate said he is particularly satisfied that Ms. Dunn is likely to spend much of her remaining four months as chairman in legal proceedings and hearings explaining -- and apologizing for -- H-P's intrusions of privacy.

H-P said that after Mr. Hurd assumes the chairman's post, the lead independent director on the board will be Richard Hackborn, who worked at H-P for 33 years and was a senior executive before retiring in 1993.

The carefully worded statements H-P issued yesterday also included a conciliatory message from Mr. Perkins: "I believe in HP. I believe in Mark Hurd. I applaud Jay Keyworth for his courage in stepping down today and thank Patricia Dunn for her grace in letting HP move on. This too shall pass."

Chairman, Director Resign In HP Scandal (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi And Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

The chairman of Hewlett-Packard Co. and one of its directors agreed yesterday to resign over a spying scandal that the California attorney general said could lead to charges against company employees, the latest shake-up for a board plagued by internal strife.

Chairman Patricia C. Dunn, who led the company's controversial efforts to identify the source of media leaks, will step down on Jan. 18, handing over the reins to Mark V. Hurd, currently the firm's president and chief executive. Dunn, who joined HP's board in 1998, will remain a director.

George A. Keyworth II, a longtime director whose phone records identified him as a source of the leaks, also resigned, effective immediately. But in a tersely worded statement, Keyworth defended his actions, saying his statements to the news media "did not involve the disclosure of confidential or damaging information."

It's unclear how soon charges in the scandal could be filed, but on last night's "NewsHour With Jim Lehrer" on public television, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said, "We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard, as well as contractors on the outside."

The management turmoil follows the resignation of Thomas J. Perkins, who stepped down from the board in protest in May when he learned that the outside investigators looking for the leak posed as company directors and journalists in an attempt to obtain private phone records, an act known as pretexting.

The HP board has been divided for years, stemming to Carly Fiorina's bid to acquire Compaq Computer Corp. when she was chief executive, a move that the company's founding family members and their allies opposed. When Fiorina was ousted in early 2005, Dunn was named chairman and soon after authorized an investigation into the leaks.

This week's resignations are unlikely to restore harmony to the board -- mostly, because the lineup of directors doesn't include any newcomers, said Charles M. Elson, director of the Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware.

The company designated current director Richard Hackborn, a 33-year veteran and former executive at HP, as the lead independent director. Dunn, who will remain on the board, said in a statement that she hopes to expand it.

"Ideally, you go outside" to fill such positions, Elson said, "but it's very hard to find someone to fill that spot."

Few people would have the industry experience and willingness to join a board under such intense scrutiny, he said.

Paul Hodgson, a senior researcher at the Corporate Library, a corporate-governance watchdog group, said HP's moves are only stopgap measures that won't address underlying issues, including that board members don't appear to trust one another.

"It is a dysfunctional board" that will need to fully replace at least three of its slots, Hodgson said, but at the moment, trying to attract qualified board members would be a tough sell. Consolidating board leadership under the chief executive, however, is not a step forward, he said.

"It makes things a little incestuous," he said. "The problem is that the HP board and management appear to have decided something needs to be done to escape unwelcome media attention, and Dunn was chosen as a scapegoat."

Andrea Zulberti, former chief administrative officer at Barclays Global Investors and who worked alongside Dunn for 15 years, defended Dunn, noting that it was her responsibility as chairman to address the matter of media leaks.

Dunn's management style at Barclays was always respectful of both corporate governance and private space, Zulberti said. "It's surprising that she could be tainted with something like this, because she was always respectful of privacy matters."

In written statements, Hurd promised to ensure that similar tactics will not be employed in the future, but a company spokesman declined to elaborate on any specific measures the company planned to take.

Hurd also issued apologies to Perkins and Keyworth for the phone-records spying.

"On behalf of HP, I apologize to Tom Perkins for the intrusion into his privacy," Hurd said. He added that while Keyworth's contact with reporters was not "vetted through appropriate channels," it was done to further the company's interests. "HP board chairman Patricia Dunn expressed regret for the intrusion into his privacy."

Meanwhile, Congress and federal and state investigators continue to pressure HP about the methods used to obtain those phone records, with calls from lawmakers from both parties to pass legislation, now pending, that would make it a crime to obtain people's phone records by impersonating them.

That follows separate probes by the FBI, a House subcommittee on investigations, the California attorney general and the Federal Communications Commission.

The House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee yesterday sent a letter to Dunn, requesting detailed information by Monday on the outside consulting firm and subcontractors that are accused of impersonating board members and reporters to obtain their records. The committee is requesting names of individuals and copies of contracts and all reports of the internal inquiry into the leak probe.

"The most logical potential course of action is to convene a hearing and bring in witnesses who can testify to the facts," said Larry Neal, deputy staff director for the committee, which last week called British Petroleum executives to testify about their failure to prevent a pipeline leak. The investigative panel, he noted, takes all its testimony under oath.

In her statement, Dunn did not take responsibility for accessing phone records, calling that "inappropriate techniques." "These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologize that they were employed," said Dunn.

Lockyer Addresses Possibility Of Hewlett Packard Indictments (LAT)

By James S. Granelli And Charles Piller

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

The boardroom intrigue at Hewlett Packard Co. intensified Tuesday as California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said he has "enough evidence to indict" people inside the Silicon Valley icon for snooping confidential phone records.

Criminal charges could be filed as early as next week -- deepening a weeklong corporate spying scandal that has riveted the close-knit technology industry, but has been largely ignored by Wall Street.

Lockyer's comments came just hours after HP sought to wind down the drama by announcing that Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn would surrender leadership of the company's board and that another director, George A. Keyworth II, had resigned.

Chief Executive Mark V. Hurd will become chairman at the board's next regular meeting on Jan. 18, defying the growing sentiment among big corporations that chief executives should not also run the board charged with overseeing them.

Hurd is not expected to be accused of wrongdoing.

Dunn, 52, came under fire last week after the revelation that she ordered a probe of press leaks that was conducted by private investigators who allegedly gained illegal access to the call logs of HP directors and reporters covering the company. Investigators allegedly impersonated the directors and reporters to access their records, a practice called "pretexting."

Keyworth was identified by that probe as having talked to reporters about board matters and was asked to resign in May. He refused, but another director -- venture capitalist Thomas Perkins -- quit the board in protest in May and took his concerns to the attorney general's office.

"Crimes have been committed," Lockyer said in an interview on PBS' "NewsHour with Jim Lehrer." "People's identities being taken falsely is a crime. People gaining access to computer records that have personal information -- in California, that's a crime."

HP spokesman Ryan J. Donovan said: "HP declines comment on this, except to say that we reinforce what we said: that we are cooperating fully with the AG's investigation."

Criminal charges against HP employees ratchets up the pressure on the Palo Alto, Calif., company and could threaten the turnaround engineered by Hurd, who was recruited last year from NCR Corp. to revive the storied maker of computers and printers.

It was unclear Tuesday whether Dunn is being targeted by Lockyer, who also said he had sufficient evidence to indict contractors outside the company. Neither HP nor Lockyer has identified the firms that conducted the leak probe, which was carried out earlier this year.

"Until the AG plays his cards, we're going to be guessing for awhile," said Michael L. Mallow, a white-collar defense lawyer.

HP is also under investigation by Congress, the FBI and the Securities and Exchange Commission. The company could also face civil lawsuits by the reporters whose records were obtained.

So far, Wall Street has greeted the controversy with yawns, focusing instead on Hurd's focus on the bottom line and the inroads the company has made against archrival Dell Inc. HP shares rose 56 cents Tuesday to $36.92, their highest level since January 2001.

But Lockyer's comments, which came after the close of financial markets, could change the situation for HP, said Michael D. Cohen, research director at Pacific American Securities.

"It's definitely going to impact the stock, but I think it will have minimal impact on operations," Coehn said. "The worst-case scenario is if Mark Hurd is somehow implicated, but I highly doubt he was. One reason the board is promoting him to chairman is that everyone thinks he has no culpability, no exposure, to any of this."

Lockyer said the deception in the Hewlett-Packard case violated three state laws. One bars obtaining utility records illegally, another bars "unauthorized use of personal identifying information," or identity theft, and the third covers "unauthorized use of data" -- a law more commonly applied to computer hackers.

Spying Uproar Causes Shuffle In Boardroom (NYT)

By Damon Darlin And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 12 — Hewlett-Packard shook up its board Tuesday in an artfully calibrated agreement that seemed to leave all the parties in its boardroom drama satisfied, if not happy. Its chairwoman will step aside in January, the chief executive will succeed her and the longest-serving director resigned.

The moves were part of an attempt to mend a board racked by disclosures that the company hired investigators who surreptitiously — and possibly illegally — obtained the private telephone records of directors and journalists.

Even while addressing its internal divisions, Hewlett-Packard faced the prospect of increased legal pressure. The California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, said that after looking into the company's investigative effort, "we have enough information to indict people inside H.P. and outside."

For the garage-born company, whose H.P. Way set a standard for corporate behavior in Silicon Valley, the troubles have clouded its image but underscored the resilience of its resurgent business. Even after a week of intense publicity over its upheaval, the company's stock closed at its highest level since 2001.

Hewlett-Packard's investigation now appears to have included active surveillance and the review of videos to see if board members were meeting with reporters, according to people with knowledge of the company's examination of its private detectives' activities.

They also identified a Massachusetts company, Security Outsourcing Solutions, as a Hewlett-Packard contractor hired to find the source of internal leaks. Efforts to reach that company by phone and e-mail were unsuccessful.

Hewlett-Packard has said only that an outside consulting concern, which it has refused to identify, hired subcontractors who gained access to phone records by pretending to be those subjects, a practice that has become known as pretexting.

Whatever the unresolved legal questions, the Hewlett-Packard board seemed to restore order on Tuesday. In a deal arranged in board meetings conducted by telephone that stretched over two days, Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive, will assume the title of chairman in January from Patricia C. Dunn, who will continue to serve as a board member. The delay was intended in part as a face-saving move for Ms. Dunn, according to people briefed on the board discussions.

An associate of George A. Keyworth II, a board member accused of leaking information to reporters, said he agreed to resign only after Ms. Dunn, his antagonist, agreed that she would give up her leadership post. As part of the deal, Richard A. Hackborn, a former H.P. executive who has served on the board since 1992 and was briefly its chairman, will be designated in January as lead independent director, a role engineered to counterbalance Ms. Dunn's influence on the board.

The statements issued by the company on behalf of the major players in the boardroom upheaval allowed the principal participants to justify their actions — whether Ms. Dunn in authorizing the investigation or Mr. Keyworth in his discussions with reporters — as having been in the company's best interest.

An associate of Ms. Dunn said that "Pattie is not unhappy with this," while a person close to Mr. Keyworth expressed a similar sentiment: "He is actually pretty happy."

Even Thomas J. Perkins, the venture capitalist who resigned from the board in May in a dispute with Ms. Dunn over the investigation, appeared pleased. In a statement issued by the company, he was quoted as saying: "I believe in H.P. I believe in Mark Hurd. I applaud Jay Keyworth for his courage in stepping down today, and thank Patricia Dunn for her grace in letting H.P. move on. This, too, shall pass."

Representatives of Mr. Perkins, whose disclosures about the investigation last week made the board's troubles public, refused to comment further.

Hewlett-Packard's two news releases — the first issued just before the stock markets opened for trading, and another several hours later after the parties struggled with their statements — were just as artfully worded.

They avoided the word "leaker," a term that an associate said chafed Mr. Keyworth, who served as science adviser to President Ronald Reagan from 1981 to 1986 as director of the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy. Instead, even though Ms. Dunn had said last week that Mr. Keyworth was responsible for 7 out of 10 leaks, the company took a softer stance on Tuesday.

It said the board "does not believe" that Mr. Keyworth's contact with a reporter from the technology news Web site CNET in January 2006 "was vetted through appropriate channels." Mr. Keyworth, who refused a request to resign in May, has always maintained that he met with the reporter to praise senior company officials and did not divulge confidential or damaging information.

He also said in one of the news releases that he was "frequently asked by H.P. corporate communication officials to speak with reporters — both on the record and on background."

Ms. Dunn was given the opportunity to justify her need for an investigation of board leaks and apologize for its methods. Mr. Hurd was able to state the company policy clearly: "I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again. They have no place in H.P." The company said it had ended its relationship with the investigations firm.

Delaying Mr. Hurd's assumption of the chairman's post gives Ms. Dunn " a more graceful exit than an immediate departure," said Charles Elson, director of the Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. "There needed to be change, but they wanted to do it so they limited damage to reputation."

It also reflected her interest in personally resolving the controversy and not saddling Mr. Hurd with that responsibility, associates of Ms. Dunn said.

Mr. Hurd came to the company as chief executive last year after the ouster of his predecessor, Carleton S. Fiorina, whom Ms. Dunn succeeded as chairwoman. It was news leaks in the final days of Ms. Fiorina's tenure that first set the internal investigation in motion.

Since Mr. Hurd's arrival, the company's business in personal computers and printers has thrived, with its stock price rising almost 85 percent. It closed on Tuesday at $36.92.

But a number of difficult issues remain unresolved, ones that may take more than four months to settle. Some of the inquiries, except for a formal Congressional request for documents related to H.P.'s outside investigators, are still informal. The Securities and Exchange Commission has alerted the company that it is seeking further information on the limited release of information about Mr. Perkins's resignation in May.

Other investigations could pose bigger problems. Mr. Lockyer, the California attorney general, is conducting a criminal inquiry into the methods used by H.P.'s outside investigators, exploring whether they broke privacy laws. Mr. Lockyer said Tuesday night that he could not identify who might be charged, as his agency was still investigating.

The United States attorney for Northern California has said that he is conducting a parallel inquiry.

California's efforts are focusing in part on Security Outsourcing Solutions, according to someone briefed on the investigation. A spokeswoman for the Massachusetts attorney general confirmed that the two states were working together.

Hewlett-Packard refused to comment about any role the Massachusetts company might have played.

The company's Web site says: "When it is determined that specialized services are required, we select a firm from our network of affiliated companies to provide the services. Our in-depth knowledge of the security industry ensures that our clients receive the most favorable rates from our affiliates."

Ronald R. DeLia, whose Web site identifies him as the managing director of Security Outsourcing Solutions, did not respond to calls and e-mail messages seeking comment.

The company shares a business phone number and a Boston address with Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata, a law firm with offices in several cities. No one answered at the number Tuesday night. The firm's Web site says one of its specialties is internal corporate investigations.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said the Hewlett-Packard case underscored the need for more stringent laws and regulations to protect phone records.

"There are laws that might be applied, but prosecutors will tell you they have to cobble things together," Mr. Schumer said. In January, he was a sponsor of legislation that would make it a crime, punishable by up to 10 years in prison, to obtain telephone records fraudulently or to sell or purchase them.

HP Chief Turns A Bad Situation To His Advantage (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler And Jim Hopkins

USA Today, September 13, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Embattled computer giant Hewlett-Packard survived another boardroom brawl Tuesday — and CEO Mark Hurd appears to have won the fight.

Hurd, who has been CEO since April 2005, will become chairman on Jan. 18, HP said Tuesday. Current board Chairman Patricia Dunn will resign that post then, although she will remain a director.

George Keyworth II, a 20-year veteran of HP's board, also resigned Tuesday. Board member Richard Hackborn has been promoted to lead independent director.

The shuffle stems from a controversy over how HP tried to stop boardroom leaks to the press. The computer giant used sneaky — and possibly illegal — methods to obtain the home phone records of nine reporters and at least two board members.

The fallout threatened to rip apart the board. It plunged HP, a pillar of Silicon Valley, into scandal in less than a week. And it threatened to derail Hurd's attempt to turn around the computer giant.

But Hurd managed to simultaneously handle the crisis, get a promotion and lay the groundwork for bringing in new board members friendly to his style of governance. He "made the best of a bad situation," says Charles Elson, governance professor at the University of Delaware.

That doesn't mean HP has emerged unscathed. A host of government agencies, including the FBI, Department of Justice, House Energy and Commerce Committee, Securities and Exchange Commission and California attorney general, are looking into whether HP broke the law when it obtained the phone records. The legal cases could drag on for years, providing much bad press for a company troubled since the dot-com bust of 2000.

California's attorney general warned on Tuesday that company insiders could face criminal charges.

"We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard as well as contractors on the outside," Attorney General Bill Lockyer said on PBS' NewsHour with Jim Lehrer.

Hurd wants to move beyond the crisis quickly. "I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again. They have no place at HP," he said in a statement.

The news sent HP shares up 1.5% to $36.92 Tuesday.

The latest crisis helped Hurd prove his worth as HP's turnaround man — and his skill at the tricky game of corporate politics. That's even though "he's not the kind of person who enjoys this side of boardroom dynamics," says Jeff Christian, an executive recruiter who has known Hurd for more than 12 years.

"It was a new experience for Mark," says Christian. "Under the circumstances, I think he did a pretty good job."

The scandal began in 2005, when Hurd ran Ohio-based tech company NCR. Hewlett-Packard's then-CEO, Carly Fiorina, was clashing with her board. Information about it leaked to the press, so she hired a law firm to find the source.

The search was unsuccessful, and Fiorina was ousted in February 2005. Yet the leaks continued.

Responsibility for the search passed to Dunn, appointed non-executive chairman after Fiorina left. The former CEO of Barclays Global Investors, who gave up that job to fight a bout with breast cancer, has a reputation for integrity and honesty, says Christian. (Dunn was diagnosed with stage four ovarian cancer in 2004.)

Dunn hired a yet-unidentified detective firm and told it to conduct a legal investigation, HP says. But a subcontractor used a controversial technique called "pretexting" to obtain phone records. Pretexting is when someone contacts a company pretending to be someone else, in order to get that person's confidential records.

It worked, and Keyworth was exposed as the source of a leak to tech website CNet. He was outed during a May 18 board meeting. Dunn asked him to resign. He refused.

Another member, venture capitalist Tom Perkins, objected to how Keyworth was treated and resigned in protest. Later, he asked HP for more information about the investigation.

That inquiry eventually discovered the pretexting. Under pressure, HP revealed the news on Sept. 6, and the board began to meet to discuss the crisis. Hurd's promotion was announced early Tuesday, and about an hour later Keyworth announced his resignation.

"The invasion of my privacy and that of others' was ill-conceived and inconsistent with HP's values," he said in a statement. But he agreed to step down to protect HP's interests, he said.

Hurd was probably the driving force behind Keyworth's resignation and the compromise deal that allowed Dunn to stay on the board while still assuaging critics, says tech analyst Roger Kay at Endpoint Technologies Associates.

But he still must grapple with political fallout, says independent tech analyst Rob Enderle.

Pretexting falls into a legal gray area. The HP flap has made it a popular cause among lawmakers. The House has passed a bill that would expressly make it a federal crime to fraudulently obtain phone records. Congressmen James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., Lamar Smith, R-Texas, and Howard Berman, D-Calif., sent a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., last week urging the Senate to pass it, too.

Such battles are not Hurd's strong point, says tech analyst Crawford Del Prete at researcher IDC. The CEO is best known for his operational skills, which are helping HP recover from the dot-com bust and its controversial $25 billion acquisition of Compaq Computer in 2002, Del Prete says. Actions Hurd has taken include a restructuring and 15,000 job cuts. HP's stock has jumped 68% since he was hired in April 2005.

"Mark has proved that he's got the company under control," Del Prete says. But, he adds, Hurd has his hands full running an incredibly diverse company that competes with giants such as IBM, Sony and Canon, leaving little time for boardroom squabbles.

HP's once-vaunted reputation, already damaged in a nasty shareholder battle over the Compaq deal, might be more at risk. "I am astonished at the depth of poor judgment exhibited in this case," says Roger McNamee, managing director at Elevation Partners, a private Silicon Valley investment firm.

The fast-changing role of corporate boards may help explain what went wrong at HP. After energy giant Enron collapsed, tough new regulatory burdens were imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. It is designed to make boards accountable for a company's performance.

At the same time, shareholders now expect boards to fire CEOs who aren't performing. Directors once got all their information from management, but now they regularly interview employees who are not at headquarters. Most now collect information from outside sources, says RHR International.

That atmosphere helps explain why there were leaks and such a severe crackdown. HP directors make more than $200,000 a year in cash and stock.

Yet they couldn't keep secrets, the release of which could violate securities laws, says Corporate Library editor Nell Minow.

But the aggressive hunt for the source of the leak was even worse, says the University of Delaware's Elson. Snooping "chills effective director oversight. … It's very dangerous," he says.

Now HP must contend with a new risk: its chairman and CEO jobs are held by the same person. Fiorina held both titles, and that caused problems when she disagreed with the board, says Patrick McGurn, special counsel for Institutional Shareholder Services, an advisory firm.

It would be best if HP brought in several outside directors, including an outside chairman, he says. But such directors would probably be hard to find in the midst of its recent crisis, he says.

Once this has passed, "The board needs to bring in some new members," he says. "They need to fix what's wrong, and then they need to go forward," McGurn says.

HP Chair To Step Down In Aftermath Of Company Leak Probe (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Patricia Dunn will step down in January and be succeeded by CEO Mark Hurd amid a widening scandal involving the computer and printer company's possibly illegal probe into media leaks.

Director George Keyworth II, who acknowledged sharing company information with reporters, resigned from HP's board later Tuesday morning. The board had asked Keyworth to resign in May, but he refused.

Hurd will retain his existing positions as chief executive and president and Dunn will remain as a director after she relinquishes the chair on Jan. 18.

"I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again. They have no place in HP," Hurd said in a statement Tuesday.

Dunn apologized for the techniques used in the company's probe, which included "pretexting" in which private investigators impersonated board members and journalists to acquire their phone records.

"Unfortunately, the investigation, which was conducted with third parties, included certain inappropriate techniques. These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologize that they were employed," Dunn said in a statement.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard Co. rose 62 cents, or more than 1.7 percent, to $36.98 in Tuesday trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

The pressure on Dunn to step down began rising sharply on Monday when Congress and federal investigators entered the fray surrounding HP's investigation. The FBI, the U.S. Attorney for Northern California and the House Energy and Commerce Committee all joined the probe of the scandal swirling around HP's Board of Directors.

Dunn was angry about the media leaks of confidential board discussions and commissioned an unnamed outside firm to identify their source. They used Social Security numbers and other personal information to get phone companies to turn over detailed logs of home phone calls of reporters and company directors.

Although frequently used by private investigators, pretexting tests the bounds of state and federal law.

At a board meeting in May, Dunn identified Keyworth as the source of a news article that appeared on CNET Networks Inc.'s News.com in January. The board asked Keyworth, 66, to resign, but he refused. HP then barred him from seeking re-election.

"The invasion of my privacy and that of others was ill-conceived and inconsistent with HP's values," Keyworth said.

His ouster riled another board member, longtime Silicon Valley venture capitalist Tom Perkins, 74, who resigned and stormed out of the May 18 meeting.

Perkins' attorney later discovered that private investigators working for HP had obtained the last four digits of his client's social security number. They used that information to open an online account with AT&T , then called the telephone company and impersonated Perkins, asking for a record of phone calls to and from his house.

HP's investigators also obtained the phone records of several journalists, including those who work at The Wall Street Journal, BusinessWeek, The New York Times and News.com.

Keyworth, who has acknowledged talking to the media, was the former science adviser to President Reagan and director of the Physics Division at Los Alamos National Laboratory. He was not mentioned in the company's statement Tuesday.

On Tuesday, Dunn defended the need for the investigation.

"These leaks had the potential to affect not only the stock price of HP but also that of other publicly traded companies," she said.

HP's board met Monday night to discuss whether Dunn should remain chairwoman of the Silicon Valley giant.

Richard Hackborn, who has served on the board since 1992, will become lead independent director in January.

"I think the fact that they made the statement that she's going to leave solves most of the problem," said Roger Kay, who follows HP as president of Endpoint Technologies Associates, a market research firm. "I don't think it's that material precisely when she leaves."

Dunn's entanglement in the pretexting scandal marks a rare stumble for one of the most powerful women in corporate America.

The child of a vaudeville actor and a showgirl in Las Vegas, Dunn, 52, worked as a freelance journalist after college before taking a temporary secretarial job at Wells Fargo & Co.

She was CEO of Barclays Global Investors before she resigned from that post in 2002 to battle breast cancer and melanoma. Dunn joined HP's board in 1998 and became chairwoman in 2005, taking an active role in running the 11th largest company on the Fortune 500.

She oversaw the ouster of former HP CEO Carleton Fiorina in February 2005, and two months later introduced Hurd as Fiorina's successor.

Hurd wasn't well known on Wall Street or in the financial media before taking the reins of HP. But he enjoyed a solid reputation among business experts as a no-nonsense cost cutter familiar with nearly every facet of management. HP shares surged 10 percent the day his appointment was announced.

He was previously chief executive at Dayton, Ohio-based NCR Corp., a computer services company best known for its ATM machines.

At HP he orchestrated a cost-cutting campaign that, when it winds down later this quarter, will have resulted in as many as 15,000 layoffs. But morale had been noticeably higher under Hurd than Fiorina - until the pretexting scandal.

Dunn Steps Down As HP Chairman (FT)

By Kevin Allison, Richard Waters And Chris Nuttall

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Facing the intense pressure of federal, state and congressional investigations, Hewlett-Packard on Tuesday announced the January departure of chairman Patricia Dunn as it moved to restore the reputation of the venerable Silicon Valley company.

However, the company's attempt to put a quick end to the controvery over its boardroom leak investigation was dealt an immediate blow by Bill Lockyer, California's attorney general. Speaking on television late on Tuesday, Mr Lockyer said his office already has "sufficient evidence to indict people both within HP as well as contractors on the outside."

Ms Dunn has maintained that she did not know in advance of the tactics used in the investigation that she had authorised into HP's own directors, but had delegated the job to the company's legal department. HP said its board had accepted that assurance in allowing her to remain as chairman until January, and to continue as a director after that.

Mark Hurd, chief executive officer, is to replace Ms Dunn as chairman in January, while Richard Hackborn, a company veteran, was named lead independent director, a new position designed to help restore confidence in the conduct of the board.

HP has been damaged by subterfuge ordered by Ms Dunn as she sought to uncover a boardroom mole. Private investigators impersonated company directors and journalists to gain access to phone records and identify the source of leaks showing dramatic rifts at the top of one of the world's most powerful companies.

News of Mr Hurd's appointment followed two days of emergency meetings by the HP board. It will allay fears that the spying scandal could put Mr Hurd's role as chief executive in jeopardy.

He has led a resurgence at the world's second-biggest computer maker since he took over following the removal of Carly Fiorina as chief executive last year. The leaks included details of discussions to oust her.

California's attorney general last week declared the practice of "pretexting" – assuming a person's identity to access personal information – as illegal. Federal prosecutors, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the US Congress have since launched their own investigations.

In an HP statement on Tuesday, Ms Dunn continued to defend the investigation into the leaks, which she said "had the potential to affect not only the stock price of HP but also that of other publicly traded companies."

"Unfortunately, the investigation, which was conducted with third parties, included certain inappropriate techniques. These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologise that they were employed," Ms Dunn said.

Mr Hurd said the techniques used by the board's investigators "had no place at HP".

"I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again. HP holds itself to the highest standards of business conduct and we are accountable to these standards for everything that we do."

Nel Minow, a corporate governance expert at The Corporate Library, commented: "What I was hoping they would avoid is a Queen of Hearts chop-off-her-head response, which would have done no good to anyone."

"The main thing they need to do right now is bring in someone to investigate and tell them what happened, and to bring in strong new directors."

HP refused to comment on whether it had launched a new investigation into the matter. It also announced that George Keyworth, the director identified as the source of the leaks, had resigned.

An HP spokesman defended a decision that Ms Dunn would stay on as a director.

"She has brought a lot of valuable insights into the company. She is still beneficial to HP,"he said.

He added that she was remaining chairman till January "so that she can tie up some loose ends with the investigation", but she had voluntarily decided to step down in order not to be "a distraction".

Carly Fiorina had combined the roles of chairman and chief executive. They were split when Mr Hurd took control.

HP shares were bolstered by news of Ms Dunn's resignation, rising 1.7 per cent to $36.97 in midday trading in New York.

People Inside HP Could Be Indicted (MERCN)

By Pete Carey

The San Jose Mercury News, September 13, 2006

California's attorney general said today his office has enough evidence in the Hewlett-Packard boardroom leak scandal to indict people inside the company on criminal charges.

State Attorney General Bill Lockyer made the disclosure on public television's Lehrer News Hour. He left no doubt that the investigation has uncovered knowledge by HP of the illegal gathering of the phone records of board members and nine journalists.

Last week, Lockyer speculated that the company's defense would be that it didn't know what its outside contractor was doing.

But today, he said ``We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett Packard as well as contractors on the outside." Lockyer gave no names, job descriptions nor characterizations of the rank of the people inside HP.

An HP spokesman said, ``We are cooperating fully with the attorney general's investigation."

The company says it hired an outside investigative firm, which in turn hired another contractor. That contractor apparently used a practice known as ``pretexting" -- essentially lying and impersonating others -- in order to obtain the phone records of HP's board members and nine reporters.

Board Chairwoman Patricia Dunn has said she didn't know the contractors used pretexting to obtain the phone records.

Also investigating are the U.S. Justice Department, the House Energy & Commerce Committee's investigations subcommittee, the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Securities & Exchange Commission.

Lockyer May Indict In Hewlett-Packard Investigation (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, September 13, 2006

Sept. 12 (Bloomberg) -- California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said he has enough evidence to indict Hewlett-Packard Co. officials and contractors over the methods they used to gain access to telephone records of directors and journalists.

``We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people, both within Hewlett-Packard as well as contractors on the outside," Lockyer said today in an interview on ``NewsHour with Jim Lehrer" on public television station PBS.

Investigators hired by Hewlett-Packard broke the law by using false identities to obtain phone records of directors and reporters, Lockyer said. His comments underscored the seriousness of the scandal hours after Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, who hired the investigators, said she would resign to take responsibility.

U.S. lawmakers, the Justice Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are all looking into whether the Palo Alto, California-based company's tactics broke the law.

Dunn, named chairwoman in February of last year after the ouster of Carly Fiorina, hired an outside consultant to find out who had revealed information about the company's strategy and board deliberations leading up to Fiorina's departure.

`Pretexting'

The consultants hired another firm, which used fake identities to obtain phone records of directors and nine reporters, a method known as pretexting. Hewlett-Packard said it initially thought the practice was legal, then was advised that it may not be. Dunn, 53, will continue as a director after stepping down as chairwoman in January.

``Unfortunately the investigation, which was conducted with third parties, included certain inappropriate techniques," said Dunn, who is vice chairwoman of Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco, in a statement. ``These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologize that they were employed."

Lockyer said in the PBS interview that ``Crimes have been committed" and ``people's identities were taken falsely."

Lockyer didn't name the Hewlett-Packard officials or contractors who may be indicted or say when charges would be brought. Tom Dresslar, his spokesman, said Lockyer had ``nothing to add."

The comments indicate Lockyer ``believes he has that kind of evidence -- that someone knew about, or someone intended to commit, or have someone else commit a criminal act," David Shapiro, a former U.S. attorney in San Francisco, said today in an interview.

No Comment

Hewlett-Packard is cooperating with Lockyer's investigation, spokesman Ryan Donovan said. He said the company won't comment on the PBS interview.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard fell 27 cents in extended trading. They earlier rose 56 cents, or 1.5 percent, to $36.92 at 4:20 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd will take over as chairman of the world's second-largest personal computer maker in January. George Keyworth, who admitted to giving information to the media, resigned as a director of the company.

``Unfortunately the investigation, which was conducted with third parties, included certain inappropriate techniques," Dunn, who is also vice chairwoman of Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco, said today in a statement. ``These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologize that they were employed."

Boston Private-Investigation Firm Is Tied To H-P Boardroom Probe (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman, Steve Stecklow And John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

For the past week, Hewlett-Packard Co. has refused to identify private investigators the company retained to investigate leaks by its board of directors. People familiar with the matter say H-P has told them one of the investigators connected to the case is Ronald R. DeLia, from a small Boston firm called Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. that says it specializes in corporate-security investigations.

H-P, a Palo Alto, Calif., computer and printer maker, has said that it hired a private-investigation firm to carry out its inquiry; that firm then hired a second entity that used so-called "pretexting" to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists. Pretexting involves impersonating an individual for the purpose of obtaining phone or other records. People familiar with H-P's leak probe say the company's private investigators also dispatched monitors to attend at least one director's speeches and to see if this board member met with journalists afterward.

An H-P spokesman declined to comment on the possible use of surveillance by the company's leak investigators.

Mr. DeLia couldn't be reached for comment.

According to its Web site, Security Outsourcing Solutions "was formed to provide small- to medium-size corporations and institutions with the same level of security currently available only to Fortune 1000 companies." At one time, it published a newsletter called "Corporate Homicide: Life in a Global Economy." In a 1999 edition of the newsletter, Mr. DeLia warned that "identity theft is becoming a major law-enforcement problem about which consumers can ill afford to become indifferent." The newsletter said the Internet had made it easier for identity thieves to obtain addresses and Social Security numbers for a fee.

Massachusetts state records show that Security Outsourcing Solutions was formed in 1998 and lists its registered agent as Mr. DeLia. His wife, Caroline F. DeLia, is listed as president, treasurer, secretary and director. The records list the company's principal address as a residential home in Needham, Mass., a suburb west of Boston.

Security Outsourcing Solutions' Web site was registered in 1998. It originally listed Mr. DeLia as the company's managing director. In 1999, it called the company, which was formed only a year before, "one of the foremost security-management outsourcing firms dedicated to helping companies address and properly respond to internal and external security concerns in an efficient, cost effective, and service-oriented manner."

Answering the front door of the two-story house in Needham yesterday, Mrs. DeLia declined to comment and referred all questions to her husband, who she said wasn't home. A woman who identified herself as a relative said Mr. DeLia performed work for H-P but declined to elaborate. She referred all questions to Mr. DeLia.

Records show Mr. DeLia managed a Boston restaurant called the Grill and Cue before starting Security Outsourcing Solutions. The Grill and Cue, a 6,000-square-foot upscale billiards club and restaurant, opened in 1995 and went out of business in 1997, records show.

Security Outsourcing Solutions' Web site says the firm could help corporations whose internal-security departments "do not have the in-house expertise and or resources to address all of their organization's security concerns. We offer these companies the ability to access a world wide cadre of qualified security and investigative professionals on an as needed basis."

The firm's specific services range from helping with "physical security" to providing "comprehensive investigative services," the Web site says.

In an October 2005 story on the Web site of Government Security magazine, Mr. DeLia said, "Our business has changed dramatically. It's a global economy, and we have affiliations all over the world. We are not 'gumshoes' any more. We use a lot of computer-based tools."

U.S. Revisits Rewarding Firms That Waive Rights In Probes (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid criticism from business and legal groups and even some of its own former officials, the Justice Department is revisiting its policy of rewarding companies that agree to waive certain legal protections in criminal investigations.

But a senior official said any changes that would chill cooperation "would not be a good thing."

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that corporations are eager to cooperate with federal prosecutors and expect to be rewarded for doing so, with or without an explicit federal policy to that effect. He later said the Justice Department is open to changes that "improve the process we have," but he raised concerns about inhibiting executives from sharing information with prosecutors.

Business and legal groups have been critical of the Justice Department policy, outlined in a 2003 memo on business prosecutions by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Thomas Donohue told the panel that the Thompson memo "emboldened federal prosecutors" to demand that companies and employees forgo rights, including the right to confidential discussions with lawyers, if the company wants credit for cooperating in an investigation.

American Bar Association President Karen Mathis said the policy has eroded basic constitutional protections and is discouraging firms and individuals from talking to lawyers. The ABA complained in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this spring, and a bipartisan group of 10 former Justice Department officials did the same last week, calling for a revised policy telling prosecutors that waiving attorney-client privilege and work-product protections "should not be a factor" in determining whether a company has cooperated with the government in an investigation.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) agreed that federal prosecutors should be neutral on corporate cooperation, saying he doesn't think anyone should get credit for waiving a constitutional right or be penalized for asserting it. He urged the Justice Department to revise its stance, saying he would like to see "if we can solve the problem without legislation."

Mr. McNulty called the Thompson memo a nonbinding statement meant to help prosecutors decide whether to charge a company, with cooperation one of nine factors to be considered. He said federal prosecutors chiefly are interested in obtaining reports of internal corporate investigations into wrongdoing, not confidences shared with lawyers. "I really don't see this as the kind of coercive practice that is being described," he said.

Still, because fighting criminal charges can lead to death sentences for companies, the government's policy to reward cooperation gives enormous leverage to federal authorities, testified Andrew Weissmann, former director of the Justice Department's Enron Corp. task force and now a partner with the law firm Jenner & Block LLP in New York. He said the policy isn't interpreted uniformly, with some prosecutors seeking waivers of privileges only as a last resort, while others demand blanket waivers at the start of corporate probes as a shortcut to information they could get through other means.

Justice Department Defends Policy On Corporate Prosecutions As Fair (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press

AP, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON – A top Justice Department official on Tuesday defended a policy that critics say unfairly pressures companies to disclose their confidential communications with attorneys. He said it helps deter corporate fraud.

At a Senate hearing, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said the department would take another look at the 2003 policy in light of public criticism. But he added that there were no plans to change the guidelines, which reward companies if they cooperate with prosecutors in investigations such as by handing over confidential documents.

"We see nothing wrong in asking a corporation to disclose to us the results of their internal investigation to assist us in investigating a corporation's claim of innocence," McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "Indeed, we believe it is good practice because it conserves public and private resources."

An array of business and legal groups such as the American Bar Association as well as former top Justice officials have come out against the policy, saying it coerces companies to waive the attorney-client privilege and deters employees from getting critical legal advice.

"Lawmakers must intervene and abolish the provisions that rob executives and employees of their right to candid and confidential consultation with their attorneys," said Tom Donohue, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Sens. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., both expressed concern that the Justice Department policy was unduly coercive and abrogated a fundamental right. They said prosecutors should be neutral in taking into account waivers of attorney-client privilege when considering charges to ensure fair representation.

McNulty responded that the policy was not coercive because prosecutors are instructed to consider waiver of the privilege as just one factor in determining charges. More critical factors include the degree to which a company CEO is involved in potential wrongdoing, he said.

"I support our prosecutors in their charging decisions," McNulty said, while allowing that a second look at the policy may be in order. "The guidance is consistent with long-standing charging practices and is fair to corporations under investigation."

Justice Department Is Reviewing Corporate Prosecution Guidelines (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — A top Justice Department official on Tuesday defended the tactics used by federal prosecutors after Enron to combat corporate wrongdoing, but he also indicated that the agency might consider changes to the guidelines.

The comments by the deputy attorney general, Paul J. McNulty, before the Senate Judiciary Committee, were the first public response by a senior Justice Department official to mounting criticism from companies and lawyers that the tactics are being used as a bludgeon to force companies to cooperate with investigations.

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the panel's ranking Democrat, said the prosecution practices were coercive and called on Mr. McNulty to have them modified.

But Mr. McNulty said, "I really don't see this as the kind of coercive practice being discussed." He noted that the tactics had helped federal prosecutors to rein in fraud by more than 1,000 companies, like WorldCom and Adelphia Communications, since 2002.

The Justice Department's guidelines for prosecutors, as outlined in a 2003 document known as the Thompson memorandum, describe nine factors that prosecutors must consider when weighing whether to indict a company for corporate misconduct. Among them are whether a company has demonstrated cooperation with prosecutors by disclosing legal communications to investigators, and whether it has stopped paying legal fees to employees caught up in investigations.

Companies that do not demonstrate cooperation face a greater risk of indictment — which can be a death sentence, as it was for the accounting firm Arthur Andersen in 2002.

Any changes to the guidelines could alter the way prosecutors pursue companies and white-collar defendants.

The guidelines in the Thompson memorandum, Mr. McNulty said, "are nothing more than a structured recitation of what common sense would lead a prosecutor to consider."

Nonetheless, he said that amid the recent criticism, "we are giving thoughtful consideration to everything," and that "we'll have new guidance if, and that's the key here, if something should be identified that would improve the process." He said that the Justice Department would consider making the guidelines nonbinding for prosecutors.

Later, Mr. McNulty told reporters that "it may be necessary to look at what the prosecutors understand of the policy" and that "we have to decide what is wrong with our policy, if anything is wrong with our policy and how to fix it." He declined to provide details or a schedule for any decision on a new policy.

But he added that any "changes in a policy that would discourage cooperation would not be good, in our perspective."

The Thompson memorandum was written in 2003 by Larry D. Thompson, then the deputy attorney general and now general counsel at PepsiCo. It has come under sharp criticism in recent months.

Former top Justice officials have criticized the guidelines, as has the federal judge overseeing the trial of former employees of the accounting firm KPMG over tax shelters. The investigation of KPMG — which first capped legal fees to employees under investigation and then cut them off — has been cited as a prime example of the coercive tactics employed by prosecutors.

Critics say that practices encouraged by the Thompson memorandum infringes on defendants' right to legal counsel and the presumption of innocence. Critics also contend that the guidelines undermine long-established legal doctrines — the lawyer-client privilege and work-product privilege — protecting the confidentiality of communications between lawyers and their clients and of documents created as part of the development of a legal position.

The committee also heard from Edwin Meese III, who was attorney general during the Reagan administration. He said that the Justice Department should eliminate the two guidelines on the disclosure of legal communications and the termination of legal fees as factors for avoiding indictment. Otherwise, Mr. Meese said, Congress should pass legislation to protect those rights.

With Congressional elections just weeks away, the hearing was not likely to lead to any immediate action by lawmakers, but it laid down a marker in a growing debate over white-collar prosecution practices.

Other witnesses at the hearing, all opposing the guidelines, included Andrew Weissmann, a lawyer who is a former director of the Justice Department's Enron task force, and top American Bar Association officials.

In defending the Justice Department guidelines, Mr. McNulty began by citing what he called "five realities." They were, he said, the duty of prosecutors to hold companies and individuals accountable for wrongdoing, the desire by firms for a quick resolution of investigations, the willingness of firms to cooperate with investigators to speed resolutions, the disclosure of legal secrets as "one of the best ways" to speed an investigation, and a desire by corporations "to receive credit" from prosecutors for turning over any internal reports.

"The irony of the attacks on the Thompson memo is that the federal criminal justice system would be a much harsher, less predictable and less transparent environment for corporations and their counsel in the absence of this guidance,'' he said.

Mr. McNulty called the guidelines indicative of a "just the facts, ma'am" approach. "Some attorneys assert privilege like that famous scene of Lucille Ball gobbling chocolates off of a conveyor belt," he said.

Mr. Specter, the committee chairman, asked if Mr. McNulty would consider President Bush's frequent assertions of executive privilege during the confirmation hearings of Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. to be an example of noncooperation, in the same vein as companies that do not disclose legal communications.

Mr. McNulty said that he did not.

Paulson Backs Sarbox Study (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

US treasury secretary Hank Paulson on Tuesday threw his weight behind a new group of US businessmen and academics formed to study why US capital markets are losing ground to foreign rivals amid concern over the effects of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation.

The 17-member Committee on Capital Markets Regulation is the second such high-profile group to be formed since the US Chamber of Commerce launched a similar initiative last year.

They are a sign of increasing clamour in the US business community for a re-examination of SOX, whose Section 404 internal audit control provisions have been widely criticised as being too onerous.

The new committee will be directed by Hal Scott, Nomura Professor at Harvard Law School, and co-chaired by Glenn Hubbard, dean of Columbia Business School, and John Thornton, chairman of the board of the Brookings Institution.

It will "assess the degree to which US public markets are losing ground to foreign and private markets, the causes of this decline, and its impact on the financial industry and the economy".

Its brief reflects concerns that the ability of foreign jurisdictions to attract capital by offering "lighter touch" regulatory environments may permanently erode America's lead in "capital formation" – a phrase that encompasses stock market listings to derivatives trading.

The desire by executives to escape SOX rules is also cited as one of the factors encouraging many companies recently to accept bids from private equity firms.

Prof Scott said: "We are witnessing a crucial moment in economic history--the movement of US capital markets abroad, and the growth of private markets at the expense of public ones. "

SOX has been blamed for driving new company listings abroad to London and Hong Kong as companies seek to avoid US-style regulation.

In his inaugural speech as treasury secretary last month, Mr Paulson dropped a clear hint that he was ready to support reform of SOX rules, which he warned were threatening American competitiveness.

On Tuesday, he said: "I am pleased to learn [the committee], an independent group of highly respected business, financial, investor and corporate governance, legal, accounting and academic leaders, will examine the competitiveness of the US public capital markets.

"This issue is important to the future of the American economy and a priority for me. I look forward to reviewing their findings and ideas."

The idea of revising SOX has not yet gained any traction in congress, partly because politicians have been reluctant to suggest changes to a law that is widely perceived as having helped clamp down on corporate wrongdoing in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom financial scandals.

A Democratic takeover of even one chamber of Congress would make action on this front even more difficult, with several liberal Democrats poised to become chairmen of key committees.

Mike Zuppone, chair of the securities practice at law firm Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker, said: "Any fundamental regulatory reform can't lose sight of the key goal of securities legislation here in the US which is investor protection."

But he added there was no reason why a review of the competitiveness of the US capital markets could not result in some "fine-tuning" of SOX "in a manner that accommodates that investor protection goal".

The committee will in November produce "interim recommendations" on:

• Liability issues affecting public companies and gatekeepers (such as auditors and directors) with a focus on securities class action litigation, criminal enforcement and federal versus state authority;

• The Sarbanes-Oxley Act, with major emphasis on Section 404, which requires auditors and senior managers to certify the adequacy of internal controls;

• Overall regulatory processes to allow the United States to do a better job of evaluating changes of law and regulation, prospectively, initially and on an ongoing basis; and

• Shareholder rights.

Its members include Charles Holliday, CEO of DuPont; Cathy Kinney, chief operating officer of the New York Stock Exchange; Ken Griffin, CEO of Citadel Investment Group, a Chicago-based hedge fund and Ira M. Millstein, partner at Weil, Gotshal & Manges.

Next week, the US Chamber of Commerce's Commission on the Regulation of Capital Markets in the 21st Century will hold the first of a series of "town hall" style meetings in Chicago.

Panel Of Executives And Academics To Consider Regulation And Competitiveness (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

A committee filled with business leaders and academics was created yesterday to consider changes in the Sarbanes-Oxley Act and other laws and regulations governing securities markets and companies, with the intention of improving competitiveness for American markets.

The group, called the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, has no official status but the announcement of its creation included praise from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., who said that the issue of American competitiveness "is important to the future of the American economy and a priority for me."

Hal S. Scott, a Harvard law professor who will be the committee's director, said in an interview that he had begun working a year ago to form the group because he was concerned that American markets were losing competitiveness. He said its members had been chosen by himself and the two co-chairmen, R. Glenn Hubbard and John L. Thornton.

Mr. Hubbard is dean of the Columbia Business School and a former chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers. Mr. Thornton is board chairman of the Brookings Institution and a former president of Goldman, Sachs, where he reported to Mr. Paulson.

Among the issues to be considered are whether laws need to be changed to limit both civil and criminal liability for companies, auditors and directors. One matter Mr. Scott cited is the proper role of state governments in financial market issues, including the cases brought by Eliot Spitzer, the New York State attorney general.

The committee will consider whether Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which requires audits of internal controls at corporations, should be changed. Critics say that such audits are too expensive and have kept foreign companies from listing their securities in the United States.

Mr. Scott said the committee would also review whether the Securities and Exchange Commission needed to adopt better procedures to weigh the costs and benefits of its regulations, and whether some other government agency should be charged with reviewing those decisions.

The final area to be discussed, he said, is shareholder rights, including the efforts of hedge funds to force changes in corporate policies, and whether shareholder approval should be required for takeover defenses.

While the committee includes many officers of companies that are subject to regulation by the S.E.C., it includes no former agency chairmen or commissioners, or people who held major S.E.C. staff positions.

"We generally tried not to include regulators," Mr. Scott said. "We would not want to put people in the position who had formulated these rules in the past. They may have a lack of objectivity."

He noted that one member, Robert Glauber, a visiting professor at Harvard Law School and a former chairman of NASD, did have experience in regulation.

DOJ_NMG_0062163

"Anybody on this committee is in the real world and will bring with them real-world perspectives," he said.

Mr. Hubbard said the committee would be knowledgeable about regulation. "Many of these people have S.E.C. interaction on a regular basis," he said, adding that the academics involved, either as members of the panel or as advisers, were experts in many areas of securities law and regulation.

Among the committee members are Samuel A. DiPiazza Jr., chief executive of the accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers, and Donald L. Evans, the former commerce secretary who is now chief executive of the Financial Services Forum, a lobbying group for major insurers, banks and investment banks. Mr. Paulson is a former chairman of the group.

There are also chief executives of DuPont, Office Depot and the CIT Group, and top officers of mutual fund companies, Lehman Brothers and the New York Stock Exchange. William G. Parrett, chief executive of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu, another major accounting firm, is also a member, as is Ira M. Millstein, a leading corporate lawyer.

Accounting firms have been seeking legislative relief from liability suits over failed audits, a matter the committee will consider. Asked if the chairmen of such firms might lack objectivity, Mr. Scott said that they might also oppose some issues the committee planned to consider. "These big auditing firms have been the big beneficiaries of 404," he said. "We are thinking of changing 404."

The group plans to have an interim report in November, a date Mr. Hubbard said Mr. Paulson had requested. That could allow its recommendations to be considered at post-election meetings of Congress, although Mr. Scott said he thought the idea was to have proposals ready for the new Congress in January.

Mr. Scott said that academics would prepare papers for the committee, and that those papers could form the basis for parts of the report. Luigi Zingales, a professor at the University of Chicago business school and a committee member, will prepare a report on the overall issue of competitiveness.

Robert E. Litan of Brookings will report on liability matters, Mr. Glauber will discuss the regulatory framework and Andrew Kuritzkes of Mercer Oliver Wyman, a consulting firm, will assess the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

Allen Ferrell of Harvard Law School will report on shareholder rights, John C. Coffee Jr. of Columbia Law School on securities class-action suits, and Kenneth E. Scott of Stanford Law School on federal-state conflict in regulation.

Reinier H. Kraakman of Harvard Law School will report on liability issues involving directors and investment banks, and John K. Villa, a criminal defense lawyer and a partner in the firm of Williams & Connolly, will discuss criminal enforcement of securities laws.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Sen. Reid Asks For Polygamy Task Force (AP)

AP, September 13, 2006

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - The U.S. Senate's top Democrat called Tuesday for a federal investigation into the activities of polygamists in Western states.

Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that a task force should be formed to look into interstate activities of polygamists. He also asked the Justice Department to help state prosecutors dealing with polygamist sect leader Warren Jeffs.

``For too long, this outrageous activity has been disguised in the mask of religious freedom," Reid said. ``But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated."

Reid, a Mormon, added that Jeffs is part of a sect that broke away from the Mormon Church more than a century ago and has been disavowed by leaders and mainstream members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

A reporter's call to the Justice Department's after-hours command center was transferred to the department's press office, where there was no answer.

Jeffs, 50, is charged with two felony counts of rape as an accomplice, accused of arranging a ``spiritual marriage" between an underage girl and an older man. Each count carries a penalty of five years to life in prison.

The leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints was arrested Aug. 28 by the Nevada Highway Patrol during a traffic stop and is being held without bail. He had been on the run for about a year-and-a-half when he was arrested.

Besides the Utah charges, Jeffs is facing two felony charges in Mohave County, Ariz., for a similarly arranged marriage involving an underage girl. He is expected to be prosecuted there after Utah proceedings have concluded.

Polygamist communities have tended to gather in remote areas of the West, where they can avoid the attention of authorities and larger society more easily. Plural marriage is illegal in all 50 states, but authorities have found it difficult to find witnesses who will come forward and enable them to prosecute.

'Girls Gone Wild' Cuts Plea Deal (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

The California company responsible for the successful "Girls Gone Wild" series of videos has pleaded guilty to violating a federal law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children, the Justice Department announced today.

Mantra Films Inc. of Santa Monica pleaded guilty to charges that it failed to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers in sexually explicit films that it produced and distributed. The company also failed to label its DVDs and videotapes as required by federal law, the Justice Department said.

Mantra Films entered its plea agreement today before U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak in Panama City, Fla. A second related company, MRA Holdings LLC, also entered into an agreement.

The companies, founded and owned by Joseph Francis, agreed to pay $2.1 million in fines and restitution. Of that, $1.6 million is to be paid by Mantra and MRA, and $500,000 by Francis.

The case is believed to be the first to be filed under a federal law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children, the Justice Department said.

"This case sends an important message about the Justice Department's commitment to protecting children from all forms of sexual exploitation," Assistant Atty. Gen. Alice S. Fisher said in a statement. "Today's agreements ensure that "Girls Gone Wild" will comply with an important law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of minors and puts other producers on notice that they must be in compliance as well."

"This prosecution makes clear that those who seek to enrich themselves at the expense of our children's innocence in violation of the laws intended to protect them will be held to answer in federal court," U.S. Atty. Gregory R. Miller of the Northern District of Florida said.

Aaron S. Dyer, of Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman LLP, who represents Francis and his companies, said steps have been taken to correct the problem.

"This plea resolves past issues relating to the recordkeeping procedures of the company several years ago," Dyer said in a telephone interview. "This case does not involve the intentional exploitation of minors, but rather the lack of safeguards to protect against participants who misrepresented their age in order to be filmed.

"The company takes these charges and the obligations and responsibilities as a record-keeper very seriously. We have implemented state-of-the-art compliance and procedures to insure that this never occurs again," he said.

The "Girls Gone Wild" series is based on young women exposing themselves during the frenzy of spring break and at other times in hot locales. There is binge drinking, hookups and frantic exhibitionism.

By packaging and dispersing the videos, people close to Francis told the Los Angeles Times recently that the company does as much as $40 million a year in sales.

In the court papers distributed by the Justice Department, " 'Girls Gone Wild' admitted filming performers and producing and distributing sexually explicit video materials during all of 2002 and part of 2003 while violating the record keeping and labeling laws."

Specifically, Mantra Films pleaded guilty to three counts of failing to keep the required records and seven labeling violations.

MRA Holding entered into deferred prosecution agreement concerning the information filed in court charging the company with 10 labeling violations. As part of that agreement, the government will dismiss the charges at the end of three years if MRA Holding abides by all of its obligations, the Justice Department said.

MRA Holding also agreed to employ an independent outside monitor selected by the government and provide the monitor complete access to the books and records, production facilities and other locations required to ensure the company's compliance with federal law, the federal agency said.

Girls Gone Wild Company Pleads Guilty In Sex Exploitation Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The company that produces the "Girls Gone Wild" tapes of young women baring their breasts and acting in other sexual situations pleaded guilty Tuesday to federal charges and agreed to pay fines totaling $2.1 million (â¬1.65 million).

Mantra Films Inc., based in Santa Monica, California, made the plea in U.S. District Court in Florida on charges of failing to maintain proof of age and indentification for its young performers in sexually explicit films. It also failed to label its DVDs and videotapes properly as required by federal law.

A second company owned by Mantra's founder, MRA Holdings LLC, entered into a deferred agreement on charges of improper labeling. Under that agreement with prosecutors, the charges would be dismissed after three years if MRA Holdings cooperates with future government prosecutions, admits wrongdoing and pays fines.

The two companies and their founder, Joseph Francis, will pay $2.1 million (â¬1.65 million) in fines and restitution, the Justice Department said.

Separate state charges in Florida alleging that two 17-year-old girls were videotaped by a "Girls Gone Wild" cameraman in sexual situations remain pending against Mantra and Francis.

"Today's agreements ensure that Girls Gone Wild will comply with an important law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of minors and puts other producers on notice that they must be in compliance as well," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher.

An attorney for Mantra, Aaron Dyer, said the company would clean up its record keeping.

The charges involved "serious record-keeping issues that occurred several years ago," he said. "Mantra takes these issues very seriously and has done everything it can to make sure this never occurs again."

According to court papers, Mantra Films admitted to violating record keeping and labeling laws while distributing the videos during all of 2002 and part of 2003.

Founded in 1997, Mantra released 83 different titles and sold 4.5 million videos and DVDs in 2002, according to Hoover's Inc., a business data firm in Austin, Texas.

'Girls Gone Wild' Producers Fined $2.1 Million (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The entertainment company that produces the "Girls Gone Wild" films and its founder pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges they failed to document the ages of female performers in sexually oriented productions.

Mantra Films of Santa Monica, California, entered a plea agreement in a federal court in Panama City, Florida, the Justice Department said.

Authorities said Joseph Francis, founder of Mantra Films and a related company, MRA Holdings, also agreed to plead guilty to charges to be filed later in Los Angeles, and to pay fines and restitution totaling $2.1 million. (Read the agreement -- pdf)

The "Girls Gone Wild" videotapes -- often featuring young women heavily partying and baring their breasts -- are widely advertised on some cable television channels.

Mantra Films specifically pleaded guilty in Florida to charges that it failed to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers. The company also admitted it failed to label its videotapes and DVDs as required by federal law.

Court documents say the alleged violations occurred during productions titled "Ultimate Spring Break," "Girls Gone Wild on Campus Uncensored," "Totally Exposed Uncensored and Beyond," and "Girls Gone Wild College Girls Exposed/Sexy Sorority Sweethearts."

The Justice Department said the case is the first filed under a law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children.

The law, which prosecutors call Section 2257 -- is intended to protect minors by requiring producers to create and maintain age and identity records for every performer in sexually explicit movies and other media.

Distributors also must label their tapes and discs with the name of the custodian of the records and their location, prosecutors said.

"Today's agreements ensure that Girls Gone Wild will comply with an important law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of minors and puts other producers on notice that they must be in compliance as well," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher.

Officials said Francis will pay $500,000 and his firms, Mantra and MRA Holdings, will together pay $1.6 million.

An attorney for Mantra, Aaron Dyer, told The Associated Press that the company would clean up its record keeping.

The charges involved "serious record-keeping issues that occurred several years ago," he told the wire service. "Mantra takes these issues very seriously and has done everything it can to make sure this never occurs again."

The case does not shut down "Girls Gone Wild."

Under terms of the deal, the Los Angeles charges against MRA will be dismissed after three years if the company fully complies with the record-keeping laws and fully pays the fines.

Justice Department Gone Wild? (B&C)

By John Eggerton

Broadcasting & Cable, September 13, 2006

The Justice Department wasn't too wild about Girls Gone Wild.

The company, whose videos showing women baring most or all in settings like Spring Break and Mardi Gras have been a cable network staple for years, has agreed to pay $2.1 million to settle a lawsuit with the Department.

Justice had sued under a law that requires the makers of sexually explicit videos to keep records of the ages of the performers in those videos. According to the department, Girls Gone Wild admitted violating the record-keeping requirements in 2002 and 2003.

In addition to paying the fines, the company has agreed to admit criminal wrongdoing. In addition the charges will be dropped only if the company remains in compliance for the next three years. It has also agreed to allow a government-approved monitor to assure that compliance.

Judge Won't Order New Trial For Safavian (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal judge declined Tuesday to throw out a conviction or order a new trial for a former Bush administration official convicted of lying about his relationship with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was convicted in June of making false statements and obstruction. It was the first trial to emerge from the scandal surrounding Abramoff.

His attorneys argued that the charges didn't meet the legal standard for conviction. They also said U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman improperly admitted into evidence e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian. The e-mails discuss two pieces of GSA-controlled property that Abramoff wanted for himself or his lobbying clients.

Many of the e-mails were written around the time that Safavian accepted a weeklong trans-Atlantic golfing trip from Abramoff.

Friedman rejected that argument, denying the request for a new trial. He said the e-mails were properly admitted and noted that Safavian discussed the e-mails when testifying in his own defense.

The judge also rejected Safavian's argument that his conviction should be overturned because government officials never warned him about the consequences of lying. Friedman said such warnings are not required.

Safavian faces up to five years in prison on each count. He resigned from his White House post last year as the federal government's chief procurement officer.

Judge Won't Order New Trial For Safavian (NBC)

NBC News, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal judge today denied former top White House procurement official, David Safavian a new trial. Safavian, a friend of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, was found guilty in June of three counts of making false statements to investigators and one count of obstruction of justice surrounding a 2002 golf junket to Scotland. Also accompanying Safavian on the golfing trip with Abramoff, were Congressman Bob Ney (R-Oh), Ralph Reed, Neil Volz, and two aides to Ney.

Judge Paul Friedman writes, "This Court concludes that there are no grounds for granting either defendant's motion for judgment of acquittal on any of the counts for which he was convicted, or his motion for a new trial."

The trial also provided new details of the lavish golf trip, as well as photos taken on the historic St. Andrews course of Ney with Abramoff and others. Volz, a longtime Ney loyalist who went to work for Abramoff's firm in 2002, pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges. Volz was a star prosecution witness in the Safavian trial.

Story continues below ? advertisement

Volz detailed the Scotland trip as a fete of eating and drinking and telling funny stories on the plane ride overseas. He said playing golf on the fabled Old Course totaled $400 per round. And, as far as he knew, Volz said, none of the public officials on the trip, including Ney and Safavian, ever paid for golf rounds or entertainment in Scotland. Ney has been the subject of a Justice Department investigation, but has not been charged.

Abramoff emails

Safavian's attorneys had argued that including hundreds of e-mails between him and Abramoff as evidence constituted hearsay that might have prejudiced jurors.

Safavian attorney, Barbara Van Gelder wrote, "The e-mails remain hearsay since the truth or credibility of the matter asserted must be weighed by the jury."

Abramoff was never called to testify at the trial, but hundreds of his e-mails to Safavian were read into the court record during the trial.

Today Judge Friedman writes the e-mails could not be hearsay because Safavian himself testified about them, "Safavian took the stand at trial and testified about many of the e-mails in question, including the numerous e-mails between himself and Jack Abramoff. In doing so, Mr. Safavian frequently testified what meaning he gave to the e-mails he both sent and received, what effect they had on his actions, and what import they had to him."

Golf, lobbying connections

The Scotland golf trip came at a time when e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian show the lobbyist was interested in securing leases on two GSA controlled properties. The e-mails indicate that Safavian assisted Abramoff with information on the Old Post Office, and a former Naval Surface Weapons facility, White Oak, in suburban Maryland.

The judge asserts, in denying Safavian a new trial, that Safavian "falsely stated" that Abramoff "did not have any business with GSA at the time Mr. Safavian was invited on the trip to Scotland, when in truth and fact, Mr. Safavian well knew, prior to the August 2002 Scotland trip that Mr. Abramoff was seeking to lease or purchase GSA-controlled property."

Safavian is scheduled to be sentenced in October. He could be imprisoned for 20 years on the four counts, although federal sentencing guidelines suggest he will face a much lighter sentence.

Volz is awaiting sentencing. He could get up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine but hopes for a much more lenient sentence by cooperating.

Abramoff is also waiting to be sentenced in the Washington influence peddling scandal. He has already been sentenced to five years and 10 months in prison for his role in the Suncruz casino cruise line case along with his partner Adam Kidan.

Tom Noe Sentenced To 27 Months In Federal Prison For Funneling Donations To Bush (ABJ)

By John Seewer

Akron Beacon Journal, September 13, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio - A federal judge sentenced a GOP fundraiser at the center of an Ohio political scandal to two years and three months in prison Tuesday for funneling $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign.

Tom Noe, a former Toledo-area rare coin dealer whose large donations made him a powerful political figure, apologized for scheming to give friends money to donate to Bush to fulfill Noe's promise to generate $50,000 at a fundraiser.

"I recruited others to make contributions to the campaign," Noe said in court. "I knew it was wrong to do so. I alone accept responsibility."

Noe said he arranged the scheme because "in 2003 I was pressured by Bush-Cheney officials to become a Pioneer," a name the campaign gives to people who raise $100,000.

Federal prosecutors say Noe wanted perks such as invitations to the White House and the president's ranch in Texas, and he wanted to impress various state officials.

The money-laundering scheme was the largest prosecuted under the 2002 campaign finance reform law, which set limits on donations, prosecutors said last October.

U.S. District Judge David Katz said Noe was trying to feed his ego and made a stupid decision.

"He has risen in the past to positions of respect and power and he violated the trust of those who placed him in those positions," Katz said.

Noe pleaded guilty to three charges, including exceeding federal campaign contribution limits. Federal sentencing rules called for a term of up to 2 1/2 years, but prosecutors last week said Noe, 52, should get up to four years because he schemed to corrupt the election process.

Craig Morford, first assistant U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Ohio, said Tuesday that prosecutors were satisfied with the sentence Noe got.

"He's going to jail for the next two-and-a-quarter years, plus facing the additional charges for his other conduct," said Morford, whose office prosecuted the case.

Noe still is charged with stealing at least $1 million from an ill-fated $50 million rare coin investment that he managed for the state workers' compensation fund. Investigations into the coin investment led to Gov. Bob Taft's no contest plea and conviction last year to charges the he failed to report gifts, such as golf outings.

The coin investment, first reported in April 2005 by The Blade newspaper, has been a major embarrassment for Ohio's ruling Republicans and given Democrats a better shot at winning state offices this year, including the governor's office that has been under GOP control since 1991.

Noe, who also was fined $136,200 Tuesday, will not have to serve his prison sentence for the Bush donations until after the conclusion of the coin investment case, which is set for trial next month. He has pleaded not guilty to 46 charges.

Katz said he would recommend that Noe serve his sentence in Florida, where the coin dealer now lives.

Federal prosecutors did not indicate during the sentencing whether the coin money was used for the donations. They could have sought a stiffer penalty if they thought the state money had been used.

Prosecutors said Noe gave $45,000 directly or indirectly to 24 friends and associates, who made the Bush campaign contributions in their own names, allowing him to skirt the $2,000 individual contribution limit.

Noe's lawyer, Jon Richardson, argued that his client should be sentenced to community service instead of prison time because he already has been shamed publicly, but he said Noe was treated fairly.

Noe, who appeared serious in court and spoke with an unfaltering voice, was in a jovial mood when he arrived at the courthouse, playfully waving his umbrella to shield his face from photographers outside.

Noe wrote several checks just under the $2,000 cap to avoid suspicion, according to prosecutors. All the checks were written in the eight days leading up to a fundraiser in October 2003 at a downtown Columbus hotel.

Authorities said Bush's campaign committee was unaware of the alleged contribution scheme and unknowingly submitted a false campaign report to the Federal Election Commission.

Noe personally contributed more than $105,000 to Republicans including Bush and Taft during the 2004 campaign. The Bush-Cheney campaign donated $6,000 it received from Noe and his wife, Bernadette, to charity. The rest of the money donated at the Bush fundraiser remains with the Republican Party.

Sue Metzger, who worked with Noe at his coin shop in suburban Toledo and was among those who received money to donate at the Columbus fundraiser, said after the hearing that the public trust has been violated.

"There is a victim and that's the voter," she said.

Noe Sentenced To Prison, Fined For Election Gifts (CLPD)

By John Caniglia, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, September 13, 2006

He blames pressure from Bush campaign

Toledo -- Tom Noe's zealous quest to be a Republican kingmaker ended in a cramped courtroom Tuesday, far from the Beltway spotlight he once craved.

A federal judge sentenced an apologetic Noe to 27 months in prison and fined him $136,200 for making $45,400 in illegal campaign contributions to President Bush's re-election campaign. Authorities called the case the country's largest fundraising scandal in recent years.

Noe, however, will not go to prison until after his trial next month in Lucas County Common Pleas Court, on unrelated state charges of racketeering and stealing nearly $2.3 million from a $50 million investment in rare coins that he managed for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation.

If convicted in that case, he could receive decades in prison.

"This was an ego-feeding and a stupid act by Mr. Noe," said U.S. District Judge David Katz.

"And I think he realizes that today," added Katz, who imposed the sentence.

Noe told Katz that pressure from the Bush-Cheney campaign to raise $100,000 and gain "Pioneer" status led him to break the law.

"I knew it was wrong, and I alone accept responsibility for what I did," Noe said.

Dressed in a blue suit, Noe looked upbeat before the hearing.

The coin dealer who had made so many friends by doling out campaign contributions and political influence across Ohio walked into Katz's courtroom with about 25 friends and family members, including his wife, Bernadette, and his daughters.

He chatted briefly with his attorneys and seldom looked around.

About two hours later, he looked ashen, though composed. His wife and family members were in tears.

Noe, 52, formerly of Maumee, pleaded guilty in May to three charges of skirting federal election laws involving contributions to Bush at a fund-raiser in Columbus in 2003.

Prosecutors said Noe pledged to raise $50,000 at the fund-raiser. When he asked two dozen friends for money, many said they couldn't afford it or couldn't attend the event.

So Noe told the contributors he would reimburse them, prosecutors said. Noe told them to tell people the money was a loan if anyone asked.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Seth Uram and John Pearson said Noe abused the public's trust.

They said that he should have known better, as a key fund-raiser for Bush, and that he had failed to accept responsibility for overseeing "a systematic scheme."

DOJ_NMG_0062170

"He didn't hesitate to turn his closest friends and associates into criminals," Uram said at the sentencing. "This wasn't something that he fell into. . . . He was meticulous in committing the crime and in concealing the crime."

Noe faced 24 to 30 months in prison, according to federal sentencing guidelines. Katz rejected three requests by prosecutors to increase the sentence and allowed Noe to remain free on bond until his state trial is done. Katz also rejected Noe's request to sentence him to community service in South Florida, where he now lives.

Noe's attorney, Jon Richardson, had pushed for leniency, claiming that Noe already had suffered enough from the humiliation of his fall from political grace.

He urged Katz in documents to give Noe probation. He said the $45,400 in illegal contributions was quite small compared to hundreds of millions of dollars raised in the presidential campaign.

"There's nothing that Tom Noe did that shook the public's confidence in the election process," Richardson said in court.

One of the people Noe used to make his contributions, Susan Metzger, showed up for the sentencing and got a hug from Noe outside the courtroom. Metzger, who worked for Noe at his coin shop, said she had trusted Noe and didn't think she had done anything wrong until authorities started investigating.

After embracing Noe, she sat down in the hallway and said: "That's hard. It didn't have to be this way. This is a sad thing. It's been a rough year for me.

"I made some decisions at the time that I thought were OK. Do I feel used? Definitely. I think anyone involved in this whole thing feels the same way."

Noe has said he pleaded guilty to spare his family and friends the embarrassment of a trial. One of Noe's friends, Richard lott, wasn't worried about the embarrassment. He said Noe duped him. In a letter to Noe's attorney, lott blasted his former friend.

"Tom accomplished many things," lott said in the letter, which he gave to The Plain Dealer.

"He brought national news media attention to northwest Ohio; he put Toledo and Ohio on the map for crooked politics; and he single-handedly virtually destroyed the Republican Party in Toledo and Ohio. And did I mention that he was a thief?"

Democrats had pushed for a harsh punishment, saying Noe was the poster child of wayward politics in Columbus.

"He wanted power. He wanted prestige, and he wanted to be close to the president," said Chris Redfern, the Ohio Democratic Party chief.

Republicans, who once eagerly courted Noe for his largess, now back away from speaking of him.

"We believe that the media and the Democrats are the only people interested in Tom Noe," said John McClelland, an Ohio GOP spokesman.

"As soon as we learned that he deceived people, we began to distance ourselves from him. Right from the start."

Ex-Leaders To Oppose FBI Raid (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

Former Speakers Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and Tom Foley (D-Wash.) and former House Minority Leader Bob Michel (R-Ill.) have notified an appeals court that they will intervene in the legal challenge by Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) to the May 20 FBI raid of his Capitol Hill office.

Gingrich, Foley and Michel submitted a notice with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that they will be filing an amicus brief arguing that the FBI search of Jefferson's office was unconstitutional and a violation of the separation of powers between the legislative and executive branches.

Separately, Abner Mikva, former chief judge of the D.C. appeals court and a five-term Democratic Representative from Illinois, also will file an amicus brief on Jefferson's behalf.

In addition, a bipartisan group of former House general counsels, including Charles Tiefer, Stanley Brand, Steven Ross and Thomas Spulak, as well as Congressional scholars Norman Ornstein and Thomas Mann, have notified the appeals court of their intentions to weigh in on the case.

DOJ_NMG_0062171

Former House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.) was asked to join with his three former colleagues but declined to do so, several sources said.

The two former Speakers, House Minority Leader and Congressional experts will not defend Jefferson, who is the target of an ongoing corruption probe by the Justice Department, but will argue that the Justice Department overstepped its bounds when it searched Jefferson's office.

Justice Department officials have defended their actions as necessary in light of the Louisiana Democrat's refusal to comply with subpoenas directing him to turn over materials and documents sought by federal investigators. Two of Jefferson's accomplices in a long-running bribery scheme already have been sentenced to lengthy prison terms.

The Justice Department also notes that a federal judge approved a search warrant for Jefferson's office and that special techniques were employed so that privileged legislative documents and materials were not seized by FBI agents.

However, the appeals court in late July ordered Chief Judge Thomas Hogan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, who approved the original search warrant for Jefferson's office, to allow the lawmaker's attorneys to have access to the seized documents and computer hard drives.

The process of assembling that material for Jefferson has bogged down the corruption probe, according to sources close to the case. It will be several more weeks before an official appointed by Hogan to oversee the transfer to Jefferson completes his work, and then Jefferson will be allowed to file legal motions claiming Speech or Debate Clause protection for the materials. Hogan will then have to rule on the motions, some of which could succeed. Only at that point would the case return to the appeals court and a briefing schedule be laid out.

In the meantime, the Justice Department is unlikely to take any criminal action against Jefferson since to do so would mean that none of the materials in his office, which prosecutors currently cannot review, were necessary to charge him with wrongdoing. One source estimated that it could be "four to six weeks" before all the seized materials are available for Jefferson, which means that the Louisiana Democrat may not face any legal charges before the Nov. 7 elections.

But even with all the confusion over the contested materials, Jefferson continues to gain new allies in his ongoing court fight with the Justice Department.

Already, a bipartisan group of House leaders that included Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) filed an amicus brief before Hogan when he initially considered Jefferson's request to declare the search unconstitutional, although Hogan rejected the group's arguments. That group may file a similar amicus brief with the appeals court, although the two party leaders have not agreed yet on whether they will do so.

With the appeals court's 60-day filing deadline for non-governmental parties about to expire, Gingrich, Foley and Michel declared their intention to enter the case on Tuesday, as did the others.

Gingrich has been particularly vocal in expressing his displeasure over the FBI search, publicly decrying it as a violation of separation of powers between the two branches of government.

Much like Hastert and Pelosi, Gingrich did not seek to protect Jefferson but instead insisted that Congress cannot allow such a precedent, because it could be abused by a future administration in a political battle with Capitol Hill, to stand.

Gingrich was not available for comment on Tuesday, but he made his feelings about the case known in a June 8 opinion piece in Roll Call.

"But what is not firmly settled, and what is a dramatic departure from established practice, is the executive branch's bold assertion that it can direct the FBI to raid a legislative branch office, with a judicial warrant, without consultation or cooperation from legislative branch leaders, as it did for the first time in the history of the American republic on May 20," Gingrich wrote.

In an interview, Michel said he had not seen a draft of the amicus brief that will be filed by the three former lawmakers but had agreed to sign onto the motion.

"All I did was agree to at least participate," said the former Illinois Republican. Michel said the brief was being drafted by lawyers at the firm Bingham McCutchen.

Ornstein, a Roll Call contributing writer, said the case has implications far beyond Jefferson's own legal and political future.

"This is a real question of legislative integrity in the face of an executive branch that has every interest in intimidating them from time to time," Ornstein said.

Brand, who served as House general counsel from 1976 to 1983, said Congress must defend itself from intrusions by the executive and judicial branches on its authority.

"I just thought that when you get the four former [House] general counsels all on side, hopefully it adds some weight to the consideration of a longstanding issue that directly affect the House and its Members," Brand said.

Lawmaker: Panel At Impasse On Cunningham (AP-Y)

By Erica Werner

AP, September 13, 2006

The leaders of the House Intelligence Committee are at an impasse over whether to subpoena jailed former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham as part of an investigation into his actions on the committee.

The disagreement threatens to end chances for a bipartisan outcome to the investigation, Rep. Jane Harman of California, the panel's top Democrat, said in an interview Tuesday with The Associated Press.

"We've hit a problem, and I hope we can get past it and come up with a joint report," Harman said. "That is my preference, my strong preference, and I don't know if that's possible. It may not be possible."

"I think it's fair to say we're at an impasse," she said.

Jamal Ware, a spokesman for committee chairman Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, had no immediate response to Harman's comments.

Harman believes the panel's investigation can't be complete without interviewing Cunningham, the San Diego Republican who resigned from Congress last November after admitting taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. But Hoekstra has not agreed.

A congressional aide, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said Hoekstra wants to hear from Cunningham but doesn't want to issue a subpoena only to have him invoke Fifth Amendment protections and refuse to testify, as his attorney has warned the committee he would do.

Cunningham served on the Intelligence Committee starting in 2001 and for part of last year chaired the panel's subcommittee on terrorism and human intelligence. The panel is looking into whether he abused his position to slip provisions favoring certain contractors into classified legislation, where it would be difficult to spot.

Harman said she supports a subpoena even if Cunningham does refuse to testify, and would not support granting him immunity. Cunningham is cooperating with prosecutors in an ongoing federal corruption investigation.

"Mr. Cunningham has voluntarily produced all documents requested by the committee whenever they have made such requests and has also indicated a willingness to be interviewed on a voluntary basis at the conclusion of the criminal investigation," Cunningham's attorney, Lee Blalack, said Tuesday. "But we will not permit him to give testimony to the committee without a grant of immunity in the midst of the ongoing criminal investigation with which he is cooperating."

Harman and Hoekstra also haven't agreed on releasing the unclassified version of the report by an outside investigator the committee hired to look into Cunningham's committee actions. Harman supports releasing the unclassified report by investigator Michael Stern.

With just a few weeks left in the legislative session before Congress goes into recess to campaign for the November election, Harman said there needs to be a resolution soon.

"I would prefer to resolve this amicably. I think that window is closing," Harman said. "What we may end up with is (Hoekstra's) statement and my statement, and they may disagree."

"But the answer is this has to close, it can't be left open-ended into a future Congress."

Harman declined to reveal contents of the report, but congressional officials have told AP that the document concludes that Cunningham took advantage of secrecy and badgered congressional aides to help slip items into classified bills that would benefit him and his associates.

Harman said she had no reason to believe there was criminal behavior by anyone on the committee or committee staff other than Cunningham.

Animal Rights Advocates Given Prison Terms (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

TRENTON, Sept. 12 — In a courtroom crowded with animal rights supporters, a federal district judge on Tuesday sentenced three people to prison terms of four to six years for their roles in a campaign of threats and harassment against a company that runs an animal testing laboratory.

The three were described at their trial as coordinators of a group dedicated to shutting down Huntingdon Life Sciences, a British company with a laboratory in New Jersey. The company's employees, their families and people who did business with Huntingdon were threatened and their property vandalized as part of the group's campaign.

"All they talk about is how pure their intentions are, about saving animals," Charles McKenna, an assistant United States attorney, said after the sentencing. "These people victimized some of the witnesses in this case in ways no one should ever have to deal with."

The defendants' group, Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty, maintained a Web site that listed potential targets and served as a platform for sharing harassment techniques.

The case has drawn international attention, not only because Huntingdon Life Sciences is the largest contract animal testing laboratory in Europe but also because the convictions were the first under the federal Animal Enterprise Protection Act.

The law, enacted in 1992, aims to curb aggressive tactics by animal rights groups against testing laboratories, fur farms and related enterprises. A stronger version of the law, the Animal Enterprise Terrorism Act, was introduced in Congress this summer and has wide support.

Dr. John D. Young, the chairman of Americans for Medical Progress, a biomedical research organization, said the sentences assured that "our nation's law enforcement system will not tolerate terror tactics that include threatening e-mails, telephone calls, vandalism and attacks on the privacy of researchers' homes."

The judge, Anne E. Thompson, sentenced the former president of Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty, Kevin Kjonaas, 28, of Minneapolis, to six years in prison. Lauren Gazzola, 26, of Connecticut, the group's former campaign coordinator, was sentenced to four years and four months. The Web site coordinator, Jacob Conroy, 30, of Oakland, Calif., received a four-year sentence.

The organization itself was convicted and ordered to pay $1 million in restitution, although the lawyer representing the group said it no longer exists. Three other defendants are to be sentenced, one on Wednesday and two next week.

The defendants were convicted in March of conspiracy and stalking, but not with carrying out any destructive acts. Their lawyers argued that they were socially conscious young people who were carried away by their beliefs. Judge Thompson acknowledged receiving hundreds of letters urging leniency in her sentencing.

Mr. Kjonaas told the judge: "I'm utterly humbled. I came here with my mother. This has been a traumatic experience, a learning experience, and I don't know what more I could say."

But Judge Thompson recalled a taped conversation in which "anyone who listened would recognize a sense of glee, almost, in wielding power."

Ms. Gazzola, who taught test preparation courses for law school applicants, told the judge that even in prison she would not give up her own hope of becoming a lawyer. Near tears, she said, "The decision to pursue law school is something I chose two weeks before I was arrested."

An unofficial spokeswoman for the defendants, Andrea Lindsay, said all three planned to appeal their convictions. Ms. Lindsay, who came from California, bristled at the prosecutors' complaints that the defendants did not express remorse. "They're not going to roll over and apologize for illegal acts of others," she said.

Ms. Lindsay was among at least 100 supporters, including others from Florida, Pennsylvania and New York, who spilled out of the courtroom. Watched by a contingent of Trenton police officers and federal officers, the largely young crowd exchanged news of the sentences among themselves.

Ms. Lindsay said that "it's sad for all of us to see our friends go to prison, but at the end of the day, it's six individuals, and there are hundreds, thousands of people campaigning against Huntingdon."

3 Animal-welfare Activists Going To Prison For Inciting Threats (AP)

By Beth Defalco

AP, September 13, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. - Three animal-rights activists convicted of using their Web site to incite threats and harassment against a company that tests products on animals received prison sentences ranging from four to six years Tuesday.

They were also ordered to pay a total of $1 million in restitution to the company and people they terrorized. All three said they planned to appeal their convictions and requested they receive vegan meals while in prison.

Three other members of Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty are awaiting sentencing within the next two weeks.

Along with the organization itself, the six activists were convicted in March of using a Web site to incite threats, harassment and vandalism against Huntingdon Life Sciences, a company that tests drugs and household products on animals.

Huntingdon Life Sciences general manger Mike Caulfield said the company "was grateful that justice was served." He said as a result of the threats and harassment, the company's health insurer and other firms severed ties with it.

"It generally made the cost of doing business with us more expensive than our competitors during that time," he said.

And that was the point, prosecutors said.

"This was a conspiracy to shut down Huntingdon Life Sciences," said assistant U.S. Attorney Charles McKenna.

The government charged that the group waged a five-year campaign against the company, posting on the Web site the names, addresses and phone numbers of Huntingdon employees and those who do business with the company, and personal information such as where they go to church and where their children attend school.

Many of those people saw their homes vandalized and received threatening e-mails, faxes and phone calls.

The group, based in Philadelphia, maintains its actions were protected under the First Amendment.

The defendants, all in their late 20s or early 30s, were not accused of directly making threats or carrying out vandalism but were convicted of animal-enterprise terrorism, conspiracy and interstate stalking.

The three sentenced were the president of SHAC, Kevin Kjonaas, 28, of Minneapolis, Minn.; campaign coordinator Lauren Gazzola, 25, of Connecticut; and Web site manager Jacob Conroy, 30, of San Francisco. Kjonaas was sentenced to six years in prison, Gazzola to four years and four months, and Conroy to four years.

"None of it's fair," Conroy said after the hearing.

Though defense attorneys tried to portray their clients as well-meaning animal-lovers who committed a "crime of compassion," prosecutors said the group, and especially its leader, allowed good intentions to become perverted.

"Mr. Kjonaas was drunk with the power that he could push around multinational companies with his Web site," McKenna said.

Gazzola wept as she addressed U.S. District Judge Anne E. Thompson, telling the court how she feared her dream of becoming an attorney vanished with her felony conviction.

But Gazzola, as well as the other two, never apologized for their actions and Thompson asked why.

"As an advocate for any cause," Gazzola responded, "you change your idea of the best way to use your talents."

Each activist asked to serve their sentence in a prison near their hometown and asked to receive vegan meals. All three said they planned to appeal the case.

"I'm pretty confident I won't be serving (that long) in prison," Kjonaas said after being sentenced. "There are a ton of appealable issues."

"I'll be OK," he said, "I'll be back."

3 Animal Activists Get Jail (PHI)

By Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 13, 2006

They all were described as talented, educated young people, who turned their energies toward a misguided - and illegal - campaign to stop laboratory testing on animals.

One, Lauren Gazzola, a former New York University student, tearfully said she was two weeks away from taking the LSAT for law school when she was arrested.

Now, the three leaders of Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty are considered domestic terrorists, and each has just 30 days to report to prison to begin serving years-long sentences.

Gazzola, former SHAC president Kevin Kjonaas, and SHAC Web site manager Jacob Conroy yesterday became the first defendants to be sentenced in this landmark case, heard in federal court in Trenton.

The SHAC organization and six individual members were convicted earlier this year of violating the federal Animal Enterprise Protection Act.

SHAC - described yesterday as virtually defunct - was placed on a form of probation. The remaining defendants will be sentenced at hearings today and Tuesday. All of them will be liable for $1 million in restitution to the victims.

"At this point in my life, I am utterly humbled," said Kjonaas before he was sentenced to six years in prison. "I've come here with my mother. This has been a traumatic experience and a learning experience."

After the hearing, Kjonaas, a 29-year-old from Minnesota, said a prison term would not deter him from his cause.

"Others have gone through worse things," he said. "The history of social-justice movements is filled with people who went to jail... . I'll be OK. I'll be back."

Gazzola, 26, of Connecticut, received 52 months in prison, and Conroy, 30, of California, got 48 months.

"They had good homes, they had good parents, they had good schools," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles McKenna. "They chose to throw it all away."

The so-called "SHAC 7" were the first defendants ever charged under a federal law designed to criminalize the stalking, vandalism and other tactics of militant animal-rights organizations.

But SHAC members characterized the trial as a test on the limits of free speech, saying the defendants never broke any laws with their admittedly "obnoxious" protests, directed mainly against Huntingdon Life Sciences, an East Millstone, N.J., animal-testing firm.

For a typical protest, SHAC, which was based for a time in Philadelphia, would post the home address of a Huntingdon employee on its Web site. Protesters then would gather outside the employee's home chanting slogans and calling the employee a "puppy killer."

Although the Web site said SHAC did not support illegal tactics, the page often contained anonymous boasts of criminal vandalism and other acts.

During the trial, several Huntingdon employees gave emotional testimony about receiving threatening phone calls and letters and having their cars tipped over and the windows of their homes smashed out.

Huntingdon general manager Mike Caulfield, in court yesterday, said these types of protests have diminished since the convictions - but not ended.

"On behalf of the dozens of victims whose lives were turned upside down by these criminals, we're gratified justice was served," he said. "We are profitable. We are growing. We are still in business."

Andrea Lindsay, an animal-rights activist, said that home protests would continue, including two this week in New Jersey that have been "well-publicized" on a new Web site.

"The reality is that there are animal-rights activists across the globe... and they're going to continue to campaign against Huntingdon Life Sciences," she said.

She maintained again that the defendants were legitimate activists who did nothing wrong, and said the sentences only encouraged "underground" activists who break the law.

But McKenna said the defendants were committed to violence, not peaceful protest, as he made note of their defiance.

"I'm struck by the fact that we've been through three sides of the sentencing and so far we haven't heard anyone say, 'I'm sorry,' " he said. "And there are victims here today who perhaps would like to hear them apologize."

Reputed Israeli Mob Enforcer Sentenced (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A reputed enforcer for an Israeli crime group was sentenced to more than 10 years in federal prison for racketeering.

Hai Waknine, 35, pleaded guilty in June to using extortion and threats of violence to help an organized crime syndicate known as the Jerusalem Group launder nearly $2 million in embezzled funds. Authorities say the syndicate enriched itself through loan sharking, extortion, money laundering and illegal gambling in Israel, Europe and around the U.S.

Waknine, an Israeli national who lives in Marina del Rey, asked for leniency during sentencing Monday. But U.S. District Judge Manuel Real, citing Waknine's extensive criminal history, gave him 13 months in prison beyond the nine years that prosecutors recommended.

Prosecutors alleged that Waknine kidnapped debtors, aimed handguns at them and threatened their families to make them pay up.

"That was Waknine's role, a shakedown collections guy," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas P. Sleisenger. "There are a lot of people in the Israeli community who will sleep better tonight because he is behind bars."

Dig 'high Priority' In FBI Corruption Probe (BOSH)

By Casey Ross, Boston Herald Reporter

Boston Herald, September 13, 2006

The federal investigation into the $15 billion Big Dig has mushroomed into a "high priorty" public corruption probe focused on project financing and whether officials ignored requirements to conduct crucial inspections, Boston's FBI chief said yesterday.

"We've got a lot of agents assigned to it and there are several avenues to the case," said Ken Kaiser, special agent in charge of the Boston FBI. "Basically it's looked at as a public corruption investigation, which is the highest criminal priority we have."

Kaiser said his office is working with the federal Department of Transportation and has devoted six to eight agents to investigate the mammoth highway project, which is being blamed for the death of motorist Milena Del Valle. Del Valle, 38, died July 10 when concrete ceiling panels collapsed in the I-90 Seaport Connector Tunnel.

Kaiser said top FBI officials in Washington are monitoring the investigation and have pledged additional rescources if necessary. The federal probe is running parallel to a state investigation being led by Attorney General Tom Reilly, who is expecting to convene a special grand jury Oct. 3 to pursue criminal charges in the death of Del Valle. Reilly's office is also pursuing potential civil litigation and the recovery of money wasted on faulty construction practices.

Federal officials have been probing the Big Dig for years, but the intensity of their investigation increased dramatically following a scandal over I-93 tunnel leaks and the subsequent I-90 collapse.

Kaiser said agents are examining a broad range of issues including materials used, construction methods and whether officials followed requirements to conduct regular inspections. "What if those inspections were never done?" he said.

Asked whether the probe reaches beyond contractors to public officials, Kaiser replied, "If I would tell you that out of a $15 billion project we're not looking into other areas, I'd be lying," he said. "I mean, the money went someplace."

Vigil Trial: Tape-recorded Conversations, Videotapes Involving Vigil Played For Jurors (AP)

By Tim Korte

AP, September 13, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE (AP) - Jurors on Tuesday watched and listened to FBI videotapes showing California investment adviser Kent Nelson handing over thousands of dollars in cash to former state Treasurer Robert Vigil.

DOJ_NMG_0062177

Vigil has pleaded not guilty to 24 extortion and racketeering counts in an alleged kickback scheme. Vigil's first federal trial ended May 22 in a mistrial.

Nelson, who testified at Vigil's first trial but has refused to reappear, is shown pulling out an envelope stuffed with cash during a May 22, 2005 meeting with Vigil. Nelson offers the cash to Vigil while asking Vigil to direct state business to him.

Prosecutors also played a videotape from Aug. 24, 2005 after Vigil picked Nelson up at the Albuquerque airport. Nelson offers Vigil an envelope and tells him it contains $5,000.

"That's too much," said Vigil, who then told Nelson to give him $2,000.

"I want you to write some checks to people," Vigil said.

The videos and tape-recorded telephone conversations _ some of them also were played for the jury _ are among the government's strongest evidence against Vigil.

Jurors donned headphones to listen while the evidence was played and the courtroom became still and silent during the parts of the video that depicted the cash handovers.

Jason Bowles, one of Vigil's attorneys, argued Monday against playing the tape recordings, saying it would violate Vigil's right to confront his accusers.

"I think everyone would agree this is a fairly unprecedented move by a state prosecuting authority in the middle of a federal case," Bowles said.

U.S. District Judge James Browning formally rejected the defense effort Tuesday. He had said Monday that Vigil's lawyers had the opportunity to cross-examine Nelson during the first trial.

He described to jurors on Monday how investigators served a search warrant at the state treasurer's office last September and seized many of the papers that now serve as foundational government evidence.

In December 2003, Secret Service agents investigated Leo Sandoval, a former treasurer's office employee who has been identified as a bagman in the alleged kickback scheme and is cooperating with prosecutors. The Secret Service investigation focused on counterfeiting money, birth certificates and driver's licenses.

At that time, Sandoval gave investigators binders that included information about the state's investment practices for flexible repurchase agreements _ documents that led to charges against Vigil.

Sandoval eventually received immunity from prosecution in the counterfeiting case in exchange for his agreement to testify against Vigil.

McCaskill said that he asked Sandoval if any of the documents or signatures linked to the Vigil investigations had been forged. The FBI agent said Sandoval told him there were none.

McCaskill also said that Vigil approved $2.5 billion in flexible repurchase agreements during his term as treasurer from 2003-2005, leading to $1.8 million in fees for Nelson and other investment advisers.

McCaskill also said Vigil, as deputy treasurer under Michael Montoya, fired Nelson in November 2000 after questions came up about Nelson's qualifications. Yet during the next six months, Nelson continued to receive work and earned $1.16 million in commissions.

"Did all of these transactions occur after Mr. Vigil signed a letter to Kent Nelson, telling him he was terminated?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathon Gerson asked.

"They did," McCaskill said.

Younger Brother Testifies In Gotti Trial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 13, 2006

John A. Gotti's younger brother took the witness stand Tuesday in Manhattan federal court and said he never collected any extortion cash or passed any messages to others on behalf of his sibling.

Peter Gotti said that, despite a testy relationship over the years with his brother, known by the sobriquet "Junior," he still kept in touch in the late 1990s and early part of this decade while John, 42, was under house arrest and later serving a federal prison sentence.

Peter Gotti testified as a defense witness in the trial of his brother, who is accused of various acts of racketeering while serving as a key captain in the Gambino crime family. Federal prosecutors claim John Gotti took part in the 1992 assault on radio talk show personality and Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa. Prosecutors also have accused John "Junior" Gotti, the son of the late Gambino crime boss, with money laundering and other offenses. Summations could begin Thursday.

As a defense witness, Peter Gotti said he never collected, nor was he asked to collect, extortion money from Michael "Mickey Scars" DiLeonardo, a former Gambino member who turned government witness and testified earlier at the trial.

Even under cross examination by assistant U.S. attorney Victor Hou, Peter Gotti denied ever collecting money on his brother's behalf. Hou then led Peter Gotti through a series of financial deals he had done in the past in which his brother invested in some of his businesses, a number of which were defunct. In some cases his brother didn't collect on the loans, was paid back or took a small loss in the investments, Peter Gotti said.

Hou brought up a real estate deal in South Carolina, in which Peter Gotti admitted he sought to get an overdue payment from the buyer. But Peter Gotti insisted it wasn't a cash deal and that he had appeared with attorneys to work out the late payments.

Hou then brought up a taped conversation Peter Gotti had with his brother at Ray Brook federal prison in upstate New York talking about the Colombo crime family infighting of the 1990s. Hou was apparently using the conversation to cast doubt on Peter Gotti's claim that he never talked about mob business. But Peter Gotti pointed out that the conversation centered on a column that had appeared on the Web site Ganglandnews.com. Peter Gotti also denied passing messages for his brother beyond "social messages."

The defense is trying to show that John Gotti turned his back on mob life in 1999, a date that is outside the statute of limitations.

Jury Hears Jr.'s Hip-hop Hopes (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 13, 2006

Rappers like Irv Gotti or Yo Gotti may have taken the name - but Junior Gotti apparently had his own hip-hop dream.

The mob scion invested $20,000 into a failed hip-hop magazine that would have targeted prisoners by dispensing free legal advice beside photos of rapper babes.

But the Hottie Publishing venture never took off and Gotti ended up losing his dough, Gotti pal Steve Dobies told jurors yesterday at Gotti's racketeering trial in Manhattan Federal Court.

"Not too good," Dobies said when Gotti attorney Charles Carnesi asked him how it did.

For photos, the magazine would feature female hip-hop stars. And Gotti was counting on help from someone named Jamal in New York City who supposedly knew all the top names in the rap world.

"He knows Lil' Kim, too?" Gotti asked Dobies in a March 2003 prison chat intercepted by the feds and played for jurors yesterday.

Gotti even thought about roping big sister Victoria into the idea. But she wasn't biting.

"Vicki's idea about this thing is that your perspective on this is totally wrong," Gotti's attorney Richard Rehbock warns him. "It's not gonna sell."

Gotti was unconvinced, and on the tapes encourages Dobies to seize control of the magazine from Stephanie, the wife of a fellow inmate who first pitched him the idea while both were at a federal prison in upstate Ray Brook.

"He felt we could do a better job," Dobies said.

"I feel it has a lot of potential if it's done right," Gotti says on the tape. "I still feel that way. The kid [Jamal] I sent home knows all these people. He's in with all these rappers. He feels it. He loves it. I mean I don't think that she's the person for it. That's the problem."

Dobies told Gotti that he was having trouble getting in touch with Stephanie to discuss moving the business from Binghamton to the city.

"We're gonna hold her to it," Gotti said. "We'll do it someplace else with somebody else."

Dobies was called by defense attorneys to counter prosecution claims that he regularly visited Gotti at the federal prison so he could relay Mafia messages back to the street. Gotti was serving a nearly six-year prison hitch after pleading guilty in 1999 to racketeering charges and renouncing his ties to the mob.

Also yesterday, Gotti's brother Peter took the witness stand and denied ever picking up $50,000 in mob money from former Gambino capo Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo, as DiLeonardo testified last week.

"[John A. (Junior) Gotti] wouldn't allow me to do anything for him," Peter Gotti said.

"You're here today," prosecutor Victor Hou pointed out.

"Absolutely. It's the right thing to do," Gotti replied.

Man admits guilt in fraud

against Native Americans

CHANDLER - The former president of a private bank in Arizona has pleaded guilty in a Ponzi scheme that cost Native American depositors millions of dollars.

Edward James Driving Hawk Sr., 71, of Chandler, admitted mail and wire fraud in a conspiracy with others through a company known as U.S. Reservation Bank and Trust, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Prosecutors said the entity was an investment business that falsely touted itself as a bank "owned and managed by Indians for Indians."

An indictment says the company raised as much as $67 million in unsecured investments, and Driving Hawk diverted an estimated $4 million to himself and his family during the two years of operation.

Driving Hawk's son, Leo Driving Hawk Sr., a former sergeant with the Maricopa County Sheriff's Office, previously pleaded guilty to misprision of a felony and agreed to cooperate with investigators.

Edward, who made his guilty plea Wednesday in U.S. District Court, faces up to five years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000.

Several co-defendants are awaiting trial.

2 more marauding bears killed near Sierra Vista

SIERRA VISTA - Two more marauding black bears have been killed in canyons near Sierra Vista, bringing to four the number killed in the area in the past two weeks.

The latest bear death came Thursday, when it was shot by a Ramsey Canyon homeowner after it damaged the roof of a small SUV and the roof of a home, Arizona Game and Fish Department officials said.

A day earlier, a Forest Service employee shot and killed a bear that had ransacked his motor home in Carr Canyon. The employee reported that the bear charged him and some colleagues after they tried to drive it off by shooting at it and spraying it with a fire extinguisher.

Both shootings met Fish and Game guidelines for killing nuisance bears that pose a threat to humans.

Officials said that a reduced food supply is forcing the animals to look for other sources of food.

1,100 In Naples Victims Of Medicare Fraud (NAPNEWS)

Naples (FL) Daily News, September 13, 2006

Federal charges say pair stole Cleveland Clinic patient records

A Naples man and his cousin who worked at Cleveland Clinic in Weston were indicted Friday on charges they stole personal information of more than 1,100 patients from the former Cleveland Clinic in Naples, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami.

Cleveland Clinic officials on Friday sent letters to the potentially affected Naples patients alerting them to the theft and to provide them with resources to help protect their demographic and financial information from risk, said Eileen Sheil, spokeswoman for Cleveland Clinic at its parent location in Cleveland, Ohio.

A toll-free number — 1-866-907-0675 — has been established for patients.

Fernando Ferrer Jr., 29, of Naples, registered as an owner of Advanced Medical Claims Inc. in Naples, and Isis Machado, 22, of Miami Lakes, were indicted on charges they stole patient information for fraudulent purposes. A current address for Advanced Medical Claims was not available Friday.

According to the indictment, Machado worked as a front desk coordinator at the Weston campus from May 23, 2005, to June 26, 2006, where she had authorized access to Cleveland Clinic's computers, which are integrated with the computers at the former Cleveland Clinic in Naples. She was told by Ferrer she had an "opportunity" to sell personal identification of patients and he would pay her for the information, according to the indictment.

Sometime during the course of Machado's employment at the Weston campus, she accessed computerized patient files and downloaded and printed information from more than 1,100 patients, including their names, dates of birth, Social Security numbers, Medicare numbers and home addresses, according to the indictment. All the data accessed were of Naples patients, Sheil said.

Machado then sold the information to Ferrer, who used the stolen information in connection with the submission of about $2.8 million in false claims to Medicare, according to the indictment.

The pair could face 30 years in prison and more than $1 million in fines if convicted as charged. The case is being handled by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami.

According to Sheil, of Cleveland Clinic, Machado was caught on June 26 for inappropriately accessing patient information and authorities immediately were notified. She had worked in the scheduling department.

"I believe it was another employee who noticed it and reported it to leadership (in Weston) and leadership turned around and contacted state and federal authorities," Sheil said. "We believe it was an isolated incident. This was one employee's action. There were not any other people involved."

The 83-bed hospital and outpatient medical center in Naples was sold to Naples-based Health Management Associates this past May 1 and a new computer system was installed, said John Merriwether, vice president of financial relations for HMA. The hospital was renamed Physicians Regional Medical Center.

"We put our own system in place," he said. "There was no access to the HMA system."

Sheil said the employee was caught on June 26 but had accessed the patient information before HMA took over the Naples hospital and clinic.

"Cleveland Clinic Florida promptly notified state and federal authorities of this problem and over the past two months, federal law enforcement officials have conducted an intensive and confidential investigation of this matter," Cleveland Clinic officials announced. "The Cleveland Clinic Florida has cooperated fully in this investigation and is also conducting an internal risk assessment to prevent such an event from happening again. ...Cleveland Clinic deeply regrets this incident as patients and visitors place their trust in our employees and staff."

Geoffrey Moebius, chief executive officer of Physicians Regional, said the theft was all of Cleveland Clinic data, not Physicians Regional data.

"At this time, we would like to assure our patients that protecting their privacy is of our highest concern, and this incident did not in any way compromise the current systems in place for Physicians Regional Medical Center and the physician practice, Medical Surgical Specialists," according to a statement from Physicians Regional.

Two Are Charged In Patients' ID Theft (MH)

By John Dorschner

The Miami Herald, September 13, 2006

Two charged for stealing patients' data

Federal officials struck a blow Friday at a key but often hidden link in most healthcare fraud -- the person who provides the personal data that phony providers need to bilk insurance companies.

In an afternoon press conference, U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta announced eight charges against Isis Machado of Miami Lakes, who spent a year as a front desk coordinator at Cleveland Clinic's office in Weston.

Machado, 22, was accused of downloading the computerized personal information of more than 1,100 patients and then selling the data to a cousin, Fernando Ferrer Jr., 29, of Naples, the owner of Advanced Medical Claims of Naples, which is alleged to have used the names to send in $2.8 million in phony claims to Medicare.

Many arrests by state and federal agents involve clinics and medical supply companies, but frequently the suppliers of the personal information are not known.

The Cleveland Clinic case was only the third nationwide in which persons have been charged criminally for violating federal healthcare privacy laws.

Many Medicare recipients discover their names and identity numbers have been used to bilk the federal insurance for the elderly, but never learn how their information was stolen.

"We all wonder," said Marielene McGregor, a Miami Springs senior whose name was used to cheat Medicare out of $10,000 in the name of clinics apparently unrelated to Machado or Ferrer. ``I'm very interested -- where the heck did they get the information? It's really scandalous."

Law enforcement officials say the identity thieves can be virtually anyone connected with the healthcare system -- including nurses, billing clerks, hospital janitors who take a peek at records late at night or ambulance attendants who transport a patient (and the patient's records).

Machado had access to Cleveland Clinic's computers as part of her receptionist duties from May 2005 through June. She and Ferrer were charged with conspiracy to commit computer fraud, conspiracy to commit identity theft, conspiracy to wrongfully disclose patients' healthcare information and aggravated identity theft.

The first three charges could lead to a prison sentence of up to 10 years and a $250,000 fine, but the toughest penalties could come from five counts of aggravated identity theft, each of which carries a mandatory two-year sentence in addition to other charges -- tough measures meant to make identity as punishable as serious drug smuggling.

"We expect healthcare employees to keep our personal information confidential and secure," said Jonathan I. Soloman, special agent in charge of the Miami office of the FBI. ``Criminals who commit healthcare fraud steal from all of us as U.S. taxpayers and, in the end, make medical care more expensive for all of us."

Cousins Face ID Theft And Fraud Charges For Stealing Medical Records In Florida (FLSUNSEN)

By Madeline Baro Diaz, Miami Bureau

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 13, 2006

Combining an "unwholesome criminal trilogy" of identity theft, medical privacy violations and health-care fraud, two cousins stole the personal information of more than 1,100 Cleveland Clinic patients and billed more than $2.8 million in Medicare charges, federal prosecutors said Friday.

Isis Machado, a coordinator at the Weston clinic, printed out information from electronic files that included Social Security numbers, dates of birth, addresses and other details about Medicare patients at the clinic's Naples location, prosecutors said.

She then sold the information to her cousin, Fernando Ferrer Jr., owner of Advanced Medical Claims in Naples, who let the information be used to file fraudulent Medicare claims, prosecutors said.

Both were indicted earlier this week in Fort Lauderdale on charges of conspiracy to commit computer fraud, conspiracy to commit identity theft and conspiracy to wrongfully disclose individually identifiable health information.

They are also charged with fraud in connection with computers and violations related to the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, or HIPAA, which forbids the unauthorized release of private patient information.

"Medical files have some of our most private information," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. "Each of us rightly trusts that our health-care providers will keep them confidential."

In June, another Weston employee alerted clinic officials to the scheme, which prosecutors say began sometime after Machado began working there in May 2005.

The officials contacted law enforcement, fired Machado and cooperated with the investigation, said Cleveland Clinic spokeswoman Eileen Sheil. Health Management Associates bought the Naples clinic in May, but the facility was still in a transition period in June when officials learned of the identity theft allegations.

"The Cleveland Clinic Florida ... is also conducting an internal risk assessment to prevent such an event from happening again," clinic officials stated Friday.

On Friday, the Cleveland Clinic sent letters to patients who might have been affected. It also set up a hotline, 1-866-907-0675, for patients with questions or concerns.

Machado, 22, and Ferrer, 29, had their initial appearances in federal court Friday and were released on bond, prosecutors said. If convicted, Machado and Ferrer could be sentenced to 10 years in prison and fined $250,000 on the most serious of the charges. They could not be reached for comment Friday.

The indictment of Machado and Ferrer is the first HIPAA prosecution in the Southern District of Florida and the third in the nation. Acosta said he expects more prosecutions under the act as more patients' records become available electronically.

Acosta said patients can help combat health-related identity theft by checking their health care statements carefully.

"Patients need to be very vigilant," he said. "If there are charges that should not appear, if there are charges that are fraudulent, then the patient needs to call Medicare or Medicaid or a health-care provider that is trusted to ensure that the billings are accurate and not the result of fraud."

Cousins Accused Of Medicare Fraud (LAKELED)

Lakeland Ledger, September 13, 2006

US Man Pleads Guilty To Copyright Theft (IDG)

By Grant Gross

IDG News Service, September 13, 2006

An Erie, Pennsylvania, man involved in a BitTorrent peer-to-peer network has pleaded guilty to copyright infringement and faces up to five years in prison and a US$250,000 fine, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) said.

Scott R. McCausland, 24, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit copyright infringement and one count of criminal copyright infringement in violation of the Family Entertainment Copyright Act, the DOJ announced Tuesday. He's scheduled to be sentenced Dec. 12 in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

McCausland was involved in a BitTorrent peer-to-peer (P-to-P) network previously known as Elite Torrents, the DOJ said. This guilty plea is part of the first U.S. criminal case focusing on a P-to-P network using the BitTorrent technology, the DOJ said.

McCausland's conviction is the third in a series of convictions arising from Operation D-Elite, a federal crackdown against the first providers of pirated works to the Elite Torrents network. At its prime, the Elite Torrents network attracted more than 133,000 members and allowed the illegal distribution of more than 2 million copies of movies, software, music and games, the DOJ said.

U.S. federal agents shut down the Elite Torrents network on May 25, 2005, seizing its main server and replacing its log-in Web page with the notice: "This site has been permanently shut down by the FBI and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement." Within the first week, the message was viewed more than a half a million times.

The Elite Torrents P-to-P network offered a virtually unlimited content selection, including illegal copies of copyright works before their availability in retail stores or movie theaters, the DOJ said. For example, the network made available the final entry in the Star Wars series, "Episode III: Revenge of the Sith," more than six hours before it was first shown in theaters. In the next 24 hours, it was downloaded from the Elite Torrents network more than 10,000 times, the DOJ said.

Street Sweep Scoops Up 18th St. Gang (LAT)

By Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

Federal prosecutors indicted 18 members of the 18th Street gang, including one imprisoned leader of the Mexican Mafia, on racketeering, conspiracy and narcotics charges for a scheme where they allegedly would sell streets in the Wilshire, Koreatown and Pico Union areas to drug dealers for weekly and monthly fees.

The criminal organization, prosecutors allege, was run by Ruben "Night Owl" Castro, a Mexican Mafia boss and leader of the 18th Street gang, from his federal prison cell with the help of his girlfriend. In 1997, Castro was convicted in the first federal Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) case against a gang.

In a sweep across Southern California this morning, federal and local law enforcement personnel arrested 10 members of two powerful cliques within the 18th Street gang known as the Hoover Locos and the Shatto Park Locos. Prosecutors allege that the 18th Street cliques in those areas answered to Castro and its shot callers collected so-called "tax" or "rent" from drug dealers for the right to sell narcotics on a street with a guarantee of protection from the 18th Street gang enforcers.

"It is a form of old-fashioned organized crime. Drug dealers would buy a street, say a section of Alvarado from 3rd to 4th street," said Bruce Riordan, assistant U.S. attorney.

Castro was housed in a Colorado federal prison during the time he allegedly oversaw the organization dubbed the "Ruben Castro organization" by prosecutors. Authorities admitted that even one of the toughest prison systems did not stop Castro from operating his criminal business. "No matter what we do, some people intent on committing crimes will do it," said George S. Cardona, chief assistant U.S. attorney.

In a 71-page indicted unsealed today, prosecutors allege that the gang operated a criminal enterprise with Castro through his girlfriend Jesusita Ramirez, 62, giving orders to so-called shot callers (gang leaders) who collected thousands of dollars weekly from drug dealers. Failure to pay the gang cliques resulted in fines, hiked rates and ultimately acts of violence, prosecutors alleged.

The leaders of the cliques often lived in the suburbs, such as Ontario, El Monte and Temple City, rather than the streets they plied their criminal enterprise, prosecutors said.

Castro's girlfriend is one of four suspects who remain at large. She is charged with participating in a RICO conspiracy and two narcotics trafficking conspiracies. Her position, Riordan said, reflected a growing phenomenon in the Mexican Mafia with women for the first time moving into positions of decision making.

"The respect grows to a level of authority they participate in more than passing messages," he said.

The 10 arrestees included: Mervin Nelson Sanchez, "Chivo," 35, of Ontario, alleged to be a Shatto Place gangster who oversaw the gang's business operations. Araceli Bravo, 33, known as Traviesa," an alleged gang leader for the Hoover clique who ran its operations.

The others arrested were: Michael Pineda, 28, of North Hollywood; Jose Juan Alvarez, 29, of Los Angeles; Efrain Ruiz Torres, 34, of Temple City; Jose Morales Perez, 26, of Los Angeles; Melida Flores, 48 of Palmdale; Juan Manuel Montes, 38, of El Monte; Marlon David Penate, 29, of Los Angeles; and Jorge Sanchez Monroy, 33, of Los Angeles.

Three other men in addition to Castro are imprisoned on prior charges: Elvin Ambrocio, 36, and Ronaldo Cruz, 34, are both serving sentences for illegally reentering the country after being deported as felony illegal immigrants while Luis Castro, 42, is in state prison after being convicted of receiving stolen property.

Ruben Castro, Ramirez, Sanchez Ambrocio, Bravo, Pineda, Cruz, Alvarez, Chavez, Torres and Perez face life without parole if convicted on the racketeering charges.

Missouri: Judge Voids Execution Procedure (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

A judge ruled that the state's newest protocol for execution by lethal injection is an improvement, but still falls short of providing constitutional protections. Ordering the state to revise its rules again, the judge, Fernando J. Gaitan Jr. of Federal District Court, said that a doctor who had long mixed the drugs used in executions should no longer "participate in any manner, at any level, in the State of Missouri's lethal injection process." The doctor, identified in court documents only as John Doe I, had acknowledged sometimes giving inmates smaller amounts of anesthesia than the state had said was its policy.

Smokers Seek $200 Billion From Tobacco Companies Over Low-Tar Cigarettes (LAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, The Associated Press

AP, September 13, 2006

Lawyers for smokers of light cigarettes have asked a federal judge to grant class action status to a lawsuit against major tobacco companies, allowing tens of millions of people nationwide to seek as much as $200 billion in damages.

In the lawsuit, filed in 2004, the smokers accused Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris USA Inc., R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., which is now part of Reynolds American Inc., based in Winston-Salem, N.C., and other defendants of deceiving them for more than 30 years by claiming low-tar cigarettes were less harmful than regular cigarettes. The manufacturers, they allege, knew the health risks were about the same.

U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein was scheduled to hear arguments Tuesday in Brooklyn.

As a class, light cigarette smokers would be entitled to between $120 billion and $200 billion in refunds for a deceptive product, plaintiffs attorney Michael D. Hausfeld said Tuesday.

"They paid for a cigarette that was supposed to pose less of a health risk," he said. "They got one that was as risky, if not more risky."

The tobacco companies "continue to believe that the class should not be certified," said R.J. Reynolds spokesman David Howard. "Class certification is not appropriate when you're talking about individual smokers and health claims."

Aside from the class action issue, the judge also has asked lawyers whether the recent findings of another federal judge should apply to the case.

A ruling in August by U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler in Washington, D.C., found that tobacco companies misled smokers by labeling cigarettes "low tar," "light," "ultra light" or "mild."

The defendants "distorted the truth about low tar and light cigarettes so as to discourage smokers from quitting" and to preserve revenue, Kessler wrote. "They suppressed research. They destroyed documents. They manipulated the use of nicotine so as to increase and perpetuate addiction."

Though Kessler's decision did not penalize the manufacturers financially, it still "affirmed the accuracy" of the accusations in the light cigarette case and "exposed the companies to a several billion-dollar claim," said Paul Gallagher, another plaintiffs attorney.

Court papers filed by tobacco company lawyers have argued that adopting Kessler's findings as fact and having a jury simply determine damages "would be fundamentally unfair." The Washington decision, the papers said, was inconsistent with other cases in which juries rejected the same allegations about light cigarettes.

Defense attorneys also argued that applying the earlier ruling "makes no sense" since "it certainly will be appealed."

The light cigarette case was one of several filed during the past decade in Brooklyn, some under civil provisions of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. All the Brooklyn tobacco cases have been assigned to Weinstein, whose has previously devised far-reaching settlements for asbestos and Agent Orange litigation.

Judge Adds Extra Prison Time In 19 Smuggling Deaths (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-A judge sentenced three people convicted in America's deadliest human smuggling attempt, exceeding the maximum recommended prison term in two of the cases.

U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore sent Emma Sapata Rodriguez to prison for 15 years Monday for her part in trying to smuggle more than 70 immigrants inside a stifling trailer in 2003. The truck trailer was abandoned about 100 miles (160 kilometers) southwest of Houston and nineteen of the immigrants died.

Rosa Sarrata Gonzalez, who was convicted partly by the testimony of her two sons, received the recommended maximum sentence of 12 years and seven months. She smuggled one person into the trailer.

Sapata and Sarrata were convicted along with Victor Sanchez Rodriguez of conspiracy to harbor and transport illegal immigrants. In addition to the conspiracy charge, the jury found Sarrata guilty of one count of harboring and Sapata guilty of eight counts of harboring and six counts of transporting. Sanchez was convicted of eight counts of harboring and nine counts of transporting.

Sapata's prison term exceeds federal sentencing guidelines by three years and seven months. Her husband, Sanchez, was sentenced Monday to 23 years and four months in prison. The sentence is three years and four months longer than the maximum recommended penalty.

His attorney said the sentences "makes no sense" and is appealing. The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that judges are not bound by federal sentencing guidelines.

Gilmore explained the extra prison time by citing the horrific nature of the crime.

The couple smuggled eight people into the trailer, three of whom died, including a 5-year-old boy and his father.

So far, seven people have been sentenced to prison in the case, including the couple's son, Victor Jesus Rodriguez, whom Gilmore sent to prison for 20 years and seven months in July.

The leader of the smuggling ring, Karla Patricia Chavez Joya, received a 17-year, five-month prison term in May.

They are among 14 people indicted for trying to smuggle more than 70 immigrants inside a stifling trailer. During the trials, survivors testified that they screamed and clawed at the trailer's walls as the temperatures sweltered.

The second trial of the truck driver, Tyrone Williams, is scheduled to begin next month. A jury could not agree on a verdict last year. Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty.

'Justice Can't Just Forget' Long-ago Racial Killings (AJC)

By Bob Kemper, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 13, 2006

The letter landed on Chip Burrus' desk about 18 months ago.

DOJ_NMG_0062187

Two black couples, George and Mae Dorsey and Roger and Dorothy Malcom, had been brutally killed by a white mob in Georgia, it said. And the details astonished the FBI's assistant director, even 60 years after the crime was committed.

"I'd never heard of this [case] before, and I kind of fancy myself a student of the South," said Burrus, who had just taken over as assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division when the letter arrived. "You sort of start asking yourself, 'How many more of these are out there?' "

After ordering all of the FBI's field offices to comb their files and revisit people and groups who may have information about unsolved slayings from the civil rights era, Burrus had his answer: There are at least 35 to 50 such cases across the country, predominantly in the South.

But can these cold cases from 40, 50 or 60 years ago be solved?

"We won't have the ability to bring closure to a lot of them, probably," Burrus said. But "you just can't forget. Justice can't just forget. Even though they're 50 years old, it still doesn't mean we shouldn't take a look at them and use whatever laws we can to try to address it."

Congress is weighing whether to create special cold-case units at the Justice Department and FBI that, with a $5 million annual budget, would focus exclusively on unsolved killings from the civil rights era. But Congress has come late to the movement. Federal and state authorities already are reopening those cold cases in Georgia, Mississippi, Florida, Alabama and elsewhere.

This new urgency over unsolved killings from one of America's most violent eras was ignited in part by a series of successful prosecutions of civil rights murder cases in recent years and the fear among victims' families and law enforcement agencies that suspects and witnesses, now in their 70s and 80s, may not live much longer.

Further fueling the movement to close cold cases is the growing clout of black elected officials in the South, the appearance of a new generation of Southern prosecutors eager to put that racially explosive era behind them and the need of aging witnesses and perpetrators to clear their consciences before they die, according to civil rights groups and police.

Nationwide, 29 civil rights era killings have been reinvestigated since 1989, resulting in 27 arrests and 21 convictions, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center, a nonprofit organization in Mongtomery, Ala., whose missions include monitoring hate groups and providing legal expertise in civil rights cases. Twenty-two of those cases were in the South.

The latest breakthrough was in Florida in August. After reopening the 1951 firebombing murders of Harry and Harriette Moore for the fourth time, state investigators found new evidence — a suspect's deathbed confession that had been lost from the investigative file — and charged four white men with the Christmas Day slayings. All four were dead by the time the case was closed.

In Alabama on Aug. 29, Dallas County prosecutor Michael Jackson — the state's first African-American district attorney — announced he was launching an investigation into the 1965 death of civil rights worker Jimmy Lee Jackson, who was shot by a state trooper. State investigators and the FBI are expected to assist.

James Bonard Fowler — the trooper who shot Jackson and publicly acknowledged his role for the first time in a 2005 interview in the magazine of the Christian social justice group Sojourners — said it was self-defense. Other witnesses dispute that.

"These are events that help the South remember and face itself. These are things that most white Southerners didn't want to believe about themselves," said Mark Potok of the Southern Poverty Law Center.

Susan Glisson, director of the Institute for Racial Reconciliation at the University of Mississippi, said there is a downside to reopening old national wounds.

"People justifiably are worried that raising issues that are painful or controversial could at times set things back," Glisson said. Still, she said, that shouldn't deter investigators and prosecutors from pursuing the cold cases.

"At least beginning to have an honest appraisal of the past, at least beginning to tell the truth, outweighs the pain that it causes," Glisson said.

The only Georgia case on the FBI's list is what is known as the Moore's Ford Bridge lynching — the slayings described in the letter that landed on Burrus' desk.

DOJ_NMG_0062188

In July 1946, the Malcoms and Dorseys, who were related, were taken to Moore's Ford Bridge along the banks of the Apalachee River in Walton County, lined up and shot hundreds of times.

Dozens of people may have seen or participated in the lynchings, but no one was arrested.

Authorities believe the lynching was in retaliation for a fight Roger Malcom had with Barney and Bob Hester, who were white, on the Hester farm 10 days before the murders. Barney Hester was stabbed during the melee and Roger Malcom went to jail screaming, "I ain't gonna get out of this! They gonna kill me."

Malcom was released from jail the day before the shootings.

Burrus declined to discuss the Moore's Ford investigation beyond saying, "We're kind of at a crucial point right now."

He said other Georgia cases could be examined: "I think there's going to be several down there we're going to be taking a second look at."

Bobby Howard of Social Circle has been the custodian of the story of the Moore's Ford case since 1968, when a local mortician, Dan Young, showed him pictures of the victims' bodies and gave him two lists — one of alleged white participants and one of blacks who reportedly knew about it.

Howard said he used to be wary of Georgia investigators and FBI agents interested in re-examining the killings after ignoring them for 60 years. But with the FBI's newly organized effort to close such cases, Howard said he believes a breakthrough in the Moore's Ford case may not be far off.

"I'm really excited about it right now. I've never felt this way about it before," he said. "With the stuff that's been happening I believe they really are serious."

In a series of trials since 1994 — a round of prosecutions writer David Halberstam once called "a lot of little Nurembergs" — authorities sent to prison men responsible for some of the most infamous murders from that era: the 1963 bombing of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Ala., that killed four young girls; the 1963 assassination of civil rights activist Medgar Evers, who was gunned down in front of his children; and the 1964 murders of three civil rights workers who disappeared near Philadelphia, Miss., while investigating the burning of a black church.

Several of those convicted while in their 70s, 80s and 90s have died in prison.

Most of the remaining unsolved cases involve victims known to few people beyond their families and communities, with the exception of the slaying of Emmett Till. The black teenager from Chicago was visiting relatives in Mississippi in 1955 when he was tortured and killed, supposedly for whistling at a white woman. The boy's mother held an open-casket funeral, and a widely reprinted photo of Till's disfigured face let the world see what was happening in the South.

In 1955, an all-white jury acquitted two white men, Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam, in the case. But they later confessed to the killing in a Look magazine interview. Both have since died. The case helped galvanize the civil rights movement.

Federal attorneys and the FBI announced in 2004 they would reopen the case. In March, they said they would not file charges because the five-year statute of limitations on federal civil rights violations had expired.

Even without the added pressure of a national spotlight like the Till case, police are finding that lesser-known cases can be problematic to revive, let alone solve. Memories have faded over the decades, and circumstances surrounding the old cases sometimes make it difficult for authorities to determine whether a murder even occurred, or whether there were civil rights violations that would allow the federal government to intervene.

Yet having so much time pass between the crimes and the new investigations does mean that once-terrified witnesses and relatives of suspects are increasingly willing to reveal what they know.

And that, said Mark Vukelich, head of the FBI's civil rights division, is a bigger asset to investigators than all of the new technologies they are applying to the cases.

"The thing that works to our advantage is the fact that attitudes change," Vukelich said. "I think it's a bigger ally than the forensic aspect."

9th Circuit Finds Racial Motives In Juror Dismissals (LAW)

By Matthew Hirsch, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 13, 2006

Almost 12 years after the fact, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals shot down a Humboldt County, Calif., prosecutor's decision to yank three American Indian jurors and one Asian juror from an infamous murder trial, finding all were singled out on the basis of race.

The court, in a narrow 6-5 majority ruling, swept aside a series of earlier decisions in state and federal courts that upheld the jurors' exclusion in the trial of Richard Kesser. In 1995, Kesser was convicted and sentenced to life without parole for hiring a hit man to kill his ex-wife.

Though the prosecutor's handling of jury selection had been unsuccessfully appealed up to the California Supreme Court, the 9th Circuit gave it a closer examination under the Batson and Wheeler standards. The lower courts had accepted the prosecutor's nonracial explanations, but the 9th Circuit judges said those excuses fell flat when compared to the full record of the jury selection process.

"The racial animus behind the prosecutor's strikes is clear," wrote Judge Jay Bybee, who authored the majority opinion in Kesser v. Cambra, 06 C.D.O.S. 8481 .

In his opinion, Bybee reprinted at length prosecutor Worth Dikeman Jr.'s notes, without citing Dikeman by name.

There, Dikeman described one juror as a "darker skinned" "[N]ative American female." Noting that the juror worked for a local tribe, Dikeman indicated he wanted to keep such people off the jury because "they are sometimes resistive of the criminal justice system generally and somewhat suspicious of the system."

Dikeman's notes also included race-neutral reasons for excluding the American Indian jurors. Among those was the prosecutor's observation that one juror appeared "somewhat unstable [and] fairly weak."

Upon earlier review, the 1st District Court of Appeal concluded that those reasons were not "sham excuses" and upheld the jurors' exclusion.

Bybee and the 9th Circuit majority disagreed. Dikeman's "ostensibly 'race-neutral' reasons show themselves to be only a veneer, a pleasing moss having no depth," Bybee wrote.

Bybee criticized the state appeal court for letting Dikeman's jury strikes stand. Not only did the court fail to review the record to find obvious contradictions in Dikeman's reasoning, it erred in finding any "sincere, permissible motives," Bybee said.

There were two concurring opinions, authored by Judges Kim Wardlaw and Marsha Berzon. The dissent, authored by Judge Pamela Rymer, said the state appellate court's ruling was not an unreasonable application of clearly established federal law.

Reached Monday afternoon, Dikeman said he was "very disappointed in the decision, even though I haven't read it."

Since Kesser's trial, Dikeman said, 19 judges have reviewed his decision to strike the four nonwhite potential jurors. Most controversial was his decision against Debra Ringels, the only one slated to be a member of the panel rather than an alternate.

"I know what I did, and I know what I did not do. And I did not get rid of that juror because she was Native American," Dikeman said of Ringels. "I got rid of her because I thought she would be a bad juror in that case."

Kesser's appellate attorney, William Weiner, said he was "very, very delighted" by the ruling, especially given the moderate-to-conservative group of judges picked to rule on his case.

"When I first got the panel, I was heartbroken to be honest," Weiner said.

An attorney general's spokesman said the state prosecutor has not decided on seeking a writ of certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court. If the 9th Circuit ruling stands, Kesser will get a new trial.

Lawsuit Challenges Use Of Federal Aid For Bible-Based Counseling (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

A group called Americans United for Separation of Church and State filed suit yesterday to block federal financing for an organization that provides marriage counseling based on the Bible.

The lawsuit is another challenge to the Bush administration's efforts to channel money for social services to religious organizations. While religious groups are not barred from getting public money, such financing can only be used for secular purposes, not "worship, religious instruction or proselytization," according to government guidelines.

Americans United, a watchdog group based in Washington, D.C., filed the lawsuit in Federal District Court in Tacoma, Wash., on behalf of 13 state residents. They object to federal funds being used to support the Northwest Marriage Institute, which states in its newsletter that it offers "Bible-based premarital and marriage counseling." The institute, in Vancouver, Wash., received $97,750 in federal grants in 2005 from the Department of Health and Human Services.

The lawsuit argued that the institute uses federal funds for religious purposes, including developing materials with religious content, buying equipment for use in religiously based programming and paying part of the salaries of employees who do Bible-based counseling.

"This program trains people in how to make their marriages conform to one narrow interpretation of faith," said the Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United, in a written statement. "The federal government has no business forcing the taxpayer to subsidize that."

A spokesman for the Health and Human Services Department declined to comment on the suit, saying that the agency generally does not comment on pending lawsuits.

Bob Whiddon Jr., director of the Northwest Marriage Institute, said he had not yet seen the lawsuit.

But he said that the grants were meant to strengthen his organization by paying for consultants to improve its business practices and to buy equipment, not for programs.

"The grants say that I'm allowed to do things that will allow me to increase the capacity of my organization to serve the community," Dr. Whiddon said in a telephone interview. "None of what we do with the money is for religious purposes."

The administration has failed to provide clear guidelines about what federal funds can be used for, said Robert W. Tuttle, a law professor at George Washington University who is an expert on religion-based initiatives.

The government instructs organizations broadly that they are prohibited from using funds for religious purposes. But, he said, it does not answer the seemingly small, yet sometimes critical, questions that could occur in daily practice.

For example, could software or an LCD projector bought with federal money be used for religious purposes? Or is it acceptable to give federal money to improve the management practices of an obviously religious organization like the Northwest Marriage Institute, when those changes would affect both its secular work and religious mission?

"The government studiously avoids clearing up these questions because it doesn't want to discourage people from applying and look hostile to faith groups," Professor Tuttle said. "I honestly don't think it would discourage people. Instead, it would give them a good sense of how to avoid being sued."

ANTITRUST:

Drug Maker Fires Chief Of 5 Years (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

The troubled five-year term of Peter R. Dolan as chief executive of the drug maker Bristol-Myers Squibb ended yesterday when the board dismissed him over the mishandling of a patent dispute involving the company's blockbuster drug, Plavix.

Mr. Dolan, 50, was replaced with an interim chief, James M. Cornelius, a Bristol-Myers director. Mr. Cornelius had recently served as the interim chief executive of the medical device maker Guidant and was a crucial player in its agreement to be acquired earlier this year by Boston Scientific.

Although the Bristol-Myers board said it would mount a search for a permanent chief executive, Mr. Cornelius's interim appointment increased speculation on Wall Street that the company might become an acquisition candidate.

In a conference call with reporters yesterday, the chairman of Bristol-Myers, James D. Robinson III, declined to speculate on a possible sale of the company. But he said the preservation of the Plavix franchise was the company's main objective. Bristol markets Plavix in a partnership with Sanofi-Aventis of France.

Plavix, used by millions of people to fight blood clots, is the company's best-selling drug, with sales in the United States of $3.5 billion last year. "I can tell you that our priority No. 1 is Plavix, Plavix, Plavix, and we intend to vigorously defend our patent rights," Mr. Robinson said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0062191

A trial is scheduled for next January over a patent challenge by Apotex, the Canadian generic drug maker with which Bristol-Myers had tried to reach an out-of-court settlement this year. Missteps in those negotiations led to Apotex's undermining Bristol-Myers's Plavix franchise by flooding the market with a cheaper generic version of the drug.

Although a judge subsequently ordered a stop to those shipments, the millions of dollars worth of the generic drug already on the market forced Bristol-Myers to lower its earnings forecast for this year by as much as 25 percent.

Accusations that Bristol-Myers tried to hide details of the negotiations from government antitrust reviewers resulted in a Justice Department investigation that included an F.B.I. search of Mr. Dolan's office in late July.

Mr. Dolan was not available for comment yesterday. Mr. Robinson said that the interim chief, Mr. Cornelius, was well suited to the task because of his extensive experience in health care companies. Besides his role at Guidant, he is a former chief financial officer for the drug maker Eli Lilly & Company, where he worked for 28 years.

Mr. Cornelius, 62, said he was happy to serve as interim chief, but would not be a candidate for the job on a permanent basis.

The board's removal of Mr. Dolan followed a meeting Monday night at the headquarters in Manhattan, convened by Mr. Robinson. With Mr. Dolan absent, a court-appointed overseer recommended that he be fired for his handling of the Plavix negotiations with Apotex.

Yesterday, the company declined to provide details about the objections raised by the overseer, Frederick B. Lacey, a former federal judge. But Bristol-Myers did say that there had been no finding by Mr. Lacey that the company or its employees had broken the law.

And it said that Mr. Lacey did not accuse the company of violating the terms of a deferred prosecution agreement it entered last year with the Justice Department in an unrelated accounting scandal.

Mr. Lacey, who declined yesterday to discuss the matter, is monitoring the company's behavior under the terms of that Justice Department agreement, which the company entered into in the hope of avoiding a criminal indictment. Under such agreements, companies are expected to be model corporate citizens in their dealings with regulators and their disclosures to investors. And court-authorized overseers like Mr. Lacey have broad powers to monitor the company's activities.

On Mr. Lacey's recommendation, the board also fired Richard K. Willard, a former chief of the Justice Department's civil division who was hired as chief counsel last October. Mr. Willard's role in the Plavix case is not publicly known. He could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Mr. Robinson said yesterday that the board had been reviewing the company's management for weeks, hinting that Mr. Lacey's recommendation merely hastened the departure of the chief executive.

"We gave a good deal of consideration over the past few weeks to what would be in the best interest of the company in terms of its leadership going forward and concluded that it was time for change," Mr. Robinson said.

Mr. Robinson said that Mr. Dolan was "not fired for cause" — meaning not for wrongdoing or for neglect of his duties. That means Mr. Dolan will probably be eligible for a severance package, the details of which Mr. Robinson said had not been worked out.

Shares of Bristol rose 93 cents, to $24.32 yesterday. But the shares are off nearly 60 percent since Mr. Dolan became chief executive in 2001.

Speculation among financial analysts turned to the question of who might succeed Mr. Dolan, as well as a possible acquisition of the company. At 50, Mr. Dolan had expected to remain in charge of the company for years and had not groomed a successor.

"My sense is that they're going to have to go outside," said Jami Rubin, a pharmaceutical analyst with Morgan Stanley. Ms. Rubin suggested that Christine Poon, the vice chairman for Johnson & Johnson, who spent 15 years at Bristol-Myers, would be a strong candidate for the job.

In a note to investors yesterday, Friedman, Billings, Ramsey said that Mr. Dolan's ouster increased the chances of a takeover of the company, which analysts said might fetch $35 a share. Friedman, Billings noted that Mr. Cornelius, the interim chief, acted as Guidant's chief during its purchase by Boston Scientific.

Friedman, Billings analysts said that the most likely suitors for Bristol-Myers would be Pfizer, AstraZeneca, GlaxoSmithKline or Novartis.

While declining to address takeover speculation, Mr. Robinson, the board chairman, did acknowledge that the effort to settle the patent dispute with Apotex had been a mistake.

Hoping to protect the Plavix franchise until shortly before the patent expires in 2011, Bristol-Myers had twice this year reached a tentative settlement that in part would have involved paying Apotex to wait on the sidelines.

As a way to bring Apotex back to the negotiating table after regulators rejected the first version of the agreement, Bristol-Myers made unusually generous concessions that would go into effect only if regulators again rejected the deal.

One was the agreement not to seek triple financial damages, as would be Bristol-Myers's and Sanofi's right, if Apotex started selling its drug but eventually lost the patent case in court. The other concession was to wait five days after Apotex started shipping its drug before seeking a court's injunction against those shipments.

"I think that in hindsight, maybe we shouldn't have negotiated in the first place,'' Mr. Robinson said, "because we were negotiating in good faith. I'm not sure that was reciprocated."

That was an apparent reference to the company's claims that it was misled by Bernard C. Sherman, the chief executive of Apotex. In court, a lawyer for Sanofi-Aventis and Bristol-Myers has argued that the accusations that started the Justice Department investigation were contrived by Mr. Sherman to scuttle the settlement deal — and to begin the concessions that enabled Apotex to start shipping the generic Plavix.

Mr. Sherman, in an e-mail message yesterday, called the accusation "nonsensical."

Bristol-Myers Ousts Its Chief At Monitor's Urging (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

NEW YORK, Sept. 12 -- Drugmaker Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. pushed out its chief executive, Peter R. Dolan, on Tuesday at the urging of a federal monitor who was looking into how top management dealt with generic competition for Plavix, its top-selling heart drug.

Bristol's board announced the departure of Dolan, its chief executive since 2001, and general counsel Richard K. Willard one day after the company's independent directors met with the monitor, Frederick B. Lacey, and Christopher J. Christie, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey.

The New York firm has been operating since last year under a deferred prosecution agreement with Christie that resolved an earlier, unrelated accounting scandal by requiring it to stay out of trouble for two years and allowing Lacey, a former judge, to call for management changes, as he did Monday night.

Bristol Chairman James D. Robinson III said in a conference call that the board unanimously agreed that Dolan had to go. Neither he, Lacey nor Christie would describe specifically what concerned Lacey enough to recommend Dolan's termination.

Although Bristol could have tried to negotiate to keep Dolan, the board chose not to because the Plavix situation and other "failures have caused a loss of confidence," Robinson said. "It was time for a change."

The board temporarily replaced Dolan with James M. Cornelius, a Bristol director and a former chief executive of medical-equipment manufacturer Guidant Corp., where he served in a similar capacity after a scandal there in 2004.

Dolan's ouster is one of the highest-profile management changes at a company operating under a deferred prosecution agreement. Prosecutors often seek new management as part of such settlements -- Bristol named an independent chairman as part of its initial deal -- but subsequent changes are far less common.

Christie's spokesman, Michael Drewniak, said that the U.S. attorney "was fully supportive of Judge Lacey's recommendations" for management change but noted that "there was no finding of a violation of the [agreement] or criminal wrongdoing."

The Plavix issue arose earlier this year after Bristol attempted to strike a deal with Apotex Inc. to keep its competing generic version of the blood-thinning drug off the market until 2011. State attorneys general rejected the deal as anti-competitive, and the Justice Department has opened an antitrust investigation separate from Christie's probe.

Apotex put its product on sale this summer, and it quickly captured 75 percent of the market; Bristol sued for patent infringement and won a preliminary injunction halting further production, but the judge declined to recall the generic medicine already on the market. The case is to be heard in January.

Robinson, Bristol's chairman, said the firm's outside counsel had assured the board Monday night that it had "no reason to believe there was anything unlawful done by anyone at Bristol-Myers Squibb" in connection with the Apotex agreement.

The Plavix dispute is not related to the accounting problems that first got Bristol in trouble. In that case, Bristol was accused of pushing an excess amount of its products on its distributors, a process known as "channel-stuffing." The firm paid $300 million in restitution and agreed to two years of monitoring by Lacey, who has attended board meetings and made quarterly reports to Christie.

Lacey declined via e-mail to comment on his work as monitor. His intervention at Bristol comes as deferred prosecution agreements are becoming far more common.

Once a tool aimed primarily at keeping individual offenders on the straight and narrow, these agreements are now being used to resolve corporate cases in which government investigators think they have found serious wrongdoing but worry that a criminal indictment could put a large public company out of business.

Last month, the brokerage arm of insurance giant Prudential Financial Inc. signed a deferred prosecution agreement to resolve allegations that brokers in its Boston office helped big investors evade rules against short-term trading of mutual funds. Computer Associates International Inc., now known as CA, entered into a similar deal after its top executives were accused of criminal accounting fraud.

"The law on the books is so wooden. Prosecutors had a choice between prosecuting [entire corporations] for the sins of their employees and companies getting off scot-free," said Fordham University law professor Daniel Richman. Deferred prosecutions "really have created a third choice," he said.

Legal analysts said the leadership change at Bristol shows that prosecutors are serious about keeping the pressure on companies that have engaged in wrongdoing. "I see it as encouraging that we have monitors who are doing what they are supposed to do, which is rolling heads," said James D. Cox, a law professor at Duke University.

Although some analysts raised concern that federal prosecutors were getting involved in corporate governance, Samuel W. Buell, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, pointed out that when corporations are convicted of crimes -- as opposed to entering into a deferred prosecution agreement -- probation and monitoring are almost always part of the resulting sentence.

Robinson said Bristol's board had not discussed a severance package for Dolan, whose departure he described as "involuntary."

Cornelius, a former Eli Lilly & Co. executive who helped Guidant through a regulatory inquiry into malfunctioning heart defillibrators and a bumpy merger with Boston Scientific Corp., was upbeat on the conference call with reporters. "Our financial strength here at Bristol-Myers Squibb is outstanding," he said. "The new product pipeline is one of the best in the future that I've ever seen."

The stock market greeted the leadership change with enthusiasm. Bristol-Myers shares, which have lost more than half their value during Dolan's five-year tenure, closed at $24.32, up 93 cents, or nearly 4 percent.

Bristol-Myers Chief Quits After Bungling Plavix Deal (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport And David Voreacos

Bloomberg, September 13, 2006

Sept. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. Chief Executive Officer Peter Dolan quit after bungling an agreement to keep a generic version of the drugmaker's top-selling heart pill Plavix off the market.

Dolan, 50, and General Counsel Richard Willard stepped down after a court-appointed monitor last night told the Bristol-Myers board they should be fired. The monitor, former U.S. Judge Frederick Lacey, was probing corporate governance issues related to a patent accord on Plavix, Bristol-Myers's biggest-selling product, the company said today in a statement.

James Cornelius, the former chairman and interim chief executive officer of the medical device maker Guidant Corp., was appointed to replace Dolan while the board searches for a successor. Dolan, who is staying on as an adviser, didn't have an obvious heir apparent within the company, analysts said.

``The board simply didn't have a choice," said Les Funtleyder, an analyst with Miller Tabak & Co. in New York, in an interview. ``It became obvious that his presence at Bristol was not constructive to the stock or the company, and it was actually more of a distraction than a help."

Shares of New York-based Bristol-Myers rose 59 cents, or 2.5 percent, to $23.98 at 1:03 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Since Dolan took over as CEO, Bristol-Myers's stock has lost 56 percent of its value.

``The positive response we see in the stock is related to the board listening" to shareholder requests for a change in the company's management, said Anthony Butler, an analyst with Lehman Brothers in New York, in an interview today.

Five-Year Run

Dolan's departure concludes a five-year run as CEO marked by missteps. U.S. prosecutors investigated payments Bristol-Myers made to wholesalers between 1999 and mid-2002 that encouraged drug distributors to buy more medicine than they could sell, a practice called channel stuffing.

To settle the probe, Bristol-Myers last year accepted a deferred prosecution agreement with Christopher Christie, U.S. attorney for New Jersey, giving Lacey the power to require that the company take ``any steps he believes are necessary" to comply with the accord. Under the settlement, Dolan gave up his position as chairman, and the company paid $300 million to resolve the matter.

Dolan in March made a deal with Canada's Apotex Inc. to delay generic competition for Plavix, a drug widely used to prevent heart attacks and strokes that generated $6.3 billion in revenue last year. The accord was rejected by U.S. state attorneys general, clearing the way for Apotex last month to sell cheaper copies of the product five years before the patent's expiration. Apotex claimed in court papers that part of the agreement was secret.

Christie Comments

Lacey and Christie ``made no finding that the company violated the deferred prosecution agreement," Christie said today in an interview. Lacey had been looking into corporate governance issues related to the Plavix agreement, he said, declining to elaborate.

Christie said he wouldn't discuss why Lacey recommended Dolan's firing, a conclusion that he said he supported. Under the deferred prosecution agreement, the board was required to follow Lacey's recommendations and could appeal only to Christie, giving him the final say.

The company also said that Lacey and Christie's inquiry ``did not involve any matters" subject to the Justice Department's antitrust investigation of the Plavix agreement. The Federal Bureau of Investigation raided Dolan's office July 26 searching for documents and e-mails that might show he deceived U.S. antitrust enforcers about the accord.

Bristol-Myers's settlement to avoid prosecution for channel stuffing included a promise that the company ``will at all times strive for openness and transparency in its public reporting and disclosures."

Plavix Situation `a Disaster'

``The last three months, this whole Plavix situation has just been a disaster, and it just reminds people of the troubles and the lack of leadership that were more in the forefront two or three years ago," said Patrick Kaser, portfolio manager at Brandywine Asset Management in Philadelphia, in an interview. ``The board probably is happy that someone actually gave them cover on this."

Willard will be replaced on an interim basis by Sandra Leung, vice president and corporate secretary, Bristol-Myers said. Leung will be advised by board member Louis J. Freeh, the former director of the FBI and a former U.S. judge, the company said.

Cornelius's ``extensive experience in the health-care arena will be critical in ensuring a smooth transition of leadership of this great company," said James D. Robinson, Bristol-Myers's chairman, who is the former chief executive officer of American Express Co., in a statement.

Robinson's Comment

``I also want to express my deep appreciation and respect for Peter for his unyielding commitment to our company's mission, values and purpose," Robinson said. He said Dolan executed ``a successful strategy that has put Bristol-Myers Squibb squarely on a path toward growth and leadership for the future."

Bristol-Myers and its marketing partner Sanofi-Aventis SA of Paris had sued Weston, Ontario-based Apotex, arguing that they have exclusive marketing rights to sell Plavix until a patent expires in 2011. Apotex received U.S. Food and Drug Administration approval earlier this to sell a generic version. Bristol-Myers and Sanofi made the deal delaying competition to settle the lawsuit and keep Apotex from selling its copies while the patent case was pending.

Lehman analyst Butler said Karen Katen, the former Pfizer Inc. vice chairman, and Christine Poon, a former president of pharmaceuticals at Bristol-Myers who is now a Johnson & Johnson vice chairman, may be in the running to succeed Dolan.

Bristol-Myers Fires CEO And Counsel (AP)

By Wallace Witkowski

AP, September 13, 2006

NEW YORK - Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. yesterday ousted Peter R. Dolan as chief executive officer at the urging of a federal monitor, who found that the drugmaker's patent deal with a generic competitor violated an agreement with prosecutors. In an apparent move to reassure investors, it also decided to maintain its substantial dividend.

Several analysts and investors had speculated whether the board would keep its 28-cent-a-share dividend given its recent lowered earnings forecast as sales of its best-selling drug, Plavix, tumbled because of earlier-than-expected competition from a cheaper generic pill.

"The board opted to hold onto the status quo to recognize the loyalty of investors," said Friedman Billings Ramsey analyst David Moskowitz, who had earlier speculated that the board might cut the dividend by as much as 25 percent to conserve cash. "The ridding of Dolan sends a strong message that the board was listening to investors."

Earlier in the day, Bristol-Myers ousted Dolan after five years as CEO and said its general counsel, Richard K. Willard, would leave the company.

Those moves came a day after a federal monitor recommended at a board meeting that the company fire both Dolan and Willard. Dolan has been CEO since 2001, and Willard was appointed general counsel in October.

The company named board member James M. Cornelius as interim CEO effectively immediately to replace Dolan.

Cornelius served as chairman of the board and interim CEO at medical-device maker Guidant Corp. from September 2004 through April 2006, after decades at drugmaker Eli Lilly & Co.

Sandra Leung, the company's corporate secretary, was named interim general counsel, and will be aided by former FBI Director Louis J. Freeh, a board member and former general counsel.

The board formed a special committee to fill the positions permanently.

The dividend is payable Nov. 1 to shareholders of record as of Oct. 6. The board also forecast a full-year dividend of $1.12 per share.

Bristol-Myers Squibb shares rose 93 cents, or 3.98 percent, to close at $24.32 on the New York Stock Exchange. Before yesterday's rally, the stock had lost 11 percent since hitting its 52-week high of $26.14 on July 25.

The company confirmed reports that Judge Frederick B. Lacey recommended the firings, and that Christopher J. Christie, U.S. attorney for New Jersey, concurred. Both Lacey and Christie attended a meeting of the board late Monday.

Lacey was appointed monitor of the company in June 2005 after Bristol-Myers settled federal charges for an accounting scandal that ended up costing the company $800 million. Under the agreement, charges would be dropped against the company if it met certain standards until 2007.

The apparent last straw was Dolan's and Willard's conduct stemming from a failed agreement between Sanofi-Aventis, Bristol-Myers' partner for the drug Plavix, and Canadian drugmaker Apotex Inc. to keep a lower-priced generic version of the best-selling blood thinner off the market.

The agreement soured when state attorneys general refused to sign off on it.

As a result, Apotex launched its generic version in early August, and quickly grabbed about 75 percent of new prescriptions. Plavix is the second-best-selling drug in the world, with annual sales of about $5.9 billion.

The Plavix agreement also fell under a federal criminal investigation, leading FBI agents to raid Bristol-Myers' offices, including Dolan's, in New York. In the meantime, a judge halted further sales of Apotex's generic version of Plavix but declined to order a recall, leading some to believe that there could be generic product on the market well into 2007.

Some Wall Street analysts had insisted the board cut its losses now and fire Dolan, believing that the Plavix agreement was not an isolated incident. Critics also point to the accounting scandal, expensive investments in drugs like ImClone Systems Inc.'s Erbitux cancer drug, and failed pipeline drugs like the blood-pressure medication Vanlev and diabetes treatment Pargluva.

Plavix deal undoes CEO Dolan

Yesterday's ouster of Peter R. Dolan as CEO of Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. was the culmination of a series of missteps, including the mishandling of its top-selling drug, a blood thinner called Plavix:

1998: Plavix is launched.

May 2001: Dolan is named CEO of the New York-based drug company.

June 15, 2005: Bristol-Myers agrees to pay $300 million to settle federal charges that it offered wholesalers incentives to stockpile products in a scheme called "channel stuffing." Two former executives are indicted for their role in the scandal. Under its deferred prosecution agreement, all charges would be dropped if the company met certain standards until 2007.

March 21, 2006: Bristol-Myers and Sanofi-Aventis, co-marketers of Plavix, agree to pay Apotex Inc. at least $40 million in a deal under which the Canadian generic drug company ends its challenge of the patents protecting Plavix. The drug generated global sales of $5.9 billion in 2005. The deal, which needs regulatory approvals, would prohibit Apotex from selling a generic version until 2011.

June 25: The companies announce they have modified the agreement in response to concerns raised by the Federal Trade Commission and various state attorneys general.

July 27: Bristol-Myers says

it is the subject of a criminal antitrust probe

over its proposed

settlement with Apotex.

July 28: State attorneys general refuse to grant antitrust clearance to the settlement. The Wall Street Journal reports that FBI agents raided Dolan's office July 26.

Aug. 8: Apotex launches its generic version.

Aug. 17: Bristol-Myers says

it has hired former federal prosecutor Mary Jo White to investigate what went wrong with the Apotex agreement. In a separate development, Apotex claims in court papers that it had a "side agreement" with Bristol-Myers and Sanofi-Aventis that involved delaying the sale of generic Plavix. Bristol-Myers says its ongoing internal investigation has found no evidence of unlawful conduct.

Aug. 31: Federal court in New York orders Apotex to halt sales of it's generic blood thinner.

Sept. 11: Former federal judge Frederick B. Lacey, who monitors the deferred prosecution agreement, recommends that the Bristol-Myers board terminate Dolan and Richard K. Willard, its general counsel.

Yesterday: Dolan and Willard quit. James M. Cornelius, former chairman of Guidant Corp., is named interim CEO.

Drug Giant Opens Door To Suitors After Firing Chief (NSL)

By GEORGE E. JORDAN, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), September 13, 2006

Bristol-Myers ousts Dolan, then suggests it will consider proposals

First they fired the CEO.

Then they said openly for the first time they would consider selling the company.

And if that happens to Bristol-Myers Squibb, another name in the pantheon of drug giants that dominated the New Jersey economy could disappear.

The board of the pharmaceutical giant -- with some 6,000 workers in New Brunswick and Princeton -- ended weeks of speculation yesterday and fired chief executive Peter Dolan.

Then, in a startling move for a company that likes to play things close to the vest, board chairman James Robinson suggested the company could go on the block.

"We will deal with any bona fide proposal that anyone wants to make in an orderly and professional manner," Robinson said in a conference call with reporters last night. Robinson declined to comment further on talk of a possible takeover.

Dolan's ouster sent shares of Bristol-Myers up nearly 4 percent and prompted widespread debate on Wall Street about whether and when the company would become a takeover target.

In recent years, Warner-Lambert and Pharmacia were gobbled up by Pfizer, and Aventis was taken over by the French company Sanofi, now known as Sanofi Aventis. All three were based in New Jersey.

Dolan, at 50 one of the youngest Fortune 500 CEOs, was fired for blunders that allowed a competitor to flood the market with generic copies of Bristol-Myers' biggest-selling drug.

The company's board also said it may take the extraordinary step of denying severance pay to Dolan, who had won praise for his drug-development efforts but stumbled badly during a five-year tenure that included a series of costly lawsuits, regulatory probes and criminal investigations.

"This was an involuntary departure," said Robinson, the former American Express chief executive who is now Bristol-Myers chairman.

He added: "We haven't dealt with" Dolan's severance, which under the terms of his contract could include more than $13 million in cash and other benefits.

In a move to calm shareholders, the board voted to hold steady the company's cherished annual dividend of $1.12 a share, which appeared in danger last week when Bristol-Myers forecast dramatically lower earnings due to a sharp drop in sales of Plavix, its popular heart medication.

Some Wall Street analysts said Bristol-Myers' latest predicament could increase the likelihood of a takeover by another big drugmaker. Several European pharmaceutical companies have long coveted Bristol's stable of cancer drugs and its product pipeline, with several biotechnology drugs under development.

Others industry analysts predicted the company's board would now dig in its heels, hire a well-respected chief executive and refocus the company on specialty treatments for cancer and HIV, much like a biotechnology company.

"I think this business is not broken," said Anthony Butler, a pharmaceutical analyst with Lehman Brothers. "I think it can and should continue to grow."

Based in New York, Bristol-Myers is one of New Jersey's largest employers, with some 6,000 workers at facilities around Princeton and New Brunswick.

Investors cheered the change in the executive suite, driving up the value of Bristol-Myers shares to $24.32, the highest level since July.

In announcing Dolan's immediate departure, the company named James Cornelius, a member of Bristol-Myers' board and former chairman of the medical device maker Guidant Corp., as interim chief executive pending a search for a permanent successor. As CEO of Guidant, Cornelius orchestrated its sale to Boston Scientific.

Dolan's ouster came a day after a federal monitor recommended his removal and the ouster of general counsel Richard Willard over their handling of negotiations with Apotex, a Canadian drugmaker that last month launched generic copies of Plavix. Earlier in the year, Bristol-Myers struck a deal to pay Apotex a reported $40 million to keep the copy off the market until its patent on Plavix expired in 2011, but the deal fell apart when the U.S. Justice Department opened an investigation into the companies' dealings.

The monitor, former U.S. Judge Frederick Lacey, had been appointed last year to oversee the company after Bristol-Myers admitted to wrongdoing in a $2 billion accounting scandal and agreed to pay $300 million to avoid criminal prosecution.

Bristol-Myers said yesterday Lacey is still probing corporate governance issues related to Bristol's accord with Apotex.

Robinson said: "In hindsight, maybe we shouldn't have negotiated in the first place, because we negotiated in good faith. A deal was cut. We thought as revised it stood a very good change to be approved by the authorities. It was not. Since then, we have gone about our business and fought very hard."

Lacey's position on Dolan and Willard was supported by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie, who led the probe into the accounting scandal and negotiated the "deferred prosecution" agreement with Bristol-Myers.

Under last year's agreement, Bristol-Myers pleaded guilty to securities fraud. It had been accused of encouraging drug distributors to buy more medicine than they could sell -- a practice called channel stuffing -- between 1999 and mid-2002 in order to mislead investors about its net earnings.

Under the deferred prosecution deal, Robinson said yesterday, Bristol-Myers' board had no choice but to fire Dolan and Willard because their ouster had the backing of the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Christie, who attended Lacey's briefing, could not be reached for comment.

His spokesman, Michael Drewniak, said news accounts incorrectly reported Bristol-Myers violated the terms of its deferred prosecution agreement, which requires quarterly reports from Lacey and regular meetings between prosecutors and Bristol-Myers executives.

"There was no finding of any violation," Drewniak said.

US Drugs Group Seen As Takeover Target After Chief Ousted (TIMES)

By James Doran, in New York

London Times, September 13, 2006

THE chief executive and senior lawyer of Bristol-Myers Squibb were ousted from the troubled drug-maker yesterday as speculation mounted that the $48 billion company could become the target of a bid.

Peter Dolan, the chief executive for five years, was forced to resign, after Frederick Lacey, a federal monitor put in place to make sure the drug company complied with legal orders made last year, pushed for his resignation.

Mr Lacey recommended to a special session of the company's board that it get rid of Mr Dolan and Richard Willard, Bristol- Myer's general counsel, because of their role in a scheme to keep cheap generic versions of one of the company's drugs off the market. US drug manufacturers must allow generic, or unbranded, versions of their products to be manufactured after a certain period. The practice is a boon for consumers, but can have a crippling effect on drug companies, which often rely on just one or two big-name drugs to drive profits growth.

Analysts were quick to pounce on the latest unsettling news from Bristol-Myers with claims that the company is more vulnerable than ever to a hostile takeover bid from one of its rivals. Industry sources said European pharmaceutical companies like Sanofi-Aventis, Schering-Plough and AstraZeneca could be interested.

Under Mr Dolan's five-year stewardship Bristol-Myers has lurched from crisis to crisis and the shares have lost almost 60 per cent of their value.

Last year the US Attorney in New Jersey forced the company to comply with a deferred prosecution agreement after an investigation into $2.5 billion worth of "channel stuffing" — a practice that involves overloading wholesalers with drugs to meet quarterly sales targets. The company also paid $300 million to settle the claims. In 2001, soon after Mr Dolan became chief executive, he was forced to relinquish the role of chairman when authorities began an accounting inquiry that led to Bristol-Myers spending more than $800 million to settle lawsuits and government inquiries.

He was also criticised for spending as much as $2 billion to buy Erbitux, a controversial colon cancer medication made by ImClone.

But his final error was to become embroiled in a convoluted deal with Apotex, a small Canadian drug maker that was set to make a generic version of Plavix — Bristol's leading blood- thinning drug. Mr Dolan offered to pay Apotex tens of millions of dollars to delay the start of its generic Plavix manufacturing plans. But the deal fell through and is now the subject of a federal criminal investigation for possible antitrust violations.

Bristol-Myers CEO And GC Resign In Midst Of Federal Probe (LAW)

By Martin C. Daks, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, September 13, 2006

Bristol-Myers Squibb's CEO Peter Dolan and General Counsel Richard Willard resigned Tuesday, spurred by the recommendations of a federal monitor, after the company came perilously close to violating a deferred-prosecution agreement entered last year.

Bristol-Myers director James Cornelius was appointed interim CEO of the New York-based pharmaceutical and health care products company, and Sandra Leung, vice president and corporate secretary, was named interim general counsel. Former FBI director Louis Freeh, now a Bristol-Myers director, was appointed as Leung's adviser.

Bristol-Myers has had to answer to monitor Frederick Lacey, a former federal judge, since last year when it signed a deferred-prosecution agreement with U.S. Attorney for New Jersey Christopher Christie in the face of a prosecution on conspiracy and securities-fraud charges. The company has extensive research facilities located in New Jersey.

The agreement was the outgrowth of a three-year investigation into a "channel stuffing" scheme by which the company, during 2000 and 2001, allegedly used financial inducements to get wholesale distributors to accept unnecessarily high levels of inventory shipments, thereby artificially pumping up quarterly sales results.

The June 2005 accord meant that Bristol-Meyers could avoid further federal litigation if it kept its nose clean. But under Dolan's and Willard's watch, the Department of Justice's antitrust division began probing the company's agreement to pay at least $40 million to a Canadian competitor, Apotex Inc., to delay putting its generic version of Bristol-Myers' blood thinner Plavix on the market.

Bristol-Myers spokesman Jeffrey Macdonald said he was unable to comment on the reasons behind the decision to remove Dolan and Willard.

In a prepared statement announcing the personnel changes, Bristol-Myers noted that the federal monitor and Christie did not find any violation of the deferred prosecution agreement.

The company further stated that outside counsel Debevoise & Plimpton, which is conducting an investigation relating to the Plavix transaction, found no evidence to conclude that Bristol-Meyers or any of its employees acted unlawfully.

But the question of possible impropriety appears to have led Lacey, the federal monitor, to recommend -- at a Sept. 11 Bristol-Meyers board meeting that Christie and outside counsel Debevoise & Plimpton attended -- that Dolan and Willard resign. And under a deferred-prosecution agreement, the monitor's recommendation generally carries the force of an order, say securities lawyers.

The company also said, in its prepared statement, that the board meeting had nothing to do with the ongoing Justice Department antitrust investigation.

Stock analysts had been clamoring for Dolan's ouster due to product-related missteps and the channel-stuffing investigation. Wall Street reacted favorably to the moves. Bristol-Myers shares were at $24.20 near the close of trading, up 85 cents for the day.

Mary Jo White of Debevoise & Plimpton and Kenneth Conboy of Latham & Watkins, each of New York City, are currently advising the Bristol-Myers board. White, the former U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, also advised the company on its deferred-prosecution agreement with the government. Conboy is a former federal judge in Manhattan.

Board Chairman James Robinson III will head a committee to search for a new CEO. Dolan has agreed to assist in the transition to the new leadership.

Willard worked in the Department of Justice from 1981 to 1988, at one time serving as assistant attorney general in charge of the civil division.

DOJ_NMG_0062200

As part of the deferred-prosecution agreement, Bristol-Myers agreed to pay $300 million into a shareholders compensation fund, in addition to $539 million it had already paid out to settle shareholder lawsuits filed in district court and elsewhere.

The company also agreed to endow a chair at Seton Hall University School of Law in Newark, N.J., focused on business ethics and corporate governance.

DFW Airport Enlists Help In Wright Amendment Fight (AP)

By David Koenig, AP Business Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

GRAPEVINE, Texas — Supporters of legislation to shrink Dallas Love Field and bar long flights there for eight more years have enlisted help in countering the charge that their proposal violates antitrust laws.

Four experts in antitrust law, including two former Federal Trade Commission members, wrote to congressional leaders last week to say the restrictions are part of a necessary compromise to end a decades-long fight over Love Field.

The proposed legislation, they said, "will be far better for airline competition and consumers than the regime that prevails today — and that will continue to prevail if the legislation does not pass."

The letter was released Tuesday by officials of Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport. It was signed by former FTC members Thomas B. Leary and Christine Varney, and two other private antitrust lawyers, Harry M. Reasoner of Vinson & Elkins LLP and Janet L. McDavid of Hogan & Hartson LLP.

Reasoner's law firm works for the city of Dallas and Southwest Airlines Co., and the other three work for a firm that represents Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport — all supporters of the legislation.

The letter was intended to blunt a letter written two weeks ago by nine university antitrust experts, who criticized the DFW bill pending in Congress, saying it could lead to higher fares and less service for travelers.

The criticism by the academics followed the leak of an unsigned memo from the Justice Department's antitrust division, which said the bill would violate antitrust laws. The department, however, has not taken an official position.

The bill was introduced by Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, and modeled on a deal cut by AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Southwest Airlines, DFW Airport and the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth. It would eventually repeal a 1979 law called the Wright Amendment.

Despite its powerful backers, the bill's fate is in doubt, partly because key lawmakers object to provisions designed to protect the deal from legal challenges.

Hutchison escorted Dallas Mayor Laura Miller on a lobbying tour of Capitol Hill offices Tuesday.

Critics complain that the bill would preserve restrictions on long flights at Love Field for eight more years and that Love Field would shrink from 32 gates to 20 gates, which could block other airlines from competing with incumbents American, Southwest and Continental Airlines Inc.

JetBlue Airways Corp., has said it would be interested in serving Love Field, near downtown Dallas, but not the more remote DFW Airport.

The Consumer Federation of America and Consumers Union called the DFW bill "anti-competitive and anti-consumer." The owners of six unused Love Field gates have financed studies designed to undercut the bill, claiming that continuing limits at the Dallas airport would hurt the city's economy.

Leary and Reasoner, the pro-deal lawyers, said critics of the DFW-American-Southwest bill were naive in holding out for immediate repeal of Love Field flight limits.

"It's unrealistic to compare the world under the compromise legislation with the world that would exist if the Wright Amendment were repealed outright because that repeal, as explained to me, is just not going to happen," Leary said.

Texans Working Overtime On Wright (DMN)

By Sudeep Reddy And Robert Dodge, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON – With time quickly ticking off a short calendar, Texas lawmakers worked into the evening Tuesday to address antitrust concerns and save their effort to lift the Wright amendment.

DMN file The legislation would implement a June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport, American Airlines Inc. and Southwest Airlines Co.

Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn, along with House members from Texas and Dallas Mayor Laura Miller, lobbied legislators across Capitol Hill throughout the day.

"We're all begging, pleading, cajoling – doing anything we can to address their concerns," Mr. Cornyn said.

The legislation to end flight restrictions at Dallas Love Field is scheduled to go before the House Judiciary Committee today. The meeting will give lawmakers on the panel a chance to amend the bill before the committee's authority runs out on Friday.

Officials from North Texas feared that the committee's chairman, Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., would try to strip provisions protecting the agreement from antitrust challenges.

"At one time, those were deal breakers," said Rep. Kenny Marchant, R-Coppell. "I don't know if they are now or not."

The legislation would implement a June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport, American Airlines Inc. and Southwest Airlines Co.

The deal would repeal the Wright law in 2014 and allow immediate one-stop flights anywhere in the U.S. through any of the nine states inside the Wright perimeter. It would also reduce the number of gates to 20 from 32 to compensate for an expected increase in noise and traffic.

The gate reduction has driven concerns about competition from key House and Senate committees.

The House Judiciary Committee planned to consider the Wright bill last week but ran out of time.

The five parties have agreed to remove the antitrust exemption and replace it with other protective language, but it's been unclear whether that would satisfy Mr. Sensenbrenner.

Lawmakers have several options if the committee does strip the antitrust protections from the legislation today. House members could try to reinstate the provisions on the House floor or let the bill die with the hope of a Senate version moving ahead.

Ms. Hutchison, Ms. Miller and other officials from North Texas pressed their case Tuesday evening with Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The message, Ms. Miller said, was that consumers would be better off under the deal.

"The reason we did this compromise was to promote competition, not to curtail competition," she said. "The sooner we can get the bill passed, the lower the airfares will be."

Ms. Miller met throughout the day with other supporters. Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., who co-sponsored the legislation, said existing law requiring a competition plan for the airport would address concerns that have been raised.

The mayor did not get meetings with two key detractors of the legislation – Mr. Sensenbrenner and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking member on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

But Mr. Specter said later that he and all the parties were trying to construct language to clear the bill without further hearings.

"We want to be cooperative," he said. "We just want to be sure that it does not impact the antitrust laws."

After the meeting, Ms. Miller and lawyers representing the parties huddled with Senate staffers outside Mr. Specter's office to devise new language that would get the legislation through.

The two Texas senators planned to meet today with Mr. Leahy, whose concerns have slowed the effort on the Senate side. Both said they were hopeful that others would see the merits of the compromise.

"It is taking a very anticompetitive situation and replacing it with a much more competitive situation," Ms. Hutchison said. "It isn't what you would write if you were starting from scratch, but we're not."

As the parties continued negotiations, lawyers traded fire over the antitrust issue.

Attorneys representing the parties to the June agreement fired off a letter to key lawmakers Tuesday, saying the deal strikes a balance between competition and environmental concerns.

"The antitrust objections to the proposed legislation ... ignore practical realities, including the very real concerns of congestion and air and noise pollution," the letter said.

They were responding to an Aug. 29 letter written by nine law professors that said the deal forecloses full competition and will cost North Texas consumers more in higher airfares.

In a conference call with reporters, the attorneys who wrote the latest letter said they agreed with the law professors "in the abstract" about competition but said other issues must be considered.

"These policy choices must also take into account environmental considerations, community concerns and previous decisions and commitments," they wrote.

The authors of the new letter were described as "respected antitrust experts" by D/FW. And while they have antitrust credentials, they also have clients with an interest in seeing the deal approved by Congress.

Several of the attorneys work at Hogan & Hartson, a law firm that represents D/FW. One of them, Thomas Leary, said he offered his opinion without knowing that D/FW was a client of the firm.

Also signing the letter was Harry Reasoner, an attorney at Vinson & Elkins, which represents the city of Dallas and Southwest.

FCC Chief Appears To Aim For AT&T-BellSouth Vote In Fall (MRKTWTCH)

By Siobhan Hughes

Market Watch, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin on Tuesday appeared to suggest that he is hoping to vote over the next month or so on whether to approve AT&T Inc.'s (T) purchase of BellSouth Corp. (BLS).

Federal regulators in late April commenced a review of the transaction, which was valued at $67 billion when it was announced. The FCC generally tries to approve transactions six months after beginning its review.

"We have an informal clock of 180 days that we try to act on, and I think that 180-day clock runs sometime this fall, the end of October," said Martin after testifying before the Senate Commerce Committee. "We always have a goal of trying to act within 180 days."

The Justice Department hasn't yet approved the merger. Traditionally, the FCC waits to act until the Justice Department had completed its own review. The FCC meets in two weeks and again on Oct. 12.

Martin still faces questions about whether he will be able to count on both Republican colleagues on the five-member commission. FCC Commissioner Robert McDowell on Tuesday reiterated he may be recused from voting, given that his former employer opposes the merger. McDowell would be a crucial swing vote because the two Democrats may favor imposing conditions that don't fit in with Martin's largely hands-off approach.

"No final determination has been made," McDowell told reporters after the Senate hearing. "We'll be recused until we have to make a final" decision, McDowell said. He said he hasn't been meeting with either AT&T or BellSouth representatives regarding their merger.

AT&T, the largest U.S. phone company, in March announced plans to buy BellSouth in a transaction that would give AT&T sole control of Cingular Wireless, the biggest U.S. wireless operator.

Microsoft Debates Vista Security With EU (SEAPI)

By Todd Bishop, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 13, 2006

Regulators warn of possible violations of antitrust laws

European regulators warned Tuesday that Microsoft's addition of security programs to Windows Vista may run afoul of antitrust laws and increase risks for consumers long term by endangering other companies that protect against online threats.

Microsoft called the programs important security features and said it hopes the European Commission doesn't require them to be removed from Windows Vista in Europe.

The back-and-forth comes less than a week after Microsoft said antitrust questions not yet answered by the commission could force the company to delay the European release of Windows Vista, the upcoming version of its biggest product.

"We want to launch Windows Vista in a fully lawful manner, and we want to avoid regulatory decisions that could increase security risks for European consumers," Erich Andersen, Microsoft associate general counsel said, in a statement from the company Tuesday.

Regulators want to make sure Microsoft doesn't use its dominant PC operating system to give its other programs unfair advantage over rival programs by using Windows as a distribution mechanism. Vista's built-in anti-spyware protections and Windows Security Center software are among the programs discussed in letters between Microsoft and the commission.

At a news briefing Tuesday in Brussels, Belgium, commission spokesman Jonathan Todd didn't identify the specific security programs that would cross the line.

He said the commission understands Microsoft's desire to improve the underlying security of Windows. Microsoft has been trying to reduce the programming bugs that have made the operating system vulnerable.

But Todd said Microsoft could hurt the existing market for PC security software by offering its own security products free inside Vista. A variety of companies sell anti-spyware, Internet firewalls and other programs to protect PCs from online threats.

"If Microsoft were to foreclose these markets by bundling its own security products into its own operating system, less diversity and innovation would ultimately harm consumers through reduced choice and higher security risks," he said in a webcast of the briefing.

Microsoft has included anti-spyware programs in Windows Vista but is selling anti-virus protection separately, as part of its Windows Live OneCare service.

Windows Security Center is the central program in Vista for monitoring the status of protections, such as firewall and anti-virus programs. Microsoft says it made changes in the program, in response to questions from the commission, to make sure it's neutral in the way it presents and works with security software from Microsoft and others.

Another potential antitrust sticking point is Microsoft's inclusion of its data-protecting BitLocker drive encryption technologies in two high-end Windows versions, known as Enterprise and Ultimate. That may complicate matters for existing vendors of encryption technologies.

But the fact that BitLocker isn't included in Windows Vista Business Edition could strengthen Microsoft's argument on that point, by leaving more of the market for other encryption technologies, said industry analyst Roger Kay, president of Endpoint Technologies Associates.

In most cases, the company appears to have "gone at least far enough and maybe bent over backward" to address the commission's concerns, Kay said.

But Microsoft's inclusion of new security capabilities in Windows Vista could put smaller security software companies out of business or force them to make adjustments, said Joe Wilcox, a Jupiter Research analyst.

"If you look at Microsoft's entrance into other markets, it's like an atom bomb going off," Wilcox said. "There are few companies that survive the fallout."

Security software company Symantec Corp., the company behind the Norton brand, has answered questions raised by the European Commission but hasn't lodged any complaints over Microsoft's inclusion of its own security programs in Windows Vista, said Chris Paden, a Symantec spokesman.

"We're not worried about it from an anti-competitive point of view right now, because we know we can outinnovate them, and we know we can outexecute them," Paden said of Microsoft.

Commission spokesman Todd reiterated Tuesday that the agency is willing to give Microsoft antitrust guidance. But he added that "it is not up to the commission to tell Microsoft definitively the precise form that Vista should take before it's put on the market in Europe."

Security is just one of the potential antitrust trouble spots in Windows Vista that Microsoft and the European Commission have been discussing. Microsoft says it wants to resolve the open antitrust questions prior to Windows Vista's release, scheduled for November for businesses and January for consumers.

Lawsuit Against Microsoft Set For Court (AP-YBIZ)

By David Pitt, Ap Business Writer

Iowa Buyers of Microsoft Products Alerted to Class-Action Rights

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- One of the last remaining consumer class-action antitrust lawsuits filed against Microsoft Corp. in a state court is set to go to trial in November, and the company's co-founder and chairman is on the witness list to testify.

That doesn't mean Bill Gates will end up in the witness chair in Polk County District Court defending his company's business plan, but it's a possibility.

The lawsuit against Microsoft has made its way to the Iowa Supreme Court three times and unlike those in most states, which have been either settled or dismissed, it is scheduled for trial on Nov. 13.

Attorneys expect the trial to last six months.

Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin said Tuesday her experts have estimated that individuals and businesses have been overcharged as much as $453 million for Microsoft products in the last 12 years because a lack of competition has inflated the cost of the company's products.

In Iowa, about 5.1 million licenses for Microsoft Windows have been issued, 1.8 million for Office, 446,373 for Word and about 21,349 for Excel.

The average consumer overcharge ranges from $10.50 for buyers of Word to $56.99 to those who purchased Excel, Conlin said.

Many customers may have purchased more than one version in 12 years, Conlin said, so they could be eligible for multiples of those amounts.

Conlin said class members include all those who bought the following in Iowa from May 18, 1994, through June 30, 2006: Microsoft Windows, MS-DOS, Word, Excel, or Office software, or a personal computer on which this software was already installed.

"Class members do not have to do anything to be included in the class and there is no cost to be a member of the class," Conlin said.

Customers in Microsoft's database have been notified by mail or e-mail that they are part of the class-action case, Conlin said.

Microsoft denies that consumers were injured and said that computer users have benefited from the company's efforts to improve its products.

"The merits of the case will be determined in a lengthy trial that will begin in November," Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis said Tuesday. "We're looking forward to being in Iowa and having the opportunity to address these claims and defend our business model of selling high quality software at fair and reasonable prices."

One of the reasons Iowa continues to fight Microsoft in court is that Conlin has refused to accept a settlement in which Microsoft would offer vouchers for computer products.

"I don't think Iowans want coupons," she said. "I think if they were charged too much money and that's what a jury decides, then they should get their money back, not a coupon."

The case claims Microsoft violated Iowa's antitrust laws and harmed customers by illegally overcharging for its software, by denying class members free choice in software products and the benefits of software innovation, and by making computers increasingly susceptible to security breaches.

Microsoft initially faced 206 class-action lawsuits across the United States. The company said 108 were consolidated in a federal antitrust case and 96 remained in state courts.

Most were dismissed or settled for vouchers.

Cases in Iowa and Mississippi are among a handful that remain.

District court officials sent a court-ordered notice to known class members in Iowa by mail and e-mail, a required step in class-action cases.

Anyone in the class may chose to exclude themselves from the case but must do so by mail or e-mail by Nov. 13, Conlin said.

MAN May Target Its Rival Scania With Takover Bid (WSJ)

By Jason Singer And Stephen Power

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

German truck maker MAN AG is considering a bid for Swedish rival Scania AB, a potential move to consolidate the European market for heavy commercial vehicles and diesel engines, according to people close to the matter.

Scania, of Sodertalje, Sweden, has a market value of about $9.6 billion. It isn't clear if Scania would be receptive to any approach, these people said. A MAN spokesman didn't return calls seeking comment. A Scania spokesman couldn't be reached for comment.

Munich-based MAN has been looking for acquisition targets after restructuring its business to focus on commercial vehicles, diesel engines, turbines for the energy industry, and services such as logistics, Chief Executive Hakan Samuelsson said in a recent interview. Mr. Samuelsson, a Swede, spent 23 years at Scania before joining MAN in 2000 to turn around the German company.

Scania operates with one of the global industry's highest profit margins. The high-quality vehicles Scania produces for premium prices have made it known as the Porsche of the truck business among people in the industry.

German car maker Volkswagen AG holds about 34% of Scania, and 29% is owned by Swedish holding company Investor AB and foundations run by the Wallenberg family. VW Chief Executive Bernd Pischetsrieder is chairman of Scania's board. A VW spokesman said there has been no agreement with MAN over a sale of VW's Scania stake.

Scania's shares were suspended from trading yesterday after a report in a Swedish newspaper said MAN was about to make a takeover bid. Scania's shares leapt 9.3% to 389.50 Swedish kronor ($53.32) before the trading halt. In the first half of this year, Scania reported net income of 2.83 billion kronor ($387.4 million) on revenue of 35.22 billion kronor.

Makers of trucks used to haul heavy cargo typically see their fortunes closely follow the swings in the global economy, and many have benefited from globalization. European goods such as appliances increasingly arrive at ports from Asian manufacturers and are trucked to wholesalers and retailers across the Continent.

MAN reported a 37% increase in operating profit in 2005 to €765 million ($971.7 million) from €557 million a year earlier, with sales rising 5% to €14.7 billion.

Environmentalists, GOP At Odds Over Hunting On Calif. Island (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

A House GOP bid to continue big-game hunting in a national park on a California island is angering environmentalists and parks officials, who say preserving the nonnative deer and elk herds for hunters will further damage the delicate habitat.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) is seeking to maintain the hunting preserve as part of a defense authorization bill, arguing that disabled and paralyzed veterans should be able to hunt there. That would overturn a legal agreement, signed by the National Park Service eight years ago, to eliminate deer and elk from Santa Rosa Island by 2011.

Hunter, who came up with the idea while driving down the California coast with a group of Iraq veterans, said it could "provide wonderful outdoor activities for those American veterans who have protected our freedom." The House has adopted the language, but the Senate passed a resolution opposing it. Lawmakers must reconcile if they hope to pass the defense bill before adjourning for the election.

The dispute over Santa Rosa, part of the Channel Islands chain, reflects the obstacles to restoring native ecosystems.

Game animals that ranchers introduced to the 54,000-acre island more than a century ago, along with cattle and pigs, have consumed local plants and encroached on native animals. The deer and elk have attracted golden eagles, which in turn prey on the endangered island foxes. Parks officials are now trying to save the foxes, whose population has dwindled from several thousand to a few hundred, along with eight threatened or endangered plant species.

When federal officials bought the islands in 1986 for $29.5 million from the last private landowners, Vail & Vickers Ltd., they banished the cattle and pigs but allowed the former owners to conduct regular hunts in an effort to gradually rid Santa Rosa of the deer and elk.

As a result, Santa Rosa is mostly closed to the public more than four months a year so a few dozen hunters can shoot deer and elk. Hunters pay the Vail family up to $17,000 each.

Hunter's measure would require the interior and defense secretaries to make hunting available to paralyzed and disabled veterans and block the herds' impending extermination. Hunter's spokesman, Joe Kasper, said the congressman hopes to allow veterans "to hunt on Santa Rosa at little or no cost." There are currently about 1,100 deer and elk on Santa Rosa, said Jim Youngson, a spokesman for Vail & Vickers.

Rep. Lois Capps (D-Calif.), who represents Santa Rosa, called the proposal "outrageous."

"This is not about veterans," she said. "It's about letting a private enterprise continue on a national park at a cost to the taxpayers."

In a recent letter to Capps, Hunter wrote that "hikers, bikers and others can enjoy their activities while disabled veterans hunt." But Capps said the provision amounts to "kicking the public out of public land."

House and Senate negotiators are set to begin negotiations over the defense bill this week.

Paralyzed Veterans of America also opposes the measure. In late July, its chief lobbyist, Douglas K. Vollmer, wrote to Congress highlighting several obstacles to Hunter's proposal, including the cost of hunting and the logistics of getting to and from the island.

"While PVA applauds the efforts of Chairman Duncan Hunter to open hunting and outdoor venues for our members, other disabled veterans and current service members," Vollmer wrote, "we have come to the conclusion that the Santa Rosa Island initiative is not viable."

National Park Service Deputy Director Stephen P. Martin testified before the Senate in May that the deer and elk must be removed for "native plants and animals to flourish on Santa Rosa Island."

"There's no question when you introduce large herbivores to a place . . . they have an array of impacts," he said in an interview. "It's really important to move forward on the course we're on."

Youngson said the former owners have not taken a position on Hunter's proposal but would like the herds to remain.

"They're not advocating for commercial hunting to continue after 2011," Youngson said. "They don't want to see the animals, and this is their word, 'slaughtered.' In the ranching families' opinion, this is their home. They don't believe they damage the environment."

FBI Agent Accused Of Hiding Relationship With Female Felon (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, September 13, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) _ A former FBI agent pleaded guilty Tuesday to false-statement charges after he was accused of concealing his relationship with a Colombian illegal immigrant so she could stay in this country following a drug arrest.

The agent, Ronald LeBlanc, 45, of Dania Beach, Fla., entered the plea before U.S. District Judge Richard C. Casey in Manhattan, admitting he failed to disclose the nature of his relationship with the woman, with whom he was intimately involved.

LeBlanc was accused of making false claims, providing misleading information and concealing important facts to secure a visa for the woman, a cooperating witness.

At his plea, he also admitted making false statements regarding the substance of the information the woman provided to law enforcement.

LeBlanc faces a maximum of five years in prison when he is sentenced Dec. 20.

LeBlanc met the woman in the summer of 1999 while working on a squad investigating South American drug trafficking and money laundering organizations.

He registered her in November 1999 as a cooperating witness and acted as her supervising agent, an indictment said. The woman had pleaded guilty to a drug charge after she was arrested by FBI agents in Massachusetts in November 1998, when she and two others went to a warehouse to receive about 50 kilograms of cocaine.

The woman moved to New York in February 1999 after she was released from custody on the Massachusetts charges. She faced deportation because her cooperation was not enough to win her special consideration.

The woman moved to Miami in December 1999, and LeBlanc transferred to the Miami office in November 2000.

The indictment accused LeBlanc of trying to help the woman stay in the country by making false claims in 2001 about her cooperation in connection with Colombian nationals she knew who were suspects in three killings. One involved Donald Pagani Sr., a retired police detective who was fatally shot during an armed robbery of a meat company in the Bronx.

Federal prosecutors alleged that despite LeBlanc's claims the woman never assisted authorities with any proactive attempts to locate the fugitives in the killings before they were captured in Colombia in December 1999.

Panel Advises Cutting Salaries At Agency (AP)

By Kevin Freking, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

White House employees who oversee the war on drugs could be in for a huge pay cut next year.

Salaries and expenses at the Office of National Drug Control Policy would fall from $26.6 million to $11.5 million under the recommendation of the Senate Appropriations Committee. The director of the office, John Walters, earns $183,500. There are 111 full-time employees at the agency.

The committee's explanation: The reductions are designed to "more closely reflect actual performance."

The committee also called for independent studies and documents such as travel records, salaries and contracts. Its frustration is spelled out in an appropriations bill that funds transportation, housing and various federal agencies. The full Senate has yet to take up the bill, but the committee passed it in late July.

The legislation states that the committee's staff must make numerous inquiries before they can get information from the drug policy office. Plus, the office has prevented directors of various programs from meeting with the committee.

"This kind of unresponsiveness ... results in an unnecessary waste of time and energy," the bill states. "Numerous follow-up communications are required in almost every instance."

A spokeswoman for the White House office said Tuesday that it has streamlined communications to be more responsive to lawmakers.

"The good news here is the agency is accomplishing its mission. Teen drug use is down, and I think members of the Hill understand that and appreciate that," said Jennifer de Vallance, spokeswoman for the drug policy office. "Based on conversations our legislative affairs staff has had with staff members on the Hill, we're confident that the funds are going to be restored."

A spokesman for Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., who chairs the subcommittee with oversight over the drug office, did not indicate everything is now OK.

"Unfortunately, this has been a long-term problem," said spokesman Rob Ostrander. "The agency has a record of being unresponsive to committee staff. We hope that changes, because at the end of the day we need to ensure taxpayers' money is being spent wisely."

In recent months, disagreement between the administration and several lawmakers has flared concerning the High-Intensity Drug Trafficking Program, which gives additional money to communities with chronic illicit drug sales. That could be contributing to lawmakers' frustration with the agency.

The administration wants the $225 million program transferred to the Department of Justice. Many lawmakers oppose the transfer for fear the program would become less of a priority.

The committee recommended an increase in funding to $227 million. President Bush recommended a cut to $208 million: "This program is an important function of ONDCP and should not be transferred," appropriators said.

Besides cutting salaries, lawmakers said they would request funding for a study by the National Academy of Public Administration. They also ordered a Government Accountability Office study on the distribution of grants. Plus, they directed Walters to provide quarterly updates on travel expenditures, staffing levels and plans for future hirings.

Last week, Walters and other federal officials announced a drop in drug use among young teens in 2005, the third consecutive drop for that age group. "Twelve to 17 year olds are signaling a positive change in behavior that is strong, broad, continuing and affecting both males and females," he said at the National Press Club.

Lawmakers outside the appropriations committee have also complained about the agency's responsiveness. Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., took to the Senate floor last week and singled out Walters for criticism: "Under him, the office operates like an ivory tower rather than the command center for our national drug control policy," Biden said.

Federal Inmate Accused Of Directing L.A. Drug Sales (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo And Richard Winton

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

Inmate controlled sales in L.A. neighborhoods using hidden messages, U.S. prosecutors say.

Sending hidden messages in letters from his cell at Colorado's "Supermax" prison, a kingpin of the 18th Street gang controlled an elaborate drug operation on the streets west of downtown Los Angeles, federal prosecutors charged Tuesday.

The indictment of 18 members of the gang capped a four-year investigation by a task force of Los Angeles Police Department detectives and FBI agents that used wiretaps, undercover surveillance and inside sources.

They say its members directed the drug trade in some of the city's most crime-troubled neighborhoods, including the Westlake district, Pico-Union and part of Koreatown.

Authorities said they were surprised by the sophisticated hierarchy that they discovered when infiltrating the gang. They described it as being more akin to the Cosa Nostra than a traditional Latino street gang.

"This is very businesslike," Assistant U.S. Atty. Bruce Riordan said. "The discipline evolved over the years."

At the top of the chain of command: Ruben "Nite Owl" Castro, 46, a leader of the Mexican Mafia prison gang who authorities said controlled the two cliques of the 18th Street gang targeted in the indictment, the Shatto Park Locos and the Hoover Locos.

Castro allegedly ran the enterprise from the Administrative Maximum facility in Florence, Colo., where he is serving a life term after being convicted on similar gang racketeering charges in 1997.

With the highest level of security in the nation, the Supermax houses Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski, shoe-bomber Richard Reid and 9/11 plotter Zacarias Moussaoui.

Under constant surveillance, Castro had to use cryptic phone conversations and hidden messages to get his directives to his deputies on the streets, who are described in court papers as "shot callers."

At least two letters seized by the FBI were scrawled in thick pencil marks, which when erased revealed tiny messages written with a fine-point pen.

"We have a couple letters with significant messages to the shot callers on how to direct things," Riordan said.

Castro mostly relayed his messages through his girlfriend, Jesusita Ramirez, 62, who served as an intermediary between him and the street lieutenants, prosecutors said.

Letters from prisoners are supposed to be screened by prison officials. But Castro's hidden messages apparently were able to get out of the prison undetected, officials said.

From the same prison, members of the Aryan Nation gang were able to send orders for killings and other crimes using a complicated system of secret codes, according to testimony at a trial in Orange County earlier this year.

Running Castro's day-to-day operation outside the prison were the shot callers who collected regular "rent" from drug wholesalers and street peddlers, prosecutors allege.

One wholesaler allegedly said that he paid defendant Mervin Nelson Sanchez $1,500 a week to supply dealers in one area.

"Untimely payment of rent to Ruben Castro Organization by a narcotics dealer often resulted in increased rent," according to the indictment, followed by "threatened and actual acts of violence."

Shot callers decided whether the wholesalers and retailers were bringing in enough cash, Riordan said. They told the dealers which wholesalers they had to buy from, and how much per day they had to buy.

When unauthorized dealers moved in, the shot callers gathered weapons to get rid of them, the indictment alleges.

The shot callers didn't have free reign, though, he said; they answered to Castro's girlfriend, Ramirez, who is wanted but still at large.

On one occasion in 2004, according to court documents, she told a shot caller that Castro was angry because drug sales in one neighborhood were down. Castro, she said, believed that the reason was because the shot caller's assistant lived too far from the area, according to court documents.

Much of the estimated half-million dollars a year in proceeds was transferred straight to her, the indictment says, and a small amount went to Castro in prison. Another portion allegedly went to the Mexican Mafia to pay for protection for members of the two 18th Street gang cliques in prison.

Local and federal authorities have been trying for decades to bring down the 18th Street gang, which has about 8,000 members in Los Angeles County alone.

In 2000, federal prosecutors indicted 26 members of the 18th Street clique known as the Columbia Li'l Cycos, which also charged dealers the right to operate.

The group generated hundreds of thousands of dollars in profits, which it plowed into homes in Burbank and El Monte, a restaurant in South Gate and an auto business in Los Angeles. The case resulted in 26 convictions, Riordan said.

The Los Angeles city attorney's office has obtained three different injunctions against the gang's various cliques. Castro was arrested in 1997 along with other gang leaders in what officials said then was an effort to "cut off the head" of the gang.

But the 18th Street gang has seemed to bounce back each time, often with new recruits.

Based on experience, Riordan said, he expects the latest indictment to put the gang out of action for three years in those neighborhoods. But, he said, other members might eventually fight for control of the area.

In addition to Castro, 10 members and associates of the 18th Street gang were indicted on federal racketeering and conspiracy charges of using threats and violence to control the drug trade.

Both the 18th Street gang and its rival, the Mara Salvatrucha, were born among Central American immigrants in the troubled blocks of apartments west of downtown, and have since grown to tens of thousands of members here, in Central America and, increasingly, across the United States and Mexico.

The U.S. Southern Command, based in Miami, has said the gangs pose one of the biggest threats to security in Central America, and authorities are concerned that the acts of extreme violence seen there — beheadings, tortures, a massacre of 28 people on a bus in Honduras — could begin here.

Though the two gangs mostly are disorganized — with no known leadership — there are signs that they are evolving into something more organized. "In El Salvador, eight different cliques got together and performed a kidnapping extortion recently," the FBI's Robert B. Loosle said.

The indictment is the first time that federal authorities have alleged a conspiracy between two cliques.

Riordan said this type of organization and professionalism generally starts in Los Angeles and spreads.

"We are the cradle," he said.

Alleged Mobster Pulls $1M Bail In Weed Bust (NYDN)

By John Marzulli

New York Daily News, September 13, 2006

A reputed Bonanno crime soldier charged by the feds with supervising a marijuana distribution ring in Queens was ordered held yesterday on $1 million bail.

Bari Mascitti was busted outside a warehouse at 14-33 Astoria Blvd. where Drug Enforcement Administration agents later executed a search warrant and found 120 pounds of marijuana stashed in the building and in a nearby vehicle.

Also seized in the raid were scales, boxes, gloves and an air purifier.

DOJ_NMG_0062211

"We believe a lot more [marijuana] was in play here," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Ramos at a detention hearing for Mascitti in Brooklyn Federal Court yesterday.

Mascitti, 60, was carrying a key chain with a key to the warehouse when he was arrested on Sept. 5, Ramos added.

Although he's not charged with racketeering or membership in the crime family in the criminal complaint, Mascitti "is an active member," according to prosecutors. They said that he was recently observed driving to a casino in Atlantic City with reputed Bonanno soldier Paul Spina, according to court papers.

Mascitti, who is unemployed, was unaware he was under surveillance on Sept. 1 when DEA agents watched him and codefendant Michael Santoro shop at a Staples office supply store for airtight plastic storage bins to keep their marijuana fresh and potent, according to court papers.

Santoro, and co-defendants Craig Buffa, Jason Caccavo and Francisco Quintero were released on bail, but the feds wanted Mascitti held out of fear he might flee or attempt to threaten witnesses.

Magistrate Roanne Mann said she was concerned that Mascitti had violated the terms of supervised release in previous criminal cases, even though his elderly mother had posted her home for bail.

The judge approved a $1 million bond and house arrest, but insisted that Mascitti's three children co-sign the bond.

"If he violates a single condition of release, it will have serious financial consequences, and I want it to hurt significantly," Mann warned defense lawyer Richard Rehbock.

Mascitti faces five years if convicted.

Man Gets 12-year Sentence On Drug Charges (PAPN)

Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA), September 13, 2006

A Harrisburg man was sentenced to 12 years in federal prison on charges of distributing and possessing crack cocaine and nearly 2 kilograms of cocaine, Thomas A. Marino, U.S. Attorney for the Middle District, said Monday.

Percy Harris, 34, was under investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration since 1998. A search of his home found digital scales, a false-bottom can, $30,000 in cash, about 4 ounces of crack cocaine and the cocaine, Marino said.

Harris also must serve a 3-year term of supervised release. The case was prosecuted by assistant U.S. Attorney Christy H. Fawcett.

Washington, D.C. - Mom-and-pop meth labs are vanishing from the landscape, but there's been no reduction in the supply of the highly addictive illegal drug that's plagued Iowa, law enforcement experts said at a congressional hearing today.

Law officials told members of the Senate Finance Committee that 80 percent of meth now is manufactured in "super labs" in Mexico and smuggled over the border. Such labs can produce 10 pounds or more of meth in a day.

Large amounts of cash are funneled back to Mexico, through money laundering or in bulk via small banks or casinos. Estimates are that $3.2 billion to $7.2 billion in drug profits wind up in Mexico and Colombia annually.

"In my humble opinion, this is a weapon of mass destruction introduced by Mexican criminal organizations into this country," said Gregory Passic, director of the office of drug interdiction for customs and border protection at the Department of Homeland Security.

A June survey by the National Association of Counties found that meth was considered the No. 1 illegal drug problem for half of counties and it is rapidly moving east from the rural west and Midwest.

Sean McCullough, special agent in charge of the Iowa Division of Narcotics Enforcement, said that tough laws cracking down on meth ingredients approved by Iowa lawmakers have produced a 72 percent reduction in the number of local meth labs.

But McCullough said that even though meth seizures have declined, "Mexican drug trafficking organizations continue to dominate the state's illicit drug trade."

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Ia., the chairman of the committee, said constituents in his town meetings in Iowa often link the arrival of illegal immigrants in the state to the spreading use of meth.

Joseph Rannazzisi, deputy assistant administrator of the Office of Diversion Control at the Drug Enforcement Administration, said that wherever there is a transient population and migrant workers, it's possible for traffickers to blend more easily into the community.

However, he said both legal and illegal immigrants are used as drug couriers.

Grassley Says Meth Remains A Problem (RADIW)

By Matt Kelley

Radio Iowa, September 13, 2006

One of Iowa's chief anti-drug agents is testifying this morning (Tuesday) before a Congressional panel about the widening methamphetamine problem. Sean McCullough, Special Agent in Charge of the Iowa Division of Narcotics Enforcement, is appearing before the Senate Finance Committee.

Iowa Senator Chuck Grassley chairs that panel and says despite diligent efforts to thwart meth producers, the drug is still finding its way into the U.S. and Iowa. Grassley says "This summer, a survey taken by the National Association of Counties revealed that meth is considered the number-one illegal drug problem for nearly half of all the counties across America. In Iowa, 79 of our 99 counties said that meth is the number-one problem."

Grassley says while many "mom and pop" meth making operations have been shut down in Iowa, the drug is still arriving here via a drug pipeline from Mexico. Grassley says the purpose of the hearing is to gather testimony about the "changing geography of meth use and production." They'll look at how meth ingredients and drug money are moved, along with the extent and effectiveness of various law agencies on the federal, state and local level.

Grassley says Iowa led the way with its restrictions on meth precursors, forcing drug stores to take more precautions with cold and allergy medications containing pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient in meth. Numerous other states followed Iowa's example, as did the federal government, but Grassley says the benefits were temporary.

Grassley says "Now, of course, filling that void, sophisticated international cartels have come in, dominating meth trafficking." The Washington D.C. hearing was supposed to begin at nine A.M. Central time.

Officials Ask Congress For Meth Help (BILLGAZ)

By Noelle Straub

Billings Gazette, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congress must provide more funding and encourage better cooperation between law enforcement agencies to combat the methamphetamine problem in Montana, an officer and a tribal leader from the state testified at a Senate hearing Tuesday.

"We are working with decreased funding, limited resources, a growing epidemic and vicious drug-related crimes," said Lt. Dan Springer, commander of the Missouri River Drug Task Force, which is based in Bozeman.

"Methamphetamine hit our area like a freight train, and we have seen nothing but a steady increase in the supply and the demand over the past 10 years," he said.

Springer and Crow Tribal Chairman Carl Venne testified at a hearing of the Senate Finance Committee, on which Montana Sen. Max Baucus is the top-ranking Democrat.

Asked by Baucus what he needed to do a better job, Springer said, "Bodies. The only way work gets done is by people beating the street. And that takes money."

Funds from the federal Byrne Memorial Grant primarily have provided the money for the task force, but that funding has decreased by 62 percent over the past five years, he said. Even getting a third of that back would help add an investigator or two, he said.

That decrease means that the task force, which has nine full-time investigators and covers an area of 17,000 square miles, has been "just maintaining rather than conducting proactive, hard-hitting investigations," he said.

Springer asked for a more stable form of funding that does not keep agencies wondering each year how much money they will receive.

The price of meth in Montana is twice the price of cocaine, prompting an increase in robberies, assaults and other violent crimes by addicts, he said.

Springer also noted that there is no DEA agent within 160 miles of the task force, so that the group must work with those in Billings to take a case to the federal level. Criminals are much more likely to cooperate if they face federal charges, he said.

Venne testified that his reservation is the size of Rhode Island and some nights has only one officer on patrol.

"Meth use on our reservation is at epidemic stages," he said. "Not only on my reservation but all the reservations in Montana."

Venne, who also serves as an advisory council member of the Montana Meth Project, said the three different jurisdictions involved on the reservation - the local Bureau of Indian Affairs, FBI and the county - are not cooperating to battle meth.

"None of them are working together to fight this problem," he said.

"Why don't we fight this together with our resources? ... We need to work together by building bridges and not burning them between communities and between races."

Venne said the agencies should work out memorandums of agreement to be able to cooperate across boundaries.

The BIA, which handles all law enforcement on the reservation, has 14 officers and two investigators, "probably half of what they need," Venne said.

Baucus said that "mom and pop" meth production has decreased since a Montana law required that some drugs, like pseudoephedrine, be kept behind the counter at pharmacies. But he said that production of meth in Mexico has picked up.

"We've got to break the meth supply chain," Baucus said.

U.N. Official Targets Afghan Opium (AP)

By Constant Brand

AP, September 13, 2006

The United Nations urged NATO forces Tuesday to take military action to destroy the opium industry in southern Afghanistan, saying cultivation of the crop is out of control in the embattled Asian country.

U.N. anti-drug chief Antonio Maria Costa said opium production was being used to fund terrorist groups, and that eradicating it was crucial to establishing order in the south.

"In the turbulent southern region, counterinsurgency and counter-narcotics efforts must reinforce each other so as to stop the vicious circle of drugs funding terrorists and terrorists protecting drug traffickers," Costa said.

He urged NATO countries to give the alliance the mandate and added resources to expand its mission in southern Afghanistan and take action against production of the crop used to make heroin.

"I call on NATO forces to destroy the heroin labs, disband the open opium bazaars, attack the opium convoys and bring to justice the big traders," he said.

Last week, NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said it was not planning to play a leading role in the fight against narcotics in Afghanistan, but the alliance has suggested its troops could play a backup role if they had the time and resources to support Afghan forces and police in eradication of the crops.

Costa said his office had met with NATO to discuss the problem, and he met Tuesday with European Union External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner.

"Its clear the mission of NATO in Afghanistan has evolved into a full-fledged attempt to eradicate Taliban," he said, adding that NATO would find it "very difficult" to defeat Taliban and insurgents in the south unless they cracked down on drug traffickers.

The U.N.'s Office on Drugs and Crime released its annual survey of Afghanistan's poppy crop in Kabul earlier this month, which said opium cultivation rose 59 percent this year to produce a record 6,100 tons of opium — a massive 92 percent of total world supply.

The U.N. agency said only six of Afghanistan's 34 provinces are opium-free. It said some 2.9 million people were involved in growing opium, representing 12.6 percent of the total Afghan population, and that revenue from this year's harvest was predicted to hit more than $3 billion.

"The goal should be to double the number of opium-free provinces next year, and double them again in 2008. That is ambitious, but achievable," Costa said.

He called for increased development aid from international donors such as the European Union to get farmers off their dependency on growing opium. Costa said the aid should be made conditional on commitments by regional political leaders to fight opium cultivation and to curb corruption.

Costa also said the Afghan government should step up policing to bring to justice drug traffickers, seizing their assets such as houses and land. He said Afghan authorities also had to do more to stem the import of chemicals needed to make heroin, and to deter "the flow of volunteers, arms and money for the insurgency."

Costa said legalizing Afghanistan's opium trade was not a solution either. He said the market for opium-made morphine was not lucrative enough, adding that the price of illicit opium was five times that of medical opium.

"There is no magic formula to save Afghanistan," Costa said. "Instead we need to insist on full implementation of the Afghan national drug control strategy, which is based on development, security, law enforcement and good governance."

The EU acknowledged in June that its program to fight the narcotics trade in Afghanistan has not worked. The EU has pumped several hundred million dollars into fighting drugs in Afghanistan.

Ferrero-Waldner said the EU would continue to offer alternative crops for farmers to grow.

Afghanistan's counternarcotics minister, Habibullah Qaderi, said the government suggested farmers be offered big cash crops, such as dates or saffron, which bring them better income than wheat. He also called for international donors to step up efforts to build infrastructure to ensure better transport for farmed goods to market.

Opium production in Afghanistan — centered mainly in the two southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, where NATO troops are meeting stiff resistance from Taliban and other insurgents — has boomed since the fall of the Taliban in 2001. Last year, more than 4,500 tons of opium were harvested, about 90 percent of the world supply.

Afghanistan Will `Haunt' World If Taliban Flourish, Rice Says (BLOOM)

By Ed Johnson

Bloomberg, September 13, 2006

Sept. 13 (Bloomberg) -- Afghanistan will ``come back to haunt us" unless it becomes a stable democracy, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization appealed for reinforcements to fight the Taliban.

The international community will pay if it allows the country to become a failed state where Osama bin Laden's al-Qaeda network operates unhindered, Rice said in a speech yesterday, according to the U.S. State Department.

Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters have stepped up attacks in recent weeks as Afghan and international forces try to bring stability to the country's southern provinces. Resistance is stiffer than expected and NATO commanders will hold a conference today to seek about 2,000 extra personnel to reinforce the alliance's existing 19,000 soldiers.

``I am calling for alliance solidarity as some members are carrying more of a burden than others," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said yesterday in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp.

``The military advice is that we need extra forces," he said. ``These are political decisions and it is up to the politicians in the capitals to do what they promised to do."

Foreign ministers from the alliance's 26 member nations will meet in New York next week to discuss NATO's operation in Afghanistan, de Hoop Scheffer added.

Guerrilla War

NATO took over operations in Afghanistan's six southern provinces from the U.S.-led military coalition on July 31 and is trying to bring stability and aid reconstruction.

Rebels loyal to the Taliban regime, which was ousted by a U.S.-led military coalition in 2001, are waging a guerrilla war against the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, the U.S.-led coalition and Afghan forces.

ISAF says it has killed more than 500 Taliban rebels since it began an offensive in southern Kandahar province, codenamed ``Operation Medusa," on Sept. 2. Five Canadian soldiers and a member of the U.S. military embedded with Afghan forces have been killed in 11 days of fighting.

NATO's offensive against the Taliban is critical and the most ``challenging mission'' in its history, Rice said during a visit to Canada yesterday.

``It was the Taliban and their support for al-Qaeda that allowed al-Qaeda to flourish, to become the organization that it did, to plot and to plan and then to launch the attacks of September 11th,'' she said. ``An Afghanistan that does not complete its democratic evolution and become a stable terrorist- fighting state is going to come back to haunt us.''

Biggest Threat

The Taliban have overtaken al-Qaeda as the region's biggest threat, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said in an address to the European Parliament's foreign affairs committee yesterday.

``We have to check Talibanization,'' said Musharraf, who has deployed almost 90,000 soldiers on his country's border with Afghanistan to tackle insurgents.

Thirty-seven countries have contributed troops to the ISAF mission. Canada has deployed about 2,000 soldiers, most of them based in Kandahar. The U.K. has 4,900 soldiers in the country, 3,600 of them deployed in the south, mainly in Helmand and Kandahar, and will deploy an extra 900 soldiers later this year, the Defense Ministry said.

Only Latvia has answered NATO's call for reinforcements, offering to increase its presence in Afghanistan from 36 to 56 soldiers, the London-based Times newspaper reported yesterday, citing unidentified military officials in the Afghan capital, Kabul, and unidentified NATO officials.

Bumper Crop

Taliban operations in southern Afghanistan are being funded by money generated from a bumper crop of opium in the region, NATO and UN officials said.

A record 165,000 hectares (407,700 acres) of land were under opium cultivation in Afghanistan in 2006, a 59 percent gain over 2005, the UN Office on Drugs and Crime said earlier this month. In the southern province of Helmand, cultivation rose 162 percent.

NATO forces must ``destroy the heroin labs, disband the open opium bazaars, attack the opium convoys and bring to justice the big traders'' Antonio Maria Costa, the head of UNODC said at a news conference in Brussels yesterday, according to the UN.

The counter-insurgency and counter-narcotics efforts must reinforce each other ``so as to stop the vicious circle of drugs funding terrorists and terrorists protecting drug traffickers,'' Costa said.

De Hoop Scheffer rejected Costa's appeal. ``NATO does not have a leading role and does not seek to play one in that fight, important though it is,'' Agence France-Presse cited him as saying yesterday in Brussels.

Narcotics are going to be ``an albatross around our necks and the Achilles heel in the recovery of Afghanistan'' unless the problem is tackled, U.S. Marine General James Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander in Europe, said Sept. 7.

U.N. Pushes NATO To Curb Afghan Drug Trade (UPI)

United Press International, September 13, 2006

BRUSSELS, Sept. 12 (UPI) -- The head of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime is asking NATO to address surges in opium production in the southern regions of Afghanistan.

"I call on NATO forces to destroy the heroin labs, disband the open opium bazaars, attack the opium convoys and bring to justice the big traders," he said Tuesday at a news conference in Brussels. "I invite the coalition to give NATO the mandate and resources required."

Costa cited the 2006 UNODC Annual Opium Survey, released last week, reporting 407,700 acres of opium were under cultivation in Afghanistan, an increase of 59 percent from 2005. A record of about 6,725 tons, up 49 percent from last year, was harvested.

Most of the opium cultivated in Afghanistan is in the southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, the U.N. agency said. Of the country's 34 provinces, only six do not produce opium.

The survey also said the number of Afghans involved in the opium industry has increased by almost a third to 2.9 million, 12.6 percent of the total population.

Costa said such mass production of opium can lead to an increase of heroin overdoses.

"Experience shows that massive over-supply of heroin does not lead to lower prices but to higher-purity heroin doses," he said. "I fear that in 2007, once the new crop has reached retail markets, Afghan opium will kill more than the 100,000 people" who recently died.

In addition to an aggressive strategy from NATO, Costa requested increased aid to Afghanistan along with the help of district and provincial leaders in the commitment to curb the growing industry.

ATF Brought In To Assist In Tire Fire Investigation (SANDC)

San Diego Channel, News 10, September 13, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- Federal fire scene detectives joined Tuesday in local investigations into a blaze that raged through an East Village tire shop over the weekend, causing an estimated $3.5 million in damages.

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives will aid the San Diego Fire-Rescue Department in determining the cause of the conflagration in the 1000 block of Broadway, ATF information officer Susan Raichel said.

Sunday night's blaze at Tire Express forced the evacuation of about 200 people from neighboring Sara Frances Hometel, SDFRD officials said.

It took several dozen firefighters more than three hours to extinguish the main body of the inferno, which caused no serious injuries but left several people suffering from smoke inhalation.

The investigative assistance of the ATF's National Response Team will bring additional expertise and state-of-the-art equipment to the probe, Raichel said.

Four regional components, organized geographically to cover the United States, comprise the squad, which can respond within 24 hours to assist state and local law enforcement or fire service personnel in investigations.

A fleet of response vehicles located throughout the United States provides logistical support, Raichel said.

Man Charged With Bank Fraud, Impersonating Federal Marshal (AP)

AP, September 13, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) A Salt Lake City man who ran a business called U.S. Marshalls Salvage has been charged with impersonation of a U.S. marshal and bank fraud, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Andrew A. Costa, 41, has no connection to the U.S. Marshals Service. But he is accused of telling people he was a federal marshal and of handing out business cards with a five-point star similar to the U.S. marshal insignia, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Costa used the business cards and other documents containing the star insignia to create the impression he was associated with the federal agency, James Phelps, supervisory deputy of the Salt Lake City office of the Marshals Service, said in an affidavit filed with the complaint last week.

Costa is accused of carrying out the deception from about January to August and of depositing fraudulently obtained money in a credit union account. He is accused of accepting $22,000 for a truck he had repossessed, Phelps said in court documents.

Bank fraud carries a penalty of up to 30 years in prison and a $1 million fine.

He is also charged with illegal possession of marshal insignia and unlawful use of the marshal name.

Costa could not immediately be reached for comment. There is no telephone listing in his name in the Salt Lake City area.

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Says Immigrant Child Can Stay (FINDLAW/AP)

By Peter Prengaman, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A 10-year-old Salvadoran boy who was apprehended while trying to cross the U.S. border on his own to find his mother can stay in America at least until next summer, an immigration judge ruled Monday.

Judge William Martin's decision means Jonathan Martinez can live with his mother in Inglewood while the family prepares an asylum claim to keep him here, lawyer Julianne Donnelly said. That case is expected to be heard in August.

Donnelly said the family will argue that Jonathan does not have anyone to take care of him in El Salvador, making him susceptible to gangs and violence.

"He would be forced to fend for himself on the streets," Donnelly said.

Jonathan's case illustrates a growing problem with the federal program known as "temporary protective status" under which his mother is staying in the United States. Officials don't know what to do with the thousands of kids from Central America who come to the country illegally to join their parents.

The program provides legal residency to illegal immigrants from El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua, all countries that have suffered devastating natural disasters in recent years. The idea is that they can best serve their homelands by working here and sending money home.

But only immigrants in the United States when a program starts - for Salvadorans, after two major earthquakes in 2001 - are eligible. That means children who come later to join parents don't qualify, putting them in a sort of immigration limbo. Many end up being deported.

Jonathan's mother had left him with an aunt in 2000 to illegally immigrate to the U.S. Since 2001, she has had the temporary status.

When the aunt got sick in late 2004, Jonathan said he and a teenage cousin rode buses north for several weeks to reach the U.S. border. The two were separated, and Jonathan was nabbed in the desert trying to cross the Mexico-Arizona border. He has lived with his mother and 3-year-old half sister since then.

The family said the aunt who took care of him has since left El Salvador, his grandparents are too old to take him in and his father disappeared years ago.

"I'm happy because I get to stay," said Jonathan in a phone interview after Monday's hearing. "I didn't want to go back because I would be by myself."

Immigration Proposals (NYT)

By Rachel Swarns

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

House Republicans proposed a series of border security and immigration enforcement strategies, calling for more fencing along the Mexican border, more Border Patrol agents and counterfeit-proof Social Security cards for citizens and immigrants searching for work. The proposals are likely to form the basis for a legislative package House Republicans plan to announce this week. The initiatives are expected to pass the House this month, either attached to other legislation or as a stand-alone bill. House Democrats called the Republican effort political grandstanding in the weeks before the November midterm elections.

GOP Calls 'Elite' Out Of Touch On Immigration (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

House Republicans, returning from a month of field hearings on illegal immigration, yesterday warned of a gaping disconnect between American voters and many "elite" lawmakers.

"I have never seen such a disconnect between the American people and the elite," said Rep. Peter T. King, the New York Republican who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee and held two hearings last month.

Mr. King said securing the border this year is a cornerstone to national security and the war on terrorism. He called for more Border Patrol agents, more detention facilities for captured illegals and more unmanned aerial vehicles to patrol the border.

Testimony by Mr. King and others came during a "forum" yesterday before the Republican Policy Committee at which committee chairmen who held field hearings during the August recess could report their findings to Republican leadership.

Yesterday's packed meeting was yet another rebuke of the Senate immigration reform bill that would grant citizenship rights to about 10 million illegal aliens already in the country. Republicans attacked the Senate bill for granting Social Security benefits to illegals, hampering the ability of local police to detain illegals and requiring the U.S. government to consult with Mexican officials before building a border fence.

Also, House Republican leaders said yesterday's forum would set the stage for a new slate of border-security proposals they hope to pass the House before the November elections.

The Senate, like the majority of Democrats in the House, has refused to approve border-security legislation unless it includes proposals to grant citizenship rights to illegals and create a guest-worker program.

But House Republicans said yesterday, one day after marking the five-year anniversary of the September 11 attacks, that border security is too important to the war on terror to allow it to wait until agreement can be reached on the other components.

"There is a very simple reason why we need border security," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, the Michigan Republican who chairs the House intelligence committee. "We are a nation at war. We face a very dangerous enemy that is intent on attacking us again."

Rep. Harold Rogers, Kentucky Republican, said legislation approved this year has improved the situation on the border. He noted $21.2 billion in new spending for Border Patrol agents, detention beds and other "border security tools."

As a result, he said, 99 percent of aliens apprehended along the Southwest and northern borders are being detained for deportation, compared with only 34 percent a year ago. Also, agents rounded up 66,000 aliens along the Southwest border in July, 34,000 fewer than in July 2005.

"What you are doing is working and that's having an effect," Mr. Rogers said.

Still, said Rep. Adam H. Putnam, the Florida Republican who chairs the Republican Policy Committee, more needs to be done.

"Our pressing border-security issues before us, however, cannot be delayed," he told his committee yesterday.

House GOP Seeks Tough Border Security (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 12, 2006

Congress should take tough steps to stop the flow of illegal immigrants, House Republicans agreed Tuesday, while putting off the question of whether undocumented workers already in the country should be given a path toward legal status.

A Republicans-only forum on border security confirmed the House's rejection of the Senate approach of combining enhanced border security with creation of a guest worker program and a means for illegal immigrants to move toward eventual legal status.

"The state of our borders is a security crisis," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., at the meeting of GOP leaders and committee chairmen. The American people want, he said, "immediate, targeted legislation specifically designed to secure the border, protect our homeland and vigorously enforce our immigration laws."

The purpose of the forum was to share results from some 22 hearings Republicans held in 13 states during the August recess to press the importance of the border security issue. House Republicans initiated the hearings as it became apparent that compromise with the Senate on a more comprehensive bill would be unlikely to clear Congress this year.

Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, is charged with putting together legislation in the coming weeks. It was unclear whether the final product would be a stand-alone bill — which might face strong opposition in the Senate — or be attached to a spending bill that Congress must pass this year.

But House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said at a news conference Tuesday that "we will send President Bush a series of border initiatives this year."

He said that areas that must be addressed include more border patrol agents, additional fencing along the border, stricter enforcement of immigration laws and enhanced state and local law enforcement authority.

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., pushed for efforts to establish a smart, counterfeit-proof Social Security card.

DOJ_NMG_0062219

Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security, spoke of a $5.5 billion Homeland Security Department contract to be awarded this fall that would "essentially prevent penetration" within the next five years through a combination of electronic surveillance, unmanned aerial surveillance and patrols.

Bush, while not specifically endorsing the Senate bill, has long advocated changes in immigration policy to create a guest worker program and set up a procedure by which the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants in the country can work toward legal status and eventual citizenship.

Democrats dismissed the August hearings as episodes of preaching to the converted and said that, as long as there is a demand for foreign labor, the security-only approach won't work.

"They haven't even told us what they are planning to propose, which shows that this is not a serious legislative thing they are proposing," said Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., in a telephone news conference. "This is a political game."

Putnam, while responsible for putting together a border security package, represents an agricultural district in central Florida where there's interest in creating a guest worker program for farm workers.

He is scheduled to attend a rally Wednesday outside the Capitol being staged by farmers, restaurant owners and the Chamber of Commerce in favor of comprehensive immigration legislation.

"While there must be a comprehensive approach to immigration, securing our borders is the first, and most pressing, problem demanding our attention and action," he told the forum.

TAX:

How To Lower Your Tax Bill This Year There's Still Time In 2006 To Exploit Law Changes On 401(k)s, Donations And Energy Conservation (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

Even though 2007 arrives in just a few months, there's still plenty of time to consider tax-saving moves for 2006 -- especially in view of a spate of changes to the tax code.

Among the revisions effective this year are higher limits for 401(k) contributions, a new charitable-giving incentive and new breaks for energy-efficient vehicles and home improvements. These are in addition to perennial year-end techniques such as selling losing stocks. Many taxpayers can also take steps to blunt the impact of other, more onerous changes, such as the expanded "kiddie tax."

"With all the new laws, you've got many new ways to cut your taxes" and soften the blow from other new provisions, says Sidney Kess, a New York lawyer and accountant.

But year-end planning could be tricky for millions of people this year because of continued uncertainty about the fate of several popular tax breaks that expired at the end of last year. Chief among these is a provision allowing people who itemize their deductions to deduct either their state and local income taxes or sales taxes. Unless Congress revives this provision, taxpayers will be able to deduct only their state and local income taxes for 2006. The option to deduct sales taxes, instead of the income taxes, is especially important to people in states with no state income tax, such as Florida, Texas and Washington.

Many lawmakers in both parties want to restore the sales-tax provision. Even so, it's not clear when -- or even whether -- Congress will act because the subject has become ensnared in other, unrelated battles, such as those involving estate-tax cuts and raising the minimum wage.

Here is a look at several changes this year that could affect people's financial plans:

Retirement Savings: The maximum amount that workers under age 50 can contribute to their 401(k)s rose this year to $15,000, under a schedule outlined in a 2001 law. That's up from $14,000 last year. If you're 50 or older at any time this year, you can set aside a total of $20,000, up from $18,000 last year. "Put away as much as you can in your 401(k)," Mr. Kess says.

The maximum amount people under age 50 can put away in an IRA this year remains $4,000. But those 50 or older can put away $5,000, up from $4,500.

Separately, Congress this year approved eliminating the income limit to convert a traditional IRA to a Roth IRA, a change that will be effective starting in 2010. If your income is too high to make a Roth IRA contribution for 2006, "you might want to consider making a nondeductible contribution [to a regular IRA] for 2006 and future years -- looking forward to rolling the account into a Roth IRA starting in 2010," says Mark Luscombe, principal analyst at CCH, a Wolters Kluwer unit. With a Roth IRA, you can't deduct your contributions but the funds grow tax-free and withdrawals may be tax-free, depending on certain rules.

Charitable Giving: Last month, President Bush signed a law that allows taxpayers who are 70½ or older to give away as much as $100,000 a year from their IRA directly to qualified charities without triggering federal income taxes. Charities expect this change to generate billions of dollars of additional donations.

Here's how it works: In a typical case, a taxpayer can get an exclusion from gross income for otherwise taxable distributions of as much as $100,000 from an IRA -- as long as the money is paid directly to a qualified charity. This money counts toward taxpayers' required minimum distributions for that year. This new break is available only for distributions this year and in 2007.

Some people already have made plans to take advantage of this new break. David Handler, a lawyer at Kirkland & Ellis in Chicago, says a client is moving $100,000 from his IRA this year -- and will do so again next year. The money will go directly to public charities.

Separately, lawmakers changed some rules on deducting gifts of clothing and household items. For contributions made after Aug. 17 this year, you generally can't deduct the value of those items unless they're in "good" condition or better. Congress didn't try to define "good" but the Internal Revenue Service may come up with guidance.

However, there's an important exception: You can still deduct the value of an item that isn't in good condition or better if the amount claimed is more than $500 -- and if you include a qualified appraisal with your tax return.

These new rules apply to household items such as appliances, furniture and linens. They don't apply to items such as paintings and other objects of art or jewelry, which are covered under a different set of rules.

So what's a donor supposed to do? Consider taking photos of significant gifts, accountants say, and keep a detailed inventory of what you donate.

Kiddie Tax: Congress has increased the number of children whose income is subject to their parents' higher tax rate, by raising the age limit. If a child receives dividends, interest and other "unearned income," the first $850 typically is tax free and the next $850 is then taxed at the child's lower rate. Income above $1,700 is subject to the parents' top rate. Previously, the parental rate kicked in only for children under age 14, but now it affects kids under age 18.

Because of this change, upper-income investors should consider investments for their children that generate little or no current taxable income, such as U.S. savings bonds or index funds, Mr. Kess says. Consider avoiding high-yielding corporate bonds, since the interest currently would be taxable as ordinary income.

New Energy Tax Breaks: These include "credits of up to $500 lifetime for energy-efficient improvements to your home," says Mr. Luscombe of CCH. Other incentives apply to eligible solar water heaters and solar electricity equipment, and -- for many taxpayers -- the purchase of hybrid and other alternative-fuel vehicles.

Working Abroad: A new law sharply raises taxes on many Americans living and working abroad. While the impact will vary sharply from country to country, it will be especially painful for many Americans stationed in countries such as Singapore and Hong Kong that have high housing costs and low taxes. If you're affected, ask your employer for help in picking up the extra tab -- which in some cases can easily run to tens of thousands of dollars. * * *

BAUCUS URGES lawmakers to act quickly to extend expired tax breaks.

Montana Sen. Max Baucus, the Senate Finance Committee's ranking Democrat, emphasizes the importance of taking action soon to approve "the extenders," such as the sales-tax deduction.

Millions of taxpayers will be hit with higher taxes unless Congress extends this and other expired provisions. ***

MORE PEOPLE get hit with stiff penalties for delaying tactics or frivolity.

The U.S. Tax Court is authorized to impose a penalty of as much as $25,000 on someone for tactics designed mainly to delay, or for making arguments that clearly are "frivolous or groundless." Frivolity would include arguing that there is no law requiring Americans to pay income taxes, or that "wages" aren't really income, or that paying taxes somehow is voluntary, or that the 16th Amendment to the Constitution wasn't properly ratified. That amendment, enacted in 1913, authorized Congress to impose an income tax.

Although judges have been warning taxpayers for years, many people still haven't gotten the message that judges are losing patience with these and other similar claims.

In a recent case, a Tax Court judge imposed a $25,000 penalty on a California man. * * *

BRIEFS: Reminder: Friday is the deadline for third-quarter estimated tax payments. ... Service to people visiting IRS "taxpayer assistance centers" around the nation showed "improvement" during this year's filing season, says the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration (www.tigta.gov). For example, taxpayers received "fewer inaccurate answers" to tax-law questions than in the 2005 filing season.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Tells Group He Sees A 'Third Awakening' (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

President Bush said yesterday that he senses a "Third Awakening" of religious devotion in the United States that has coincided with the nation's struggle with international terrorists, a war that he depicted as "a confrontation between good and evil."

Bush told a group of conservative journalists that he notices more open expressions of faith among people he meets during his travels, and he suggested that might signal a broader revival similar to other religious movements in history. Bush noted that some of Abraham Lincoln's strongest supporters were religious people "who saw life in terms of good and evil" and who believed that slavery was evil. Many of his own supporters, he said, see the current conflict in similar terms.

"A lot of people in America see this as a confrontation between good and evil, including me," Bush said during a 1 1/2 -hour Oval Office conversation on cultural changes and a battle with terrorists that he sees lasting decades. "There was a stark change between the culture of the '50s and the '60s -- boom -- and I think there's change happening here," he added. "It seems to me that there's a Third Awakening."

The First Great Awakening refers to a wave of Christian fervor in the American colonies from about 1730 to 1760, while the Second Great Awakening is generally believed to have occurred from 1800 to 1830.

Some scholars and writers have debated for years whether a Third Awakening has been taking place, although some identify other awakenings in U.S. history. Bush aides, including Karl Rove, have read Robert William Fogel's "The Fourth Great Awakening and the Future of Egalitarianism."

Bush has been careful discussing the battle with terrorists in religious terms since he had to apologize for using the word "crusade" in 2001. He often stresses that the war is not against Islam but against those who corrupt it. In his comments yesterday, aides said Bush was not casting the war as a religious struggle but was describing American cultural changes in a time of war.

"He's drawing a parallel in terms of a resurgence, in dangerous times, of people going back to their religion," said one aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the session was not open to other journalists. "This is not 'God is on our side' or anything like that."

The White House did not release a transcript of Bush's remarks, but National Review posted highlights on its Web site. On another topic, Bush rejected sending more troops to the Afghanistan-Pakistan border areas to find Osama bin Laden. "One hundred thousand troops there in Pakistan is not the answer. It's someone saying 'Guess what' and then the kinetic action begins," he said, meaning an informer disclosing bin Laden's location.

House May Identify Members Who Earmark Money For Pork Projects (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062222

WASHINGTON - The Republican-led House of Representatives will vote this week on two measures that could help reveal who's behind billions of dollars in pork-barrel spending each year.

That could help Republicans appeal to fiscally conservative voters who are frustrated by Congress's runaway spending and threatening to stay home from the polls in November.

Taxpayer-watchdog groups praise the sentiment behind House Majority Leader John Boehner's decision to schedule these votes, but he's being squeezed between lawmakers who are reluctant to cede power and critics who say the legislation doesn't respond forcefully enough to a spate of congressional corruption scandals.

The first measure, approved by the Senate and slated for final House approval on Wednesday, would create a centralized, online search engine for government contracts, making it easier for the public to track who's receiving government dollars and how the money is being spent.

The second, a proposed change to House rules, would identify the lawmakers behind special-interest projects known as "earmarks."

Tens of thousands of earmarks are tucked anonymously into massive spending and tax bills each year. Citizens Against Government Waste identified 13,997 earmarks worth $27.3 billion in appropriations bills last year alone. Critics of pork-barrel politics say that attaching lawmakers' names to earmarks could curb abuses of the process, although lawmakers often trumpet the earmarks they win for projects when they think their constituents or contributors want them.

Boehner, R-Ohio, said Tuesday that the two measures are a start but don't eliminate the need for more comprehensive lobbying reform after the conviction of ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham, R-Calif., on bribery charges; the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal that's touched several members of Congress; and a corruption investigation into Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., who's accused of stashing a $90,000 in cash in a freezer.

"If you look at the members who've gotten themselves in trouble, it was over the illicit use of earmarks," Boehner said. "I just think that bringing transparency and accountability to this process is in everyone's best interests."

Some campaign-finance watchdogs consider these proposals a diversion, however.

Tom Schatz, the president of Citizens Against Government Waste, said of the House plans: "It's better than nothing. It should provide a lot more transparency. Whether it means they'll be more accountable and do less remains to be seen."

Lobbying reform legislation has stalled in negotiations between the House and Senate. Critics say neither chamber has gone far enough to cut down on lawmakers' financial relationships with lobbyists.

Details of the House earmark proposal were still changing Tuesday, but there appeared to be some loopholes, especially in identifying lawmakers behind projects in tax and authorization bills, as opposed to appropriations measures.

That drew fire from members of the House Appropriations Committee, who don't want the burden of disclosure to fall disproportionately on them. "We have strong support among our members as long as it applies across the board," said committee spokesman John Scofield.

House Democrats said they wanted to offer an amendment that also would prohibit earmarks which benefit lawmakers' families or lobbyists connected to their political action committees.

It also was unclear to what degree senators would have to disclose their earmarks.

Senators aren't bound by House rules, but once legislation with their earmarks in it reaches the House, then House rules might require their identification.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who with Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., sponsored the Senate's contract search-engine legislation, said of the House's plans, "I'm willing to take half a loaf if we can get something done that's good."

Earmark Showdown (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

Like drunks checking into rehab, House Republicans will take one final stab this week at reforming the "earmark" epidemic on Capitol Hill. So far this year more than 10,000 projects -- for baseball parks, bovine genetics, bicycle paths, beaver management grants and bridges to nowhere -- have been stashed into budget bills at a cost of nearly $30 billion. That ain't peanuts.

The proposed reform would require the disclosure of the Congressional sponsor of every earmark slipped into an appropriations bill. There would then be a three-day waiting period from the time these reports are issued until the House vote. Members could no longer vote for 1,000-page spending bills while claiming they didn't know about the fiscal mischief inside.

A related Senate bill by Tom Coburn (R., Okla.) would require that the dollar amounts and recipients of all grants and earmarked contracts be listed on a public data base. Voters could then determine how much money is given away each year to some 30,000 groups, ranging from Planned Parenthood to the California Raisin Board. This is called "transparency," which ought to be the least Congress can do for taxpayers. The Members can still request the earmarks, but they'd have to defend them in the sunlight -- which means running the risk of what Republican Jeff Flake of Arizona calls the public "shame factor."

One reason to suspect that these rules would deter the worst excesses is that Appropriators in both parties are groaning. They are insisting on loopholes that would exempt grants to state and local governments and hometown universities. They're also seeking an exemption for omnibus continuing resolution bills, which in some years contain a half-trillion dollars of spending crammed into one elephantine package. Unless these escape hatches are shut, earmark reform won't mean much.

A case in point is the HHS-Education spending bill, which so far contains 1,867 earmarks at a cost of just under $500 million. Members tell us the bill has caused a mini-rebellion because two of the three largest earmarkers are Democrat Nancy Pelosi, who walks away with $7.9 million worth of goodies, and David Obey, the ranking Democrat on Appropriations who receives $6.8 million for his Wisconsin district. This is the same Ms. Pelosi who earlier this session pledged to give up her pork to help balance the budget.

The House GOP leadership finally seems to comprehend the stakes in this pre-election budget fight. Majority Leader John Boehner calls the anti-earmarking bill "must-pass legislation," and has agreed to separate it from a bottled-up lobbying-reform bill. All that can block this from passing now are the spend-happy Republicans on Appropriations. If they succeed, they will have inflicted a far greater wound on their majority than the Democrats ever could.

House, Senate Divide Stalls Ethics Bill (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 12, 2006

Unable to agree on sweeping ethics legislation, the House this week will try to pass a narrower bill to shed light on pet projects that lawmakers tuck into spending and tax bills.

The measure on "earmarks," a rules change that would apply only to the House, is a small part of comprehensive lobbying and ethics legislation that the House and Senate both passed last spring in the wake of a spate of scandals involving lawmakers and lobbyists.

But the two chambers have been unable to find common ground, and prospects for legislation that was deemed a top priority when this session of Congress convened last January are not good.

But even the scaled-back earmarks measure, which would require disclosure of special projects inserted, often furtively, into larger bills, is facing opposition.

Republicans on the Appropriations Committee, which puts together annual spending bills, have objected to being singled out for earmark reform and demand that any new rule also apply to tax and authorization bills.

Republicans on the committee held up passage of the lobbying bill last May over the same issue.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said at a news conference Tuesday that he was working with the chairmen of the involved committees and "we're going to do it this week."

He acknowledged the problems: "Everyone has a different description of what an earmark is."

"If you look at the members who got themselves in trouble, it was over the illicit use of earmarks," Boehner added.

Earlier this year former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., was sentenced to more than eight years in prison after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes in return for steering government contracts to certain companies.

The House has also scheduled a Wednesday vote on a bill, approved by the Senate last week, that would create a database of government spending so that citizens and activist groups can more easily track the grants and contracts included in the federal budget.

Democrats, who say the earmarks measure is a pre-election effort by the Republicans to show they are accomplishing something to improve ethics, said just bringing openness to the use of earmarks wasn't enough.

"Earmark reform must do more than identify an earmark's sponsor," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., in a letter to his colleagues. "We need to curb the proliferation of unnecessary and suspect earmarks."

Emanuel said he would offer legislation that would prevent members from awarding earmarks that would benefit a registered lobbyist who serves as chairman of a particular member's political action committee. It would also end the practice of adding earmarks into conference reports that come out of House-Senate negotiations.

Boehner said the Appropriations Committee has already been successful in reducing earmarks, noting that requests for member projects had been reduced by 37 percent compared to last year, with spending for such projects down $7.8 billion.

The larger lobbying and ethics bills, an outgrowth of the scandal involving disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, would have limited the number of meals and gifts that members could accept from lobbyists, required greater information on the purpose of privately funded trips, slowed the movement of members leaving Congress for jobs in lobbying and mandated lobbyists to submit information on their activities more frequently.

The legislation became hung up over a provision in the House bill that would have limited donations to independent political groups known as 527s. Such groups tended to provide more financial support to Democrats in the last presidential election, and Senate Democrats made clear that they would not support any lobbying bill that contained 527 restrictions.

NIH: Scientists Escape Ethics Punishment (AP)

By Rita Beamish, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, September 13, 2006

Most of the federal scientists who improperly accepted personal money from drug or biotechnology companies walked away with reprimands or were allowed to retire unscathed.

Only two of the 44 scientists found to have violated rules governing private consulting deals are being investigated for possible criminal activity, and they remain on the government payroll, the National Institutes of Health told The Associated Press this week in the most detailed accounting it has released.

NIH spokesman John Burklow said his agency wanted eight others reviewed for possible crimes, but those cases were rejected by the investigating office at the U.S. Health and Human Services Department.

The two still outstanding - Drs. Trey Sunderland and Thomas Walsh - both committed "serious misconduct," so grave that they would be fired if they were civilians, NIH internal ethics reports contend.

NIH says it has been unable to act against the two because they are part of the Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, which provides medical help during disasters.

Lawmakers plan to push for answers Wednesday at a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee hearing, part of continuing scrutiny into how the agency polices conflicts of interest. Responding to congressional criticism, NIH last year barred federal scientists from the once-common practice of earning lucrative paychecks from private companies.

Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said he wants to know why it is taking so long to resolve the case of Sunderland, a leading Alzheimer's disease researcher whose request to leave government service has been denied for two years.

"Where's the accountability? Where's the response?" Stupak said. "This person should be dealt with severely."

He referred to allegations that Sunderland improperly transferred human tissue samples from NIH patients to the drug company Pfizer.

"These people thought they were helping other people, not some scientist profiting," he said. Sunderland, through his attorney, denies that his consulting payments from Pfizer were tied to samples he provided in his government capacity.

The Public Health Service Commissioned Corps is concerned about the allegations against Sunderland and Walsh and "will take appropriate action should wrongdoing be found," said spokeswoman Christina Pearson.

However she cited "other reviews" of Sunderland that her agency must coordinate with.

Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said the case points out deeper problems at NIH.

DOJ_NMG_0062225

"In spite of the public changes that have been made at NIH, there really does not appear to be a cultural change where the institution and the members of the institution condemn the kind of behavior that apparently Dr. Sunderland has exhibited. It's really, really disappointing," he said.

The subcommittee is expected to question NIH officials about documents showing it approved several taxpayer-paid trips for Sunderland to attend conferences and events in places like Hawaii and Toronto, even after recommending his firing. Things changed last month when his superiors, a day after assuring Sunderland the agency would soon negotiate his release, suddenly restricted his access and activities and assigned him to administrative duties, his lawyers said in a letter to the subcommittee.

NIH investigated 103 employees after revelations in 2004 that many had failed to report their paid relationships with drug companies. Of the 44 alleged offenders, six left NIH before they could be punished and two had offenses so minor they merited no sanction, Burklow said.

The majority received reprimands or warnings for failing to properly obtain approvals for their outside consulting work, he said. Suspensions ranging from a week to 45 days were meted out to a few who did not get prior approval or did not report their drug company ties, said Burklow.

Sunderland is under investigation by the HHS inspector general and the Justice Department, officials have said. And a government official told AP that Walsh, a prominent cancer researcher, is the other case the inspector general is reviewing. The official requested anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Reached at his NIH office on Monday, Walsh declined comment.

NIH ethics reports allege the two scientists had unauthorized, unreported deals with drug companies - Sunderland earning more than $600,000 over eight years for consulting and speeches and Walsh more than $100,000 in five years - and that their consulting improperly overlapped with government duties.

Lawyers for both scientists said in written defenses to NIH investigators that the two put in exceptionally long hours at their government jobs, even if the proper paperwork was missing for taking leave to perform outside work.

Documents obtained by AP show Sunderland initially got a green light to retire in November 2004 and he had his 11-year research project transferred to a New York center where he planned to accept a prominent post. But NIH officials subsequently recommended against his departure and the center now is moving on to hire someone else.

Sunderland's attorney Robert Muse cites a litany of mixed signals Sunderland received from NIH, including months of refusal to meet after stating a willingness to work out his release.

Burklow, citing privacy concerns, would not discuss any individual cases.

"The bureaucratic inaction," Muse wrote the congressional subcommittee on Monday, "has unreasonably interfered not only with Dr. Sunderland's career but also with his important Alzheimer's research," which he said cost the government millions of dollars.

Some scientists whose consultancies were negatively highlighted in 2004 congressional hearings and press accounts left NIH voluntarily. They suffered no repercussions.

Cancer researcher Lance Liotta said he retired in May 2005 with pension and benefits, accepting "a great opportunity" in research at George Mason University. His consulting activities, though questioned after the fact by Congress, were approved at the time, and he never was sanctioned.

Another former researcher, 33-year NIH veteran Michael Brownstein, had held nearly $2 million in stock with four companies whose boards he served on while he worked at NIH. The agency approved the consulting and never accused him of wrongdoing, said Brownstein, who continues his genetic research at the J. Craig Venter Institute in Rockville, Md.

Medicare Premiums Up Less Than Expected (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking

AP, September 12, 2006

Most elderly and disabled people on Medicare will see their premiums rise to $93.50 a month next year, a 5.6 percent increase that is much lower than had been anticipated.

DOJ_NMG_0062226

Officials had been projecting that premiums would again grow at double-digit rates, but there has been an unexpected slowing in the volume of services and tests that doctors are ordering for their Medicare patients.

The news was not as good for wealthier beneficiaries. For the first time in the program's history, wealthier beneficiaries will pay more for the insurance that covers doctors' visits and outpatient hospital care, known as Medicare Part B.

The higher payments will apply to about 1.5 million beneficiaries with incomes of more than $80,000 a year. Congress approved means-testing in the 2003 law that created the Medicare drug benefit.

For individuals who earn more than $80,000, or couples who earn more than $160,000, premiums will jump to $106. That amount goes up even more for seniors with higher incomes. For the wealthiest seniors, the monthly premium would go to $162, leading some analysts to project that wealthier and often healthier seniors would begin to leave the program.

Medicare Announces A Small Hike In Premiums For 2007 (MCT)

By Tony Pugh

McClatchy Newspapers, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - In the smallest-percentage rate increase since 2001, Medicare monthly premiums for physician care and outpatient hospital services will rise by only $5 in 2007 to $93.50, federal officials announced Tuesday.

At 5.6 percent, the increase for Supplementary Medical Insurance, better known as "Part B" coverage, fell short of the 11 percent hike that Medicare actuaries had projected and of this year's 13.2 percent increase. It's even farther removed from the record 17.4 percent spike last year.

A miscalculation of projected Part B spending is the main reason for the lower-than-expected rate increase, Medicare Administrator Mark McClellan said. Medicare actuaries forecast higher premiums based on an increase in physician claims that resulted from faster processing rather than from a spike in services provided.

The modest rate increase will allow the 38 million-plus seniors enrolled to keep more of their monthly Social Security checks, since the Medicare premiums typically are withheld from those payments.

"For the vast majority of beneficiaries, the amount of the Social Security cost-of-living increase will be substantially greater than the additional (Medicare) premium they will pay," McClellan said.

But affluent Medicare beneficiaries will pay more for their 2007 coverage because of a provision of the 2003 Medicare Modernization Act that calls for premium hikes ranging from 10 percent to 55 percent over the next three years for beneficiaries who earn at least $80,000 a year, or $160,000 for married couples.

Instead of the standard $93.50, those seniors will pay premiums of $106, $124.70, $143.40 or $162.10 per month, depending on their incomes. Roughly 4 percent, or about 1.5 million, of Medicare's recipients are subject to the higher rates.

The new rates mark the first time that Medicare has used income to set premium rates. The move was designed to help shore up Medicare's ailing finances, which are crumbling under pressure from higher health-care costs and a growing number of beneficiaries.

Under the new guidelines, seniors who earn $80,000 to $100,000 a year - and married couples with incomes of $160,000 to $200,000 - will see their premiums increase by 10 percent, or roughly 3 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. They'll pay Part B premiums of $106 in 2007.

Individuals who earn $100,000 to $150,000 - and married couples with incomes of $200,000 to $300,000 - will see their premiums increase by 25 percent, or roughly 8 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. Their 2007 Part B premiums will increase to $124.70.

Individuals earning $150,000 to $200,000 - and couples with incomes of $300,000 to $400,000 - will face increases of 40 percent, or about 13 percent a year from 2007 to 2009. That works out to a 2007 monthly premium of $143.40.

Individuals who earn $200,000 or more and couples who earn more than $400,000 face the largest increases. Their Part B premiums will jump 55 percent over the next three years, about 18 percent a year. Their monthly premiums will cost $162.10 in 2007.

The Part B premium increase is based on a formula that assumes a roughly 5 percent reduction in Medicare physician reimbursements in 2007. If Congress moves to freeze or increase those payments to doctors, as it has in recent years, the $93.50 premium wouldn't change and contingency funds would be used to make up the funding shortfalls. But money borrowed from the contingency fund would have to be replenished later, mainly through higher Part B premiums, Medicare officials said.

Medicare Premiums To Rise 5.6% For Most Seniors (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, September 13, 2006

Medicare premiums will rise 5.6% next year — to $93.50 a month — and wealthy seniors for the first time will begin paying an additional amount.

Most of the about 43 million Medicare beneficiaries will pay a modest $5 a month more than the $88.50 they pay this year, the smallest increase since 2001. But about 1.5 million wealthier seniors will pay more: $106 to $162 a month depending on their income.

"These income-related premiums will reduce Medicare costs by $7.7 billion over five years and $20 billion over 10," said Medicare chief Mark McClellan on Tuesday. "They are an important step in improving Medicare's sustainability."

Affected are those who earn more than $80,000 individually, or $160,000 as a couple.

Congress approved the new income-based charges as part of the same 2003 law that created the new prescription drug benefit, but it has received little public debate until now.

While wealthier workers have always paid more in taxes to support Medicare, the new income-based premiums are seen by critics as an attack on a basic egalitarian premise of the program: That everyone pays the same and gets the same benefits.

"Medicare is not a welfare program; it's social insurance designed to pool healthy and less healthy people," says Maria Freese, director of government relations and policy for the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare. "Insurance doesn't charge rich people more than poor people."

Most Medicare members pay premiums for Part B, which covers doctor visits, lab tests and hospital outpatient services. Medicare beneficiaries pay 25% of the expected costs of those Part B services. About 7 million low-income people have their Part B premiums paid by the government.

On Tuesday, Medicare officials said the Part B monthly increase that will affect most Medicare members was nearly $5 lower than had been projected in May. The announcement comes as Congress is expected to soon debate whether to overturn next year's planned 5.1% cut in doctor payments. If such action had already occurred, premiums could have risen an additional $1.50 a month.

"Most Medicare beneficiaries will see relatively modest cost increases compared with recent health care trends," McClellan said.

But Freese and other critics of the income-based premiums took issue with McClellan's statement that the income-based premiums will help Medicare's finances. She says the additional charges will do little to bolster Medicare's finances and could drive wealthier, healthier seniors out of the program, possibly causing costs to rise faster. Critics also suggest that income levels at which additional payments are required will be gradually reduced, requiring more seniors to make the higher payments.

But Joe Antos at the American Enterprise Institute says the move was inevitable as Medicare spending rises.

"One of the things we have to do is ask people who have more money to pay more for government services," says Antos. "The difficult balance is finding the spot where we're charging higher-income people more but not so much more that they will simply drop out of the program."

Government Sets Higher Medicare Rates And New Surcharge (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — The basic Medicare premium will rise next year to $93.50 a month, an increase of $5, the Bush administration announced Tuesday. It said more affluent beneficiaries would have to pay a new surcharge, from $12.50 to $68.60 a month, depending on their incomes.

The surcharge applies to 1.5 million people with annual incomes exceeding $80,000 for individuals or $160,000 for married couples filing joint tax returns.

Medicare officials said the standard premium for 2007 was lower than they had predicted. In May and again in July, they estimated that the monthly premium, now $88.50, would climb to about $98 in 2007.

The premium in question is for Part B of Medicare, a voluntary program that covers doctors' services, diagnostic tests and outpatient hospital care for 40 million people who are 65 and older or disabled. It shot up 50 percent from 2003 to 2006.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said Tuesday that Medicare spending for doctors' services, while still growing at a brisk pace, increased less than expected in the last year.

Listing factors that contributed to the new premium, Dr. McClellan reported "a modest slowdown in physician spending growth" but "very rapid growth in spending for hospital outpatient services." Many services provided in outpatient hospital clinics "could be performed less expensively and more conveniently in a physician's office," he said.

Kirsten A. Sloan, a health policy analyst at AARP, the lobby for older Americans, said: "The standard premium for Part B is less than originally projected, and that's good news. But the premium is artificially low. It assumes a continuation of current law, under which Medicare payments to doctors will be cut 5 percent next year. If Congress decides to prevent that cut, beneficiaries may have to make up the difference by paying higher premiums in 2008."

The premium is set each year to cover about 25 percent of projected spending under Part B. If Congress had eliminated the cut planned for doctors and simply frozen their Medicare fees in 2007, it would have required a further increase of roughly $1.50 in the monthly premium, Medicare officials said.

Congress established the surcharge under a little-noticed provision of the 2003 law that added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare. Federal officials said the surcharge, to be phased in over the next three years, represented a major change. Until now, high-income and middle-income beneficiaries have generally paid the same premium. Medicare officials said the surcharge would raise $7.7 billion in the first five years and a total of $20.8 billion in the first 10 years.

Dr. McClellan said the surcharge would have "a very positive impact, making Medicare more sustainable in the long term." Some Medicare experts say the higher premiums will prompt some wealthy people to drop out of Medicare, leaving the program to serve poorer, sicker people. Dr. McClellan dismissed those concerns, saying Medicare would still be a bargain for high-income people.

Federal health officials estimate that 9,000 people will drop out of Part B because of the surcharge in 2007, while 30,000 will drop out in 2009, when the surcharge becomes larger.

In calculating the extra premiums for 2007, the government will generally use income data from tax returns for 2005. For a single person with income of $80,001 to $100,000, and for each member of a couple filing a joint return with combined income of $160,001 to $200,000, the surcharge will be $12.50 a month, and the total premium will be $106 a month.

The surcharge rises with income. For an individual with income greater than $200,000 and for each member of a couple with combined income exceeding $400,000, the surcharge will be $68.60 a month in 2007, and the total premium will be $162.10 a month. The surcharge will be much higher in 2008 and later years.

In announcing the new premiums, the administration appeared to send a mixed message. On the one hand, Dr. McClellan said, "Medicare beneficiaries are experiencing cost increases that are modest in comparison with recent health care cost trends." On the other hand, he said, spending in the traditional fee-for-service Medicare program is "out of control."

Medicare Premiums To Rise 5.6% In '07 (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Most seniors will have to pay 5.6 percent more for basic Medicare coverage next year, officials announced yesterday. But premiums for more affluent beneficiaries will increase by as much as 83 percent, because the federal government for the first time will require wealthier people to pay more.

The standard monthly premium for Part B, which covers doctor visits and outpatient hospital care, will rise to $93.50 from $88.50 this year, said Mark B. McClellan, head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. Individuals with an annual income of more than $80,000 (or more than $160,000 for married couples) will pay monthly premiums of $106 to $162.10, depending on income.

About 1.5 million of the 42 million Americans on Medicare will have to pay the higher premiums based on income, a change instituted by Congress as part of the 2003 law that created the Medicare drug benefit. McClellan said the income-based premiums will save the financially troubled program $7.7 billion over five years and more than $20 billion over a decade.

Even at the higher rates, Medicare remains a good deal, he said. The most affluent beneficiaries, those with individual incomes of more than $200,000 a year, will pay just under $2,000 a year in premiums while receiving an average of $4,300 a year in benefits.

"That still makes it a very attractive insurance package," McClellan said.

The leader of one organization for seniors predicted that the higher premiums will drive away some of the more affluent seniors, undermining Medicare's broad political support and its finances.

"As healthier and wealthier seniors see their premiums rise, we fear that when that premium equals what they could pay for regular health insurance, why be in the program at all?" said Shannon Benton, executive director of the Senior Citizens League, an advocacy group with 1.2 million members. "We feel that eventually the sickest, the oldest and the poorest are going to be the ones left behind in Medicare, and their costs are going to go up significantly to sustain the program."

Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.) introduced a bill in April that would repeal the income-based premium increases, but it has not gotten out of a House committee.

Medicare officials said they expect 9,000 people to drop out of the program next year because of the new income-based premiums, and 30,000 to leave by 2010. Overall, that's not a lot, they said.

"I don't see any substantial adverse impacts on participation in Medicare, and I definitely see a very positive impact on making Medicare sustainable for the long term," McClellan said. Medicare officials had been projecting an even higher increase in the standard premium, but there has been an unexpected slowing in the volume of services and tests that doctors are ordering for their Medicare patients, McClellan said.

Officials said the standard premium increase of 5.6 percent is the smallest since 2001. It trails the projected 6 percent increase in per capita health spending next year and a projected 7 percent increase in prescription drug spending, they said. Average premiums in the Medicare drug benefit, known as Part D, are expected to remain flat in 2007, McClellan said.

McClellan said the Part B standard premium would have to go up by $1.50 in 2008 (in addition to routine annual premium increases) if Congress were to repeal a planned 5.1 percent cut in Medicare payments to physicians next year -- a cut that doctors are lobbying hard to kill.

That prospect troubles AARP -- the largest senior organization, with 37 million members.

"The fact that the premium is a little less than originally projected is good news, but . . . we may simply be forestalling higher costs to beneficiaries," said Kirsten Sloan, the organization's national coordinator for health.

Subtle GOP Maneuvers (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Over the summer, Rep. John Carter (R-Texas) sat down with a handful of Republican colleagues to gauge their support for a potential leadership bid.

The talks were very preliminary, a Carter spokeswoman said, but the former judge is hardly alone in considering a run.

As Republicans focus their energy and fundraising efforts on retaining their majority this fall, a handful of ambitious lawmakers are also angling for a promotion within the conference.

At least seven chairmanships will open next year if the GOP holds the House, and other members are mulling a challenge of the current leaders.

“I think we will see a crowded field,” said Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), who is expected to challenge current Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) should Pryce triumph in her tough reelection race.

The election results, particularly if Republicans lose the House, will dictate how crowded that field becomes. “The dynamics are going to depend on the election results we have,” Blackburn said.

Indeed, uncertainty about those results has somewhat muted the internal leadership campaigns.

DOJ_NMG_0062230

"It's very subtle," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.), a member of the Republican Steering Committee, the 28-member panel that decides committee slots.

In July, Putnam and other members of the Republican Steering Committee met one-on-one with many of the lawmakers who are vying for committee gavels. Members of that committee expect an up-tick in those meetings before lawmakers in the House go home to campaign at the end of this month.

Uncertainty Facing Current Leaders

During a closed-door meeting last week of the elected leadership in House, Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the GOP campaign chief, told the other leaders that he still expects Republicans to retain their majority in November, a GOP aide familiar with the meeting said earlier this week.

Reynolds and the other leaders have been careful to measure expectations this cycle, warning members of Democratic efforts to unseat them without becoming overly gloomy. This serves to keep members motivated and dampens expectations heading into the critical election.

Whatever the outcome, most members believe House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) control their own fate in the next Congress.

If House remains in GOP control and Hastert decides to stay for another term, many Hill staffers and lobbyists speculate that he would name Reynolds as leadership chairman, former Rep. Rob Portman's (R-Ohio) old job, in order to give the New York Republican a seat at the table while preventing a two- or three-way race for leader or whip.

Losing the House should throw all those equations in doubt, members, aides and outside GOP lobbyists said in interviews over the last month.

A loss of House control could create an opening for a dark horse candidate, such as Republican Study Committee (RSC) Chairman Mike Pence (Ind.), to launch a bid for the leadership.

Auditioning

Pence has always generated favorable media coverage through an active RSC press shop. The outspoken conservative stirred so much speculation during the race for majority leader earlier this year that his office issued a release stating he would not cast a bid for the post.

Pence stayed in the spotlight over the August recess with his proposal to revive comprehensive immigration reform, and he has taken a much less combative public stance toward the leadership since last fall's showdown over federal spending to fund repair efforts in the hurricane-damaged Gulf Coast. As evidence, the RSC has not gone on attack this month to force leaders to bring a bill creating a so-called "Sunset Commission" to the floor, despite promises Boehner made to give them the vote in exchange for support on the budget.

Pence's naysayers criticize him for catering to the media instead of the party, and some congressional staffers jokingly call him "the minority leader" for threatening the conservative base with his push to cut federal spending despite objections from leaders and the centrist Republicans whose vulnerable seats are so valuable to keeping the majority.

Blackburn, a telegenic conservative, has also maintained a steady presence in the media and in the conference since declaring her ambitions to challenge Pryce last winter.

The Tennessee Republican hosts biweekly meetings with a small group of Republican colleagues to discuss communication strategy in a Longworth office her staff has dubbed "The Think Room." She also worked with leadership to craft a message defying the Senate's immigration bill.

There is also concern in GOP circles that Pryce will lose her seat in November, which could broaden the field of candidates running to replace her.

Whatever the outcome this fall, state delegations will play an important role in these contests, and no state is agitating for a seat at the leadership table more than Texas.

Republican insiders consider Carter, who serves on the Republican Steering Committee, and Rep. Henry Bonilla (R-Texas) the most likely candidates from the Lone Star State. Carter's office said his discussions over the summer were very preliminary and hinted that he was considering a run for one of the lower-tier leadership posts.

The leadership elections earlier this year drew a crowded field for each of the vacated posts, and other leaders narrowly avoided a full slate of elections. Some of those members may still be candidates.

Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) resigned his leadership post to run for majority leader; Reps. Eric Cantor (R-Va.), Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) and Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.) never had a chance to wage their own contest for whip when Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) lost his own bid for the No. 2 spot in the conference and chose to stay on as the chief Republican vote counter; and Reps. Phil Gingrey (R-Ga.), Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.) and Adam Putnam (R-Fla.) ran to replace Shadegg in a race that Putnam eventually won.

The other wildcards next year are Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) and Transportation and Infrastructure Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska), both completing their final months as chairmen. Sensenbrenner could try to reclaim his post on the Science Committee because he still has two years left under the six-year term limits.

Leaders Keep a Close Eye on the Party

Given this uncertainty, leaders continue to keep a close eye on the conference.

The Speaker will make campaign stops in over 200 districts this cycle, marking the second consecutive election cycle he will exceed that mark. And Boehner, whose own travel has increased precipitously since becoming leader, visited 26 districts during the August recess with more campaign stops expected this fall.

Blunt, whose own post could be challenged, holds regular meetings with small groups of Republican lawmakers to discuss pending legislation.

Blunt and his chief of staff, Brian Gaston, met with most of the committee chairman and their staff directors over the summer to discuss each chairman's legislative priorities for the fall and beyond. The meetings included sit-downs with Sensenbrenner, Young and two other outgoing chairmen, Mike Oxley (R-Ohio) on Financial Services and Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) on Ways and Means.

"Mr. Blunt says the Whip should know the members better than anyone in the building, and both of these opportunities further that goal," Blunt spokeswoman Burson Snyder wrote in an email.

Cantor, Blunt's chief deputy, is expected to travel to anywhere from 50 to 60 districts this cycle in support of Republican candidates. The popular Virginian also hosts regular breakfasts with a small, rotating group of fellow Republicans in the same Longworth office where Blackburn convenes her "Think Room."

The Republican Steering Committee

Not only will the election results reshape the perceptions of individual leaders, a Democratic majority could also reshape the panel that decides on committee slots and other plum assignments.

This uncertainty could actually be a boost for the party because ambitious members are raising more money for their colleagues to protect their majority.

"It's probably the best thing for the [National Republican Congressional Committee]," said Tom Cole (R-Okla.), who is running to succeed Reynolds as chairman, because members are working hard to raise money and help GOP candidates in tough elections.

The Race for NRCC Chair

The race to succeed Reynolds as NRCC chairman is the only leadership race that is guaranteed at this point.

Cole and aides to Reps. Phil English (R-Pa.) and Pete Sessions (R-Texas), his two opponents, all say the race remains undecided. While each member has a significant block of support in the conference, it seems that none has secured a clear majority.

"I expect this to be a two-ballot race," Cole said. "I think there is still a considerable block of uncommitted votes out there."

Cole recently gave the NRCC $300,000 in hard money and distributed a strategy memo last week in which he recommended Republicans to personalize the election by attacking their opponents. That includes investing in a thorough opposition research package, reserving television time to hit opponents and keep critical ads running through the last week before the election.

"Know your opponent's record and weaknesses inside out – and exploit them," Cole wrote to GOP candidate Van Taylor in Texas. "Do not let up – keep the tough ads running right up to the election day."

DOJ_NMG_0062232

Sessions has given 78 Republican candidates a combined $553,500 through his political action committee (PAC) so far this cycle, according to a memo from PETEPAC. He has also organized 19 events to benefit a total of 33 GOP candidates this cycle. Those events have raised over $1.7 million. In addition, he raised $717,000 for the NRCC during six dinners over the last two years.

English has traveled extensively to benefit GOP challengers and open seat candidates this year, and his PAC had given Republican candidates more than $300,000 as of the end of July, according to the nonpartisan campaign website politicalmoneyline.com.

The Pennsylvania Republican has made his own ability to win tough reelection fights over the years a vanguard of his campaign for chairman, particularly with members in consistently competitive seats.

These efforts, along with those of other members angling for promotions within the conference, could be the only thing keeping Republicans in the hunt this election season despite a number of national factors that will continue to weigh them down.

"I think our members have worked harder in this race than I've ever seen them," said Cole, who is a former executive director of the Republican National Committee. "I've certainly given more that I thought I would before this cycle."

Panel Discounts Existence Of Unique Gulf War Syndrome (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

An expert panel reviewing hundreds of studies has concluded there is no single "Gulf War syndrome" afflicting thousands of veterans of the 1990-91 conflict, although they have suffered vague symptoms at a much higher rate than other veterans.

They have also experienced post-traumatic stress disorder and depression two to three times as frequently as other veterans, the panel found. Less certain is a possibly higher risk for the neurological ailment Lou Gehrig's disease, and possibly a rare birth defect in their children.

"We can't identify a Gulf War syndrome," said Lynn R. Goldman, a physician and epidemiologist who headed the 13-member committee appointed by the National Academies Institute of Medicine (IOM).

Previous blue-ribbon panels, including several convened by the IOM, one by the Defense Department and one by the White House under Bill Clinton, reached the same conclusion.

In preparing the report, Goldman and her colleagues read 850 studies done in the years since soldiers in an Army Reserve unit in Indiana began reporting a constellation of symptoms that included fatigue, joint and muscle pains, difficulty concentrating and memory problems in the months after they returned from the Persian Gulf in 1991. The panel gave more credibility to large, well-designed and controlled studies; it did no original research of its own.

The largest and most representative study found that 29 percent of Gulf War veterans reported physical complaints arising from several body systems, compared with 16 percent of servicemen and women who were not sent to the gulf. This was not just an American phenomenon; British, Canadian, Australian and Danish troops deployed to the gulf also reported more symptoms than their non-deployed counterparts.

The panel concluded that "unexplained illnesses are the most prevalent health outcome of service in the Gulf War."

However, the array and severity of symptoms varies, and many are typical of other conditions (such as fibromyalgia, multiple chemical sensitivity and chronic fatigue syndrome) whose cause is unknown.

"The nature of the symptoms suffered by many Gulf War veterans does not point to an obvious diagnosis, etiology [cause], or standard treatment," the panel wrote.

Three studies examined by the panel found a slightly increased rate of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, also known as Lou Gehrig's disease, in Gulf War veterans. Overall, 107 cases of the fatal disease were found in about 700,000 men and women deployed. Goldman and her colleagues said this trend should be followed with continued surveillance for the disease.

Among the 850 papers examined were several with less certain findings.

One found a slight increase in brain cancer among the 100,000 soldiers theoretically exposed to sarin gas after rockets containing the nerve agent were unwittingly destroyed in a large ammunition dump in Khamisiyah, Iraq, after the war. That disease remained extremely rare, however, with only a handful of tumors even in the "exposed" group.

DOJ_NMG_0062233

That finding is questionable for two reasons, however.

There is no evidence that any soldiers were actually exposed to sarin, which causes well-recognized symptoms at very low concentrations. In addition, brain tumors generally grow 10 to 20 years before being found. This study was done nine years after Khamisiyah, suggesting that many of the tumors in the soldiers had probably formed before the detonation.

Nevertheless, the brain-tumor finding "provides another lead that should be followed" by future studies, Goldman said.

One study also found a slightly increased rate of birth defects, especially of the urinary tract, among children of Gulf War veterans. Another reported five cases of a rare, disfiguring defect called Goldenhar syndrome in babies of Persian Gulf veterans conceived soon after the war, compared with only two in non-deployed veterans. The children with Goldenhar were profiled in a Life magazine article that helped popularize the idea that soldiers had been exposed to persistent toxins during the war.

Because the number of defects was so small, however, these differences could have easily happened by chance.

A big problem with evaluating the source of illness in gulf veterans is that little information was gathered on their exposure to pesticides, smoke and battlefield contaminants -- and even to vaccines and drugs administered by the military.

"Even just a few measurements on the ground would have made a huge difference," Goldman said of the Khamisiyah detonations.

The panel advised the military do a better job of assessing the health of soldiers immediately before and after deployment -- as is being done in the Iraq war -- as well as gathering better toxic exposure data in future wars.

Steve Robinson, a Gulf War veteran who directs government relations for Veterans for America, supported that suggestion in particular.

"The IOM report confirms that many Gulf War veterans are seriously ill and that they were exposed to many types of poisons, but the link remains unclear because the military failed to collect exposure data in 1991," he said. "Veterans for America believes the military cannot let this mistake happen again. . . . Lessons learned should be lessons followed."

VA Study Doubts Gulf War Syndrome (AP-Y)

By Andrew Bridges, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

The unexplained symptoms that afflict thousands of Gulf War veterans don't constitute a single illness, a federally funded study concludes.

Even though U.S. and foreign veterans of the 1991 war report more symptoms of illness than do soldiers who didn't serve in the Persian Gulf, there is no such thing as Gulf War syndrome, according to the Veterans Affairs-sponsored report released Tuesday.

Nearly 30 percent of all those who served in the brief war have reported problems.

"There's no unique pattern of symptoms. Every pattern identified in Gulf War veterans also seems to exist in other veterans, though it is important to note the symptom rate is higher, and it is a serious issue," said Dr. Lynn Goldman, of Johns Hopkins University, who headed the Institute of Medicine committee that prepared the report.

The report did find evidence of an elevated risk of the rare nerve disease amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, also called Lou Gehrig's disease, among Gulf War veterans. They also face an increased risk of anxiety disorders, depression and substance abuse, it said.

The VA contracted with the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences, to review scientific studies and probe the issue at the direction of Congress. Department of Veterans Affairs spokesman Phil Budahn said the VA would not comment until it had a chance to study the report.

Tuesday's report is the latest in the important series, which the VA will rely on to determine whether Gulf War veterans are eligible for special disability benefits if they are found to suffer from illnesses that can be linked to their service.

Veterans can now claim those benefits only by making an undiagnosed illness claim, said Steve Robinson, a Gulf War Army veteran and government relations director for Veterans for America.

"They keep saying it over and over, every year. We know that — we know that there is no single thing that made veterans sick. We know this thing is likely a combination of various exposures," Robinson said in pushing for new studies he hopes will find what ails tens of thousands of his fellow vets.

However, the report's confirmation that Gulf War veterans are sicker may actually help them secure government benefits, said Shannon Middleton, assistant director of health policy for the American Legion.

A member of the Research Advisory Committee on Gulf War Veterans' Illnesses, also chartered by Congress, called the report the "first step" in cataloging the studies done on veterans of the conflict.

"But the most prevalent problems in Gulf War veterans are the multisymptom illness/Gulf War syndrome-type problems that still affect a sizable proportion of those who served in the war. I am disappointed that the IOM report does little to analyze what these studies collectively tell us about the nature and causes of these conditions," said Lea Steele, a Kansas State University epidemiologist who is the committee's scientific director.

Soldiers who served in the Persian Gulf following the Iraqi invasion of neighboring Kuwait in August 1990 have reported symptoms that include fatigue, memory loss, muscle and joint pain, rashes and difficulty sleeping. The variety of symptoms has complicated efforts to pinpoint their cause, according to the report.

Nearly 700,000 U.S. soldiers, along with troops from 34 other countries, took part in the Gulf War. Once in the region, those soldiers were exposed to a wide array of toxins and other potential health hazards, including smoke from hundreds of oil well fires, pesticides, depleted uranium ammunition and possibly the nerve agent sarin, released during the demolition of a munitions dump.

Inadequate screening of soldiers before deployment in the Gulf War, coupled with a lack of environmental monitoring during the conflict, have hindered efforts to determine whether exposure to those contaminants is linked to any illness, the report also notes.

For years, the government denied the mysterious illnesses were linked to the war. It now acknowledges that at least some were due to wartime service. The government is no longer pointing to stress as the likely reason, as some federally funded studies had suggested.

Signs Brew Of A Heated Debate Over OMB Nominee (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Federal regulation, which usually simmers on the back burner in Washington, seems likely to start boiling in the next few weeks if public interest and labor groups have their way.

Advocacy groups yesterday assailed Susan E. Dudley , the president's nominee to head up regulatory policy at the Office of Management and Budget, and called on the Senate to reject her nomination.

"We believe she is unfit," said Joan Claybrook , president of Public Citizen, a nonprofit consumer advocacy organization.

By custom, presidential nominees remain silent until their confirmation hearing, so the Bush administration fired back at Public Citizen on Dudley's behalf.

"When a fringe group like this one criticizes Susan Dudley, I think it's a good indication that she's actually squarely in the thoughtful mainstream along with most Americans," said Scott Milburn , press secretary at the OMB. "She's very well suited to . . . keep our regulatory process on track."

To some degree, the dispute over the Dudley nomination reflects inherent tensions in the federal regulatory system. The OMB reviews major agency regulations and can send them back to agencies for more justification. Agencies say their rules flow from laws, do not need more justification and sometimes are backed up by federal courts. The hue and cry increases during Republican administrations, which public interest groups see as tilting policy in favor of big business.

Paul R. Portney , dean of the management college at the University of Arizona, said he thinks public interest groups "don't like the fact that there is this office," regardless of which political party controls the White House, because the OMB questions and forces agencies to justify costs and benefits.

W. Kip Viscusi , distinguished professor at Vanderbilt University, said the Dudley nomination is part of "an ongoing battle where advocates of regulatory programs complain" that the OMB is too powerful.

"The best she can do is try to make the regulations more effective and generate more health and environmental benefits through more imaginative regulatory approaches," Viscusi said.

Portney and Viscusi noted that public interest groups' calls for the Senate to reject Dudley could become a replay of the bruising battle over her predecessor in the regulatory job, John D. Graham . He left as administrator of the OMB's Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs in February, and the White House announced over the summer the president's intention to nominate Dudley.

Prior to her nomination, Dudley directed the regulatory studies program for the Mercatus Center at George Mason University. The center has been active in submitting proposals to the OMB that call for modifying or eliminating regulations and has emerged as a policy player in the Bush administration and on Capitol Hill.

Dudley's scholarly articles and published comments will be used to shape the debate over her nomination. During a telephone briefing, Public Citizen, OMB Watch, Natural Resources Defense Council and the AFL-CIO portrayed Dudley as outside the mainstream on regulatory issues.

"I have dealt with OIRA administrators going back to the first one," said Gary Bass , executive director of OMB Watch. "This nominee is more extreme than any of the past ones. She has an anti-regulatory fervor and an ideological zeal that is unparalleled in any of the nominees put forward in years."

The public interest groups faulted Dudley for controversial remarks on rules involving air bags, arsenic limits in drinking water and workplace injuries. All too often, they contended, Dudley inappropriately relied on cost-benefit analyses and overestimated the value of consumer choice when objecting to regulations.

Jonathan H. Adler , a professor and co-director of the Center for Business Law and Regulation at Case Western Reserve University's law school, said Dudley has "generally liked free-market solutions to things" and "is skeptical of one-size-fits-all" regulations.

Dudley, 51, has a master's degree from the Sloan School of Management at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. She has worked on regulatory issues at the Environmental Protection Agency and at OIRA. Since 2002, she has been affiliated with George Mason University.

Dudley's nomination was submitted to the Senate on Aug. 1, just as Congress left on summer break. The Senate has relatively few work days scheduled in this election year, raising the possibility that President Bush might have to give her an interim appointment if opponents stall her confirmation.

Steven L. Katz, an author and consultant, will discuss "everything new government executives and managers need to know but are never told" at noon today on Federal Diary Live athttp://www.washingtonpost.com. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Macs And Grant Site Just Don't Click (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Scientists, scholars and others planning to use their Macintosh computers to submit grant proposals to the federal government in the months ahead should be prepared for a rocky, or at least error-message-littered, road ahead.

Luckily, Mac users are used to it.

Ever since its inception several years ago, the government's electronic grant submission system has been compatible only with Windows-based computers. That has forced Mac users to go with paper submissions or use clumsy patchwork programs -- or "workarounds" -- that government officials have conceded are "not ideal" and Mac users have called, well, insert your favorite PC expletive here.

DOJ_NMG_0062236

Earlier this year, the Department of Health and Human Services -- a central manager of the Grants.gov system -- promised that by November the system would be compatible with Macs, which are popular among scientists and academics. That was based on promises from Northrop Grumman Corp., which has been paid tens of millions of dollars to run Grants.gov for the government.

But a new twist emerged this week when HHS announced that Grumman had lost its bid to win a renewal of its contract and will be moving on as of Nov. 1.

So will Grumman deliver the goods as promised before it leaves?

"That's a question we have," said Grants.gov program manager John Etcheverry.

Just last week, Etcheverry said, Grumman delivered to HHS its first shot at a Mac-compatible version of its IBM-based grant application software for an initial round of testing by government experts.

Asked how it worked, Etcheverry said hesitantly: "It's, to quote one of our testers, 'It's early.' But it seems to be working."

Despite repeated inquiries from The Post, Grumman spokeswoman Juli Ballesteros did not provide anyone to address the company's commitment to making Grants.gov Mac-compatible before the company leaves.

With that rollout uncertain, responsibility will fall to the new winner of the Grants.gov contract, Fairfax-based General Dynamics Information Technology. Under the terms of its contract, worth up to $18.9 million over five years, the company will create a new system by March 31 that will be compatible with Windows-based and Macintosh computers as well as Unix and Linux systems, which are popular in some science labs and research institutions.

The company's vice president overseeing the Grants.gov project, Mary Biear, said the company will start with a platform-independent, off-the-shelf Adobe product, which it will modify in minor ways to fit the requirements of the government's grant-application system.

She said her company would also maintain key systems left behind by Grumman -- including, if it works, the new Mac-compatible system.

"The first question for our team is . . . if users can use it," said Biear, who said she has seen the nascent product because the companies have begun a seven-week overlapping transition period. "If it's working appropriately, [we] will maintain it and roll it out. If not, we would push it back."

In that case, Mac users will have to wait until the new system comes out at the end of March.

Not everyone is optimistic that even that deadline will be met. David Cassidy, a vice president at the District-based Turner Consulting Group, which was part of a consortium that lost its bid to take over the Grants.gov contract from Grumman, said he can't see how General Dynamics can fulfill the contract's requirements for the price it promised unless the company "has some incredible 'special sauce' that will enable them to meet these budget, functionality and schedule constraints."

But even if the company succeeds on schedule, it will be too late for the thousands of applicants who face a Feb. 1 deadline for the National Institutes of Health's most popular "R01" research grants. NIH has announced that it wants all those applications to be filed electronically.

"The big NIH deadline is Feb. 1, 2007," said John S. Massa, associate director of the University of Iowa's division of sponsored programs, in an e-mail. So a March release "isn't going to help much."

Norka Ruiz Bravo, NIH's deputy director for extramural research, conceded the timing was awkward.

Will the agency consider pushing back its deadline for an all-electronic submission process? "That is something we may want to think about," she said.

Vice Must Wash Hands Before Returning To Work (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Washington

I called Tim Russert to ask if Dick Cheney had washed his hands after their interview on Sunday.

“No-o-o,’’ he replied, sounding confused.

Any sort of scrubbing, I wondered? Antiseptic wipe, Purell, quick shower on the way out?

DOJ_NMG_0062237

No, Tim assured me, the vice president did not stop at the basement shower at NBC, or even drop by the men's room you pass on the right as you head out to the parking lot.

According to The Times's health section yesterday, Lady Macbeth and Pontius Pilate were not alone in wanting that "damned spot" out.

"People who washed their hands after contemplating an unethical act were less troubled by their thoughts than those who didn't,'' Benedict Carey wrote about a new study on the "Macbeth effect," published in the journal Science.

"In one of several experiments among Northwestern undergraduates, the researchers had one group of students recall an unethical act from their past, like betraying a friend, and another group reflect on an ethical deed, like returning lost money,'' the article said. "Afterward, the students had their choice of a gift, either a pencil or an antiseptic wipe. Those who had reflected on a shameful act were twice as likely as the others to take the wipe.''

If Dick Cheney didn't try to hose himself down after his outlandish performance on "Meet the Press,'' he may be so deep in denial he doesn't even know he's ruining America and needs a symbolic moral superwash.

Since W. revealed he's been reading Shakespeare — including "Macbeth" — I've been puzzling over which character the vice president most resembles. He's got as much malignant sway over the protagonist as Iago, but Iago hated Othello.

The Lord of the Underworld is more like Lady Macbeth, who persuades her partner to make a huge error in judgment by taunting him about manliness. If he doesn't want to be unmanned, he must pre-emptively wield the dagger against his rival. She tells him:

When you durst do it, then you were a man;
And to be more than what you were, you would
Be so much more the man.

Even though "blood will have blood," Macbeth decides he must stay on his self-destructive path:

Stepped in so far that, should I wade no more,
Returning were as tedious as go o'er.

W. and Vice went on TV this week to double down on their dishonest case, now contradicted by a mountain of evidence, once more milking our sorrow over 9/11 to justify their errant course in Iraq.

In a speech that Tony Snow promised would be "reflective,'' the president used hyperventilated rhetoric about "a struggle for civilization" and cynically retraced a line he now knows is false, again linking Osama and Baghdad: "If we yield Iraq to men like bin Laden, our enemies will be emboldened.''

Bin Laden has become the Willie Horton of the midterms. After letting the C.I.A. disband the unit devoted to hunting for Osama — the Senate took a slap at the White House on Thursday when it voted to reinstate it — Mr. Bush now won't stop talking about the bogeyman he ignored for five years while he transferred all his resources to Iraq.

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," he said.

Instead of going after Osama, we invaded Iraq. Now W. says we must stay in Iraq or it will be run by Osamas. We must kill all the terrorists we are creating. American soldiers must keep dying because American soldiers have died. If we criticize Mr. Bush, then we're unmanning the whole country. The logic is deviously Rovian, and we are trapped in the circularity.

On "Meet the Press,'' Mr. Cheney warned that America cannot let its adversaries "break our will'' and show we "don't have the stomach for the fight.''

"It was the right thing to do," Vice insisted of the war in Iraq, "and if we had to do it over again we would do exactly the same thing."

After all the miscalculations and billions wasted, projects screwed up, lives and limbs lost, foreign enemies made, American stature squandered, Taliban strength regained, North Korean bombs and Iran-Iraq alliances built (visiting the American-hating, Holocaust-denying Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad yesterday, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq called Iran "a good friend and brother'') Dick Cheney wouldn't do anything differently?

Part of leadership has to be retooling, saying: "You know what? This hasn't worked. This is making things worse. What else can we do?''

OTHER NEWS:

Falling Oil Prices May Spell Relief For Consumers (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

The recent drop in oil prices could provide a welcome and surprising boost to consumer pocketbooks this fall, cushioning the economy from a falloff in home prices and construction while venting an important source of inflation pressure.

The easing of energy prices is an unexpected -- and little-noted -- positive amid economic anxiety over falling housing activity, previous energy-price increases and the possibility of recession.

Crude oil was at $77 a barrel as recently as early August. Yesterday, the price of the October crude-oil future contract settled at $63.76, a near six month low, down $1.85 from Monday, on the New York Mercantile Exchange. That helped spur stock prices to a four-month high. At the same time, the average retail price of gasoline has fallen to $2.67 from $3.08 a gallon, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

"Some 99% of the questions I get these days are about the size of the drag from housing, and I think that far too few people are thinking seriously about the boost from lower oil," said Robert Mellman, senior economist at J.P. Morgan Chase. He predicted the retail gasoline price should soon hit $2.30 a gallon, based on declines that already have occurred in the whole sale price.

Mr. Mellman said lower gasoline prices should boost the annual growth rate of consumer spending a full percentage point and could lift fourth-quarter economic growth from a forecast 3%, at an annual rate, to as high as 3.7%. For now, though, his firm is leaving its growth forecast unchanged.

Since 2004, oil prices are up sharply amid supply disruptions, tensions in the Middle East and rising demand, especially in China and India. That increase has in turn squeezed wages, in particular for less-affluent families. Although consumers have absorbed the impact in part by saving less, their spending also has been crimped, which economists and analysts have seen as a factor in slowing sales at retailers from Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to mid- and up-market chains such as Williams-Sonoma Inc.

Fuel prices have gone in reverse of late because many supply fears have proved -- so far -- to be unfounded, including a wider conflict in the Middle East, possibly involving Iran; violence in Nigeria and Iraq; and the hurricane season in the Gulf of Mexico. This also is a seasonally weak period for oil demand.

If declining oil prices lead to a pickup in consumer demand, that also could boost business confidence. "How gas prices affect the average Wal-Mart and Target customer is of keen interest to us," said Patrick Casey, assistant vice president for forecasting and planning at TTX Co., a Chicago provider of rail cars and freight-management services to the railway industry.

Lower oil prices also could boost economic prospects overseas, although by less than in the U.S., where consumer prices are far more sensitive to changes in energy prices. Relief on the fuel front may trigger upward revisions to Europe's economic growth projections for next year. "The rundown in oil prices has come so quickly, I think it has a lot of people reaching for their calculators right now," says David Brown, an economist with Bear Stearns in London.

In China, leaders have been contemplating relaxing costly regulations that have insulated their consumers from the rise in world oil prices. The recent drop could remove some of that urgency.

Some economists are less enthusiastic. Nancy Lazar, economist at ISI Group, said oil prices take a while to fully affect the economy. "We've yet to see a lot of the damage from the increase we've had in the price of oil in the last couple years," she said. "[The recent drop] is good news, but it's more good news for the fourth quarter of 2007 than it is for the near term."

Michael Englund, principal director of Action Economics in Boulder, Colo., said, "Price swings have a much bigger impact on consumer-confidence survey readings and business sentiment than they do on actual consumer behavior."

Of course, with spare capacity still tight, prices could easily shoot up again on a supply disruption. "If oil is back over $70 per barrel in three weeks, all of this [positive benefit] is out the window," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group Inc. Indeed, trading on futures markets indicate oil prices may rise back above $70 by a year from now.

The oil-price drop is still too early, and prices remain too high, for major producers to respond with output cuts. Still, the Organization for Petroleum Exporting Countries quietly agreed this week to supply no more oil than the market requires. That will enable major oil-exporting nations to effectively ignore quotas and curb output if prices plunge further before they meet again in December.

For now, the price drop's impact on inflation will be as important as its effect on economic growth. Edward McKelvey, economist at Goldman Sachs, expects the decline in gasoline prices to knock 0.4 percentage point off the overall inflation rate. The 12-month inflation rate was 4.1% in July. If Mr. McKelvey's calculations are correct and other prices continue their recent trend, that rate could fall to 2.4% in September, in part because a big jump in September 2005, due to Hurricane Katrina, will drop out of the 12-month calculation.

While the Federal Reserve focuses on "core inflation," which excludes energy and food prices, it blames the recent rise of core inflation on energy costs seeping into the prices of other goods and services. It is a principal reason the Fed, while leaving short-term rates alone at 5.25% last month, has said it is ready to raise them again if inflation pressures intensify. It could relax that stance if the retreat in energy prices hastens an expected decline in core inflation. Mr. McKelvey said that by boosting growth, lower energy prices could also make rate cuts less likely.

It may take a while before the drop in energy prices ripples more broadly through other goods and services. "Our fuel surcharge has not fully offset the increased fuel cost," said Ron Dillon, controller of Dillon's Bus Service Inc. in Millersville, Md. "Fuel prices will have to continue to decline substantially" before surcharges are rescinded, Mr. Dillon said.

The falling price of oil also may be an ominous sign if it reflects decreased global demand, which would indicate decreased economic activity. The International Energy Agency yesterday revised down its forecast for oil demand growth worldwide this year, "largely due to revisions to North American preliminary data, flat consumption in Europe, and continued demand sluggishness in the Pacific."

In the U.S., energy-demand growth has slowed but not yet fallen. Through early September, gasoline consumption increased 0.8% from the same period last year, less than typical growth of 1.5% to 2% but a "small impact in comparison to the shifts on the supply side," said Mike Burdette, senior analyst at the Energy Information Administration.

Oil, Gas Prices Take A Dive (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

Oil prices plunged below $64 a barrel yesterday and settled 19 percent below this summer's record highs, bringing a major dose of inflation relief to hard-pressed consumers and the economy.

Washington-area drivers have particular reason to rejoice, as gasoline prices here -- in an unusual move -- have dipped a penny below the national average of $2.59 a gallon for regular grade, according to GasBuddy.com yesterday evening, leaving an unexpected dividend of spare change jangling in consumers' pockets that is likely to be quickly deployed into spending on other items.

"Happy days are here again. Let's hope nothing major happens" to send prices back up, said Roy L.C., one of many drivers exulting over the windfall on Internet chat boards yesterday. The drop in oil prices helped spark a 101-point rise in the Dow Jones Industrial Average.

Analysts attribute plummeting oil prices to a worldwide easing of demand in the face of record high prices this summer, as well as the dissipation of geopolitical tensions and threats to oil supplies from Lebanon and Iran to the oil-rich Gulf Coast, which has escaped without a hit so far this hurricane season.

Some analysts say a sea change is occurring in the oil market, and it will not revisit soon the record high of $78.40 set in July by premium crude in New York. Premium crude prices settled at $63.76 a barrel in New York trading yesterday, the lowest since March.

"We're in the midst of a tectonic change," said Peter Beutel, president of Cameron Hanover Inc., an energy consultant. "The rally that's lasted almost five years may be over. We keep seeing lower demand estimates which show the impact of very high prices."

Yesterday, the International Energy Agency trimmed its forecast for world oil demand this year by 100,000 barrels a day, and by 160,000 barrels next year, citing slackening demand in the United States and elsewhere.

At the same time, Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ali al-Naimi, told a conference in Vienna that oil producers plan to invest nearly $100 billion in new oil and gas projects in the next five years to meet rising demand -- raising the prospect of a long-sought easing in the tight supplies that have fueled record oil prices.

Feeding the optimism on Monday, Iraq's oil minister said the war-ridden country hopes to double its oil production to more than 4 million barrels a day in the next five years -- a development that could cause further dramatic drops in oil prices. Though it has the world's second-largest conventional oil reserves, after Saudi Arabia, much of Iraq's production has been idled for years because of a lack of investment and maintenance as well as sabotage by insurgents.

"If we bring security to the country under control, definitely we could double production. We could triple it in 10 years," said Nijyar H. Shemdin, a representative of Iraq's Kurdistan region at a meeting with editors and reporters at The Washington Times yesterday. He said Iraq is producing at 60 percent under its potential.

Many analysts remain wary, however, noting that the tensions in Iraq and elsewhere that have fed high prices have not been resolved. They also point out that oil prices fell precipitously last fall, only to pick up again in the spring and summer.

"Crude and products markets are still dangerously tight, the hurricane season is far from over, and the winter heating season lies ahead," said Eric Chaney, analyst with Morgan Stanley.

While oil prices may rally again this winter, he said he thinks they will fall more substantially in 2007 and 2008 as a result of slower global economic growth, increasing conservation and rising supplies.

In the meantime, however, "lower energy prices will ease global inflation and help the global economy," he said.

David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's Corp., said oil prices have been behaving irrationally and could soar again on "a reheating in the Middle East or an escalation of the confrontation with Iran."

He noted that the oil market has been driven by speculation and fear. "The drop in oil prices occurred because near-term fears of supply interruptions have lessened," he said. "The actual supply-demand balance has not changed."

Falling Oil Prices Fuel Blue Chips To Jump 101.25 (WSJ)

By Ian McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

Tumbling oil prices were just the fuel stocks needed.

Crude-oil futures fell for the seventh consecutive trading session, their longest losing streak in nearly three years. Investors emboldened by the prospect of lower energy prices and better-than-expected earnings from big Wall Street firm Goldman Sachs Group Inc. looked past reports of a record trade gap and a thwarted terrorist attack in Syria and bought stocks by the bushel.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average leapt 101.25 points, or almost 1%, to a four-month high of 11498.09. It is now up more than 7% year-to-date and about 225 points from its all-time high in January 2000.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1%, or 13.57 points, to 1313.11, and the tech-stock-laden Nasdaq Composite jumped about 2%, or 42.57 points, to 2215.82, to inch back into positive territory for the year. The Russell 2000 index of small stocks rose even more, 2.4%.

Treasury bonds also rose, as did the dollar, including its fifth gain in the past six days on the euro.

"The combination of significant pressure on crude and good earnings from Goldman Sachs provided a very positive tone," said Andy Brooks, head of equity trading at T. Rowe Price Group.

Oil-futures contracts for October delivery slipped $1.85, or 2.8%, to $63.76 a barrel at the New York Mercantile Exchange. Crude is at its lowest level since March 22 and down more than 9% over the past week. Other commodities, including gold, which is down 8% over the past five days, fell as well.

Unleaded-gasoline futures dropped 4.25 cents a gallon, or 2.7%, on the Nymex to $1.5521, the lowest close since Feb. 27 and off 9.2% so far this year.

DOJ_NMG_0062241

Oil prices are tumbling for myriad reasons, including a slowing economy, lower demand forecasts, a calm hurricane season and the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' statement Monday that it would keep pumping crude at current levels. Lower energy costs would lighten their drag on corporate profits, cheering investors.

More than two-thirds of the stocks on the New York Stock Exchange were in the black. Many gainers were companies that should benefit from lower energy prices. Shares of General Motors Corp., which could sell more high-margin trucks and sport-utility vehicles if gas prices keep falling, gained more than 4% on the Big Board.

Goldman Sachs, considered a bellwether in the financial-services group, rose 4.8% on the NYSE.

Investors also reacted positively to shake-ups at Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. and Hewlett-Packard Co., which rose 4% and 1.5%, respectively.

Early in the day, the pharmaceutical company's chief executive and general counsel stepped down after a federal monitor pressured the company to fire them. Meanwhile, Patricia Dunn announced plans to step down as H-P chairwoman in January, but remain on the board. The move was triggered by a widening probe of tactics used in a company investigation of leaks by its directors.

At the start of the day investors digested news of a thwarted terrorist attack by Islamic militants at the U.S. embassy in Syria and a report from the Commerce Department saying the trade deficit was a record $68.04 billion in July.

One concern heading into today's trading is that yesterday's gains could have been exaggerated by a flurry of trading driven by options expirations later this week. "With all the expirations later this week, it's going to be a tough market to handicap," says Jeffrey Saut, chief investment strategist at Raymond James Financial.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rallied. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the Big Board was 2.84 billion shares, as 2,521 stocks rose and 815 fell.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year Treasury note rose 7/32, or $2.19 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.775%. The 30-year bond rose 20/32, to yield 4.903%.

The dollar was up. It traded at 117.95 yen, up from 117.59 yen, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2691 from $1.2702.

Falling Oil Prices Help Stocks Rebound (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, September 13, 2006

Oil prices fell a seventh-consecutive session Tuesday, giving investors one less reason to worry about buying stocks.

The suspicion that demand for oil may be cooling, coupled with a major oil discovery last week, knocked crude down $1.85 a barrel to $63.76. Oil has fallen 17.2% from its high on July 14.

Investors are betting lower oil and gas prices will help consumers and businesses navigate a slower-growing economy. That's clear from the Dow Jones industrial average jumping 101.25 points to 11,498.09, contributing to what's turned into a 7.3% gain this year. That's the Dow's highest close since it hit 11,500.73 on May 11, although it's still 225 points away from its all-time high in January 2000 of 11,722.98.

Boosted by computer and electronics retail, home building and photo products stocks, the Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 13.57 points to 1313.11. The index is up 5.2% this year.

And long-lagging tech stocks also got a much-needed lift. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index rose 42.57 points to 2215.82, putting it up 0.5% this year.

There was other bullish news for stocks, other than oil, namely a bigger-than-expected quarterly profit from brokerage Goldman Sachs. The brokerage gained $7.29 to $158.29 and inspired investors to think corporate banking activity remains brisk.

Electronics retailer Best Buy posted strong 22% higher quarterly results. That helped comfort investors worried about how consumer spending would hold up amid $3-a-gallon or higher prices for gas during the summer, says Michael Holland of Holland & Co. “The markets had a huge sigh of relief,” he says. Investors are beginning to focus on the positives, he says. “The bad news has been swallowed by the markets.”

Even so, the stock rally is all about oil, says Michael Farr, president of Farr Miller & Washington. Falling crude prices "take away the storm cloud of the relentless spiral upward … and the fear of when it will stop," he says.

Despite the market's rally, investors are still tentative and could quickly retrench, says Doug Sandler of Wachovia Securities. Much of the rally is the result of portfolio managers sensing oil is in a bear market and betting that will help stocks in the fourth quarter, he says. But just one piece of bad news will shake those investors out, he says: "Portfolio managers have their fingers in the air, trying to tell where the wind is going."

US Trade Gap Hits Record $68bn (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

The US trade deficit surged to its highest ever level in July as the cost of oil imports rose to a record high and exports fell.

But the swelling deficit, which rose much more than expected, will probably fall back again as oil prices have fallen in recent weeks, analysts said.

The trade deficit rose to $68bn in July, up from $64.8bn in June, beating the record set last October of $66.8bn. The consensus had been for $65.5bn but in the end an unexpected fall in exports drove the deficit up.

About one-third of the increase in the July figure came from higher prices for oil imports. But oil prices have dropped to their lowest levels since March this week, after rising to an all time high in July of $77.03 per barrel. The price is now 15 per cent lower.

"The widening of the deficit in July reflected strength in commodity prices, and energy prices in particular, and these price gains are now being reversed," said Mike Englund, an analyst at Action Economics.

"The decline in capital goods exports can be half explained by a $0.6bn drop in aircraft exports, which will be reversed in August."

The value of July exports fell for the first time in five months by $1.3bn to $120bn, while July imports reached an all time high at $188bn, $1.9bn up on June. But exports remained at their second highest level ever.

The fall in exports was led by weakness in capital goods, with aircraft, computers and medical supplies leading the drop.

This year the overall deficit is running at $776bn, which, if met, would set a record for the fifth year in a row.

The politically sensitive deficit to China fell slightly to $19.6bn, but remains on track to exceed the massive $202bn deficit recorded last year, the highest amount ever owed to a single country. The US government has been pushing China to allow its currency to rise in value in order to allow the trade deficit to depreciate.

The worsening trade balance is expected to hold back economic growth this quarter, analysts said.

Trade Deficit Climbs To A Record, Driven By Summer Oil Prices (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The summer swell in oil prices helped push the U.S. trade deficit to a record $68.04 billion in July, a 5% increase from June and the gap's sharpest widening in nearly a year, despite strong exports, the Commerce Department said.

The nation's bill for foreign petroleum totaled $28.48 billion for the month. Imports of all goods and services rose to $188.01 billion, up 1%, from June. But oil wasn't the only factor contributing to the growing trade imbalance. (Read economists' reactions to the data1)

Demand for foreign-made goods showed strength across the board. Imports of industrial supplies, such as iron and steel products, grew $2.18 billion to $54.25 billion in July. Capital-goods imports increased $800 million to $35.46 billion, helped by higher shipments from abroad of computers, medical equipment and drilling and oil-field equipment, among other things. Stronger demand for products like television sets, VCRs, toys and games bolstered imports of consumer goods.

Though overwhelmed by surging imports, U.S. exports came in at $119.97 billion in July. That was down 1.1% from June, but still the second-highest monthly total on record.

DOJ_NMG_0062243

A drop in shipments of U.S.-made civilian aircraft, which fell $603 million to $2.59 billion, helped dim the export picture. But shipments abroad of American-made auto parts and vehicles increased, as did exports of consumer goods ranging from pharmaceutical products to pleasure boats, the Commerce Department said.

The department reported a revised June trade gap of $64.82 billion.

The U.S. is on track this year to shatter last year's total trade deficit of $716.73 billion. And with the gap reaching new heights in July, some analysts backtracked on their expectations of how much foreign trade might contribute to U.S. economic growth in the third quarter. Economist David Greenlaw of Morgan Stanley, for example, cut his forecast for third-quarter growth in gross domestic product to 3.0% from a previous 3.2%.

Significantly, when adjusted for inflation, the trade deficit also rose in July, amid a decline in exports and rise in imports. The inflation-adjusted trade deficit is closely watched by economists because it may better reflect foreign trade's impact on GDP.

Even so, it wasn't clear Tuesday that the deficit's jump in July signaled a fresh upward spiral over the long term. Indeed, with oil prices down from midsummer highs, expectations are growing that the deficit could begin to shrink some in the coming months. Paul Ashworth, senior U.S. economist at research firm Capital Economics suggested the "decline in the price of crude oil should cut roughly $2 billion" from the monthly value of U.S. imports.

The U.S. deficit with China declined somewhat in July, shrinking a little more than $100 million to $19.57 billion. Still, the deficit with China remained the U.S.'s largest with any single country, and trade with China remains a volatile political issue.

In this year's fight for control of Congress, for example, top U.S. steel companies and unions have joined together in an multistate media campaign that blames China, along with India and Brazil, for "stealing American jobs" and urges voters to seek out candidates "willing to stand up for American workers and enforce the trade laws."

Bush Adviser Sees Rise In US Wages Growth (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

After years of stagnation, US wage growth will start to catch up with high productivity and economic growth, according to a senior Bush administration official.

Edward Lazear, chairman of President George W. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, on Tuesday also sought to dispel the increasingly widespread view that the median US employee is suffering from a long-term decline in earnings potential.

Mr Lazear's speech is part of a broader administration campaign to focus on the strong US economy in the build-up to critical mid-term congressional elections on November 7. According to recent polls, up to two-thirds of American voters describe the economy as either "not good" or "poor". Voters consistently cite the state of the economy and the Iraq war as their biggest concerns.

Mr Lazear on Tuesday pointed to a 4.1 per cent increase in nominal workers' compensation in the first six months of this year as evidence that employee remuneration was starting to catch up with productivity growth, which has achieved an average annual 3 per cent increase since the US economic recovery began five years ago.

However, critics of the Bush administration say that real wage growth, which excludes the inflationary cost of healthcare that has fuelled compensation growth, continues to languish at or below annual inflation.

Mr Lazear denied the US economy was facing structural changes that had permanently reduced the earnings potential of most employees. He said the normal acceleration of wage growth had begun later in the cycle than usual – but it had begun.

"Wage growth sometimes lags productivity growth – especially coming out of recessions," he said. "2006 will be a period during which real wage gains begin to catch up with earlier gains in productivity, despite large price hikes in the energy sector."

However, the Bush administration's arguments have been met with growing scepticism among economists who point out that real wages for most Americans are marginally below where they were four years ago, in spite of strong overall growth in gross domestic product. According to the Bureau of Labour Statistics, the average hourly wage for private sector non-farm workers was $8.17 in August 2006 (at 1982 prices) compared with $8.23 in August 2002.

Growth in average compensation has been higher than real wage growth owing to the higher cost to employers of healthcare provision and insurance. Medical inflation usually outstrips general inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0062244

"The Bush administration continues to tell us what will happen in its view rather than what is actually happening," said Rob Shapiro, head of the New Democrat Network's Globalisation Initiative, a centrist advocacy group. "Median wage stagnation is about a structural shift in the US economy because of globalisation and nothing that Mr Lazear has said has altered this view."

Back, And Stronger (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

JUST A FEW MONTHS AFTER 9/11, Osama bin Laden boasted that the attacks had "hit hard the American economy at its heart and its core." If they did, the effect was transitory. In all the commemorations and assessments on the anniversary of 9/11, the resilience of the U.S. economy has attracted less notice than it deserves.

Bin Laden was not alone in his analysis. In the United States, there were warnings of burdensome security costs, sharp business cutbacks and recession on the horizon. Some estimated that the immediate cost of the attacks — including lost life, property and economic output — would approach $170 billion. The longer-term effects, they implied, were almost unimaginable.

Then Americans enjoyed five years of strong productivity and corporate profits, a booming real estate market and rising trade volumes.

It's tempting, and to some degree justified, to chalk up the apparent success to some inherent superiority of the U.S. economy. A recession was already underway on 9/11, but Fed policy and tax cuts fueled a strong recovery. According to a recent report from the World Trade Organization, globalization continued apace, as most major transnational corporations said they would not delay or cancel investment projects in reaction to worldwide terror.

Although private- and public-sector security spending ballooned to $90 billion last year — in a $13-trillion economy — technology had already created efficiencies in U.S. businesses that offset many of the new costs. Entrepreneurs found ways to profit from the security-industrial complex.

Meanwhile, sectors hit directly by the attacks, such as travel, bounced back. Analysts estimate that airlines lost about $40 billion and 150,000 jobs in the wake of 9/11 as passenger traffic plummeted in 2001 and 2002. But last year, a record 670.4 million passengers flew on U.S. carriers.

Another terrorist strike, in the U.S. or abroad, could still do untold damage to the economy. But nowadays economists tend to be less concerned about such a possibility (or unnecessary spending to protect against it) than about high energy costs or a real estate bust. Both would be worrisome, of course. But those kinds of worries are in a whole different category than the fear of a terrorist attack.

Look Who Got A Raise (NYT)

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Fearing inflation, investors were spooked recently by a government report showing that companies have spent a lot of money of late on their employees. Annual labor costs were up in the second quarter by 4.9 percent, nearly a point higher than initially estimated. That came on top of a much bigger than expected increase in the first quarter.

Compensation is business's biggest expense, so rising labor costs — if passed on to consumers — could certainly push up prices. But so far, there are no clear signs of that happening. Instead, today's rising labor costs seem to reflect a different economic phenomenon: growing income inequality.

The big jump in labor costs in the first quarter appears to be driven by fat bonuses and stock options — not hefty increases in wages and salaries, the financial lifeblood of most Americans. One-off shots of income do not portend higher inflation because they reflect activity that already happened. And they don't translate into more money for most people. According to David A. Rosenberg, an economist for Merrill Lynch, the huge upward revision in first-quarter labor costs worked out to some $80 billion on an annual basis that flowed to "a lot of well-heeled folks cashing in their stocks."

Rising labor costs also reflect the high cost of employees' health insurance. Unfortunately, that expense doesn't imply better coverage, only higher prices for even a bare-bones plan. The more insurance costs, the more it eats into take-home pay, without making up for the loss with better benefits.

When statisticians talk about "labor costs" and economists — and politicians — talk about "compensation," they mean all forms of earned income, like wages, salaries, bonuses and stock options, plus benefits, like insurance and pensions. Measured that way, employees don't look too terribly squeezed. But for most workers, increases in wages or salaries, if any, have been steadily eroded by inflation while health insurance, if any, costs more and covers less.

Wage Debate Pits Workers Vs. Businesses (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, September 13, 2006

DENVER — The 11 workers at Jim Noon's company, which makes cardboard boxes and packaging, earn well above the federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour. Even so, the Denver businessman opposes — "for all sorts of reasons" — a Colorado ballot measure that would raise the state's minimum hourly wage to $6.85.

Noon says the initiative to amend the state constitution would exert pressure to increase all salaries and signal the state is not business-friendly. On a philosophical level, he says, "the state constitution shouldn't have dollar figures; it should have concepts."

In the western part of the state, in Delta, Traci Woodson's support for the initiative is personal. The 26-year-old single mother of two is a home-based child care provider who works at least 95 hours a week. She is paid an average of $5.77 an hour for looking after children from 6 a.m. to 10:30 p.m. and sometimes overnight. If the measure passes, her pay would rise because the amount the state pays for her low-income clients' child care needs is pegged to the minimum wage.

"You can't make it on the minimum wage," Woodson says. In Delta, the average cost to rent a three-bedroom house is about $650 a month, and people frequently work two or three low-wage jobs, she says.

Voters in Colorado and five other states — Arizona, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio — will decide the issue in ballot measures Nov. 7 to raise the minimum wage.

Nine years after Congress last raised the federal minimum wage, "states are realizing families can't support themselves on a little under $11,000 a year," says Liana Fox, an analyst with the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank in Washington, D.C. By December, Fox says, this will be "the longest stretch without an increase since 1938, when the minimum wage was first enacted."

Nationally, about 5.6 million workers would benefit from an increase in the minimum wage; 835,000 of them are in the states with ballot initiatives, estimates the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal Washington think tank. The Labor Department says about 1.9 million people are paid the minimum wage or less but says that figure is "understated" because it includes only hourly, not salaried, workers.

The department says about half of minimum-wage workers are younger than 25, and about three-fifths work in the hospitality and leisure industries, mostly in restaurants and bars.

Backing the state campaigns to raise the minimum wage are labor unions, advocacy groups for the working poor — such as the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now and 9to5, the National Association of Working Women — and religious organizations.

"A lot of us who work in the low- and middle-income communities hear regularly from folks about the cost of housing, gas, child care and health care. And we're tired of waiting for the politicians to wake up and discover this might be an important issue," says Bill Vandenberg of the Colorado Progressive Coalition.

Opponents include chambers of commerce and associations representing hotels, restaurants and small businesses.

In Colorado, opponents argue that raising the minimum wage would cut entry-level jobs. They also say they're defending the state constitution.

Jan Rigg, a spokeswoman for Respect Colorado's Constitution, says if Colorado's minimum wage rises to $6.85, it would be among the highest in the country. She says the measure has no exceptions for small businesses or young workers, as some other states have. She also says if the state's economy falters, "we have no ability to fix it" through legislative action.

Polls in several of the states show strong support for raising the minimum wage. In Missouri, a St. Louis Post-Dispatch poll this month found 68% favored the increase. In Nevada, a survey in the Las Vegas Review-Journal last month showed 74% support. In Arizona, a poll in March showed 81% support.

"There are a lot of voters who are more motivated to get to the polls to raise the minimum wage than by any other issue," says Sara Howard, a spokeswoman for the Give Missourians a Raise campaign. The issue, she says, could help Democrats unseat Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who has not taken a position, and faces Democrat Claire McCaskill, who supports the measure.

Democrats hoping the wage initiatives could tip key congressional races by boosting turnout may be disappointed, says Paul Taylor of the Pew Research Center. He points to the 11 states in 2004 that had ballot measures against same-sex marriage, which supposedly increased GOP turnout. He says both the turnout and the percentage of votes President Bush received in those states were very close to what they were four years earlier.

Even so, there is some "tactical potential" for Democrats in the wage campaigns, Taylor says. "If races are close enough, everything matters."

Minimum Wage Laws Multiply In States (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, September 13, 2006

DENVER — This year's elections could be a watershed in the nearly 70-year history of the federal minimum wage: For the first time, a majority of states could require higher pay than the federal rate of $5.15 an hour.

This year, 10 states have enacted laws mandating a higher minimum than federal law requires. Twenty-three states and the District of Columbia are now above that threshold.

On Nov. 7, voters in six other states will decide ballot measures that would raise the minimum wage to as much as $6.85 an hour with automatic adjustments for inflation. Some of the states would allow lower pay at small businesses and for workers who receive tips.

Initiatives to change the base pay rate — by amending the state constitution or changing state law — will be on the ballot in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio.

If they all pass, it would equal the number of minimum wage ballot measures adopted in the 14-year span ending in 2004, says Jennie Bowser, a policy analyst with the National Conference of State Legislatures. "I expect to see most or all of them pass," she says. "I imagine it's going to be a pretty popular subject."

The battles over the minimum wage come as government figures show wages are not keeping up with inflation and amid fierce contests to control Congress.

Supporters for raising the minimum wage such as Liana Fox with the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank, say inflation has eaten away the last increase by Congress in 1997. Raising the wage from $5.15 to $6.85 an hour would boost a worker's annual pay from $10,712 to $14,248.

Opponents say the pay raise would hurt businesses such as restaurants that depend on lower-wage workers, and would be a setback for entry-level employees.

"There will be fewer jobs for teenagers and low-income workers who come in to get a skill," says Jan Rigg, spokeswoman for Respect Colorado's Constitution, a business coalition opposing the increase. "This isn't a debate about haves and have-nots, it's about what we all want: a good workforce."

All six states with minimum wage increases on the ballot are major election battlegrounds this fall. Montana, Ohio and Missouri have Senate contests rated as tossups by The Cook Political Report. Arizona, Ohio, Colorado and Nevada have competitive governors' contests. Arizona, Colorado and Ohio have some of the most closely watched House elections in the country.

Brookings Institution scholar Matt Fellowes says Democrats hope the wage initiatives will draw more of their voters to the polls and underscore "that under Republicans, financial insecurity has increased."

The minimum wage measures also reflect frustration with Washington and state legislatures that have failed to approve raises, Fellowes says. Republicans control Congress and one or both legislative branches in four of the six states with ballot measures this fall.

DOJ_NMG_0062247

In July, the House approved a GOP-led effort to tie a $2.10 increase in the minimum wage to a permanent cut in the estate tax and other tax breaks. Senate Democrats blocked the measure. In June, the Senate defeated a Democratic effort to raise the wage to $7.25.

Chafee Beats Back Senate Challenger In Rhode Island (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rhode Island Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee beat back a very tough primary challenge from Cranston, R.I., Mayor Steve Laffey to run for re-election, an outcome national Republican Party officials believe will give them the best chance of holding the seat in midterm elections.

Mr. Chafee's victory was substantially aided by a roughly $1 million infusion of cash from Washington Republican Party committees to run ads and flood mailboxes with fliers criticizing Mr. Laffey, a tough-talking social conservative. It is a strategy of lavish spending Republicans used earlier this year to hold onto to the House seat of California Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who pleaded guilty to bribery. That race cost the national party $5 million.

But it remains unclear if the Republicans can spend that kind of cash to defend a growing list of contested incumbent elections in the general election. In Rhode Island, the two candidates spent more than $2 million apiece, and the race, while not the most expensive, is considered one of the Ocean State's most negative and bitter contests.

Mr. Chafee, 53 years old, was appointed to the Senate in 1999 after his father, Sen. John Chafee, died in office. He won election the following year and quickly staked out a fiercely independent profile. He voted against the Iraq war, many of the White House tax cuts and publicly admitted he didn't vote to re-elect President Bush, writing in a vote for the president's father, former President George H.W. Bush, instead. While his positions frustrated his party, most analysts believed they reflected the state's electorate and made him the only Republican likely to hold the seat.

Mr. Laffey, 44, a former investment banker, had tapped into that anger to rally the party's core conservatives to his campaign. He was supported by the conservative Club for Growth, a Washington-based antitax group that funneled more than a half-million to his campaign. He conceded the race with roughly 70% of the voting reported and trailing 54% to 46%.

The Rhode Island seat isn't safe yet for Republicans, though. Early polls have shown a close race between Mr. Chafee and Democratic nominee Sheldon Whitehouse, a popular former attorney general who is flush with cash.

R.I.'s Chafee Fends Off GOP Challenger (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, the most liberal Republican in the Senate, beat back a tough primary challenge Tuesday from conservative Stephen Laffey.

Chafee had been imperiled by the same forces that cost three-term Sen. Joe Lieberman the Democratic nomination in neighboring Connecticut last month. Lieberman, one of the Senate's most conservative Democrats, lost to anti-war candidate Ned Lamont and is now running as an independent.

Chafee used his maverick record to appeal to independent voters, who are allowed to vote in the Rhode Island primary.

“The message is that Rhode Island is still a more liberal Republican Party than the Republican Party nationally,” says Victor Profughi, a retired political science professor at Rhode Island College. “And it means we'll have a competitive race in Rhode Island” for the Senate in November.

He said Chafee's stiff challenge reflected anti-incumbent sentiment and a push by Democratic and Republican activists to draw sharper partisan lines this year.

At a victory party, Chafee thanked “Republicans, independents and disaffiliated Democrats” for supporting him. “Strict party discipline must not prevail over the spirit of compromise that is so essential to our American democracy,” he declared to cheers.

Chafee's battles aren't over: He now faces former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse, who won the Democratic nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0062248

The race is rated a toss-up, and Democrats have targeted it as one of the six Republican-held seats they need to pick up to win Senate control.

Backed by the anti-tax Club for Growth, Laffey, the mayor of Cranston, attacked Chafee for voting against tax cuts and in favor of spending projects that Laffey labeled pork. Chafee also has riled some Republicans by opposing the Iraq war and the confirmation of Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito.

Still, Chafee benefited from what political scientist Darrell West of Brown University calls "a golden name" in Rhode Island: Chafee's late father, John, served as governor and senator.

Moderate GOP Senator Beats Conservative Challenger In R.I. (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I., Sept. 12 -- Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee, a moderate who has frequently clashed with the Bush administration, beat back a strong conservative challenger Tuesday night in the GOP primary in Rhode Island.

The victory came amid heavy turnout, after the same Republican establishment that Chafee has so often defied rallied to his side with money and logistical support for a vigorous get-out-the-vote effort. While there is little personal affection for Chafee at the White House, operatives there and in the Republican Party leadership calculated that he is the GOP's best chance of holding the seat in a Democratic-leaning state in November.

The Chafee win represented a rare bit of political good news for Republicans, who are struggling to retain control of both houses of Congress in a highly volatile election year, as polls showing voters to be increasingly frustrated with GOP leadership. President Bush's dismal approval ratings, fueled in large part by public frustration with the war in Iraq, threatens Republican incumbents around the country who are on the ballot this year.

Stephen Laffey, the blustery, populist mayor of Cranston, had sought to become the second challenger to topple a senator in a primary this year, after Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman's loss to Ned Lamont in Connecticut's Democratic primary last month. In the end, however, a race that for weeks had been widely viewed as neck and neck fell decisively in line for Chafee, who was commanding 54 percent of the vote with 99 percent of returns counted.

Chafee's hurdles are hardly over. Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, who like Chafee is a well-known Rhode Island political figure, also secured his party's nomination Tuesday night over negligible opposition. Whitehouse was not a top choice of Democratic Party recruiters,but has led Chafee in recent polls.

Although Chafee escaped the Laffey threat, Democrats believe he compromised his general election chances by waging a negative campaign marked by pointed attack ads and by accepting such high-profile Republican Party help. The senator himself expressed regret last week that the tone of the campagn had turned nasty. But, he pointed out, "negative ads do work."

But they also clash with his low-key, almost diffident personal style and expressed loathing of glovers-off partisanship. "When Lincoln Chafee -- an incumbent Republican senator -- can barely win his own primary, you know he'll have trouble in the general election," said Sen. Chuck Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Senate Democrats' campaign committee.

National GOP officials feared that if Chafee lost, Democrats would almost certainly win the Senate seat in November, one of six they must pick up to reclaim control of the chamber. National Republican officials who are backing Chafee announced last week that they would pull their resources out of Rhode Island should Laffey prevail, effectively conceding the election to Democrats.

"This is my 10th run for office . . . and I've never had one like this," said Chafee, the son of the late senator John H. Chafee and a former Warwick mayor and City Council member. He said the vote was an endorsement of the "spirit of compromise" that he has tried to uphold. Then he reminded supporters that a whole new battle is beginning. "It will take everything we've got," Chafee said.

Rhode Island was one of nine states that held primaries Tuesday, the last big day of party battles before the November elections. The GOP faced a similar intraparty conflict in Arizona in the contest to succeed retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R), a longtime member of the House Appropriations Committee. Republicans chose between Randy Graf, a conservative firebrand running hard against illegal immigration, and state Rep. Steve Huffman, a moderate who was backed by Kolbe and the national party.

DOJ_NMG_0062249

In New Hampshire, Democrats who oppose the Iraq war showed their strength again, just as they had in the Lieberman-Lamont election. In the 1st Congressional District, Carol Shea-Porter stressed antiwar themes in her upset victory over party-backed Jim Craig in the contest to take on Rep. Jeb Bradley (R).

Meanwhile, Arizona state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords and former Tucson anchorwoman Patty Weiss battled for the Democratic nomination. Democratic officials say they are confident that if Graf wins the GOP primary, either Giffords or Weiss could beat him in November in the race for the swing seat.

But the contest in Rhode Island has the most potential to change the political map. With control of the Senate seat at stake, the national Republican Party recently began a series of television commercials and mobilized its get-out-the-vote effort in a bid to save Chafee from defeat. The maverick senator has opposed President Bush on many issues and voted against the president in 2004.

But the national party rallied behind Chafee, nonetheless, convinced that Laffey was too conservative to win in the heavily Democratic state. A huge final-hour turnout effort appeared to have paid off, with over 63,000 ballots cast, by far a state record for a GOP primary.

In contrast to Chafee's patrician and somewhat diffident style, Laffey was assertive and hard-charging, and he proved highly effective on the campaign trail. He argued that Chafee's independence from the GOP has made him almost irrelevant and that his unpredictable voting patterns suggest a political identity crisis.

The race turned ugly in the final days, with accusations of dirty tricks, and the harshest attacks aimed at Laffey. The intense atmosphere was highly unusual in a state that barely rates on the national political radar. Voters reported receiving a dozen pieces of mail in one day and their phones ringing 15 times in 10 minutes, all political pitches.

Laffey's strong campaign suggested a worrisome trend to Republicans about their base supporters: that intolerance for moderates had grown so intense that they were willing to sacrifice a Senate seat -- and possibly control of the Senate -- to punish unreliable politicians.

The mayor's core supporters were Republicans who disliked Chafee's moderate views, but he also also appealed to middle-class independent voters who are uneasy about Congress's inattention to issues they care about, such as education and health care. Those voters think only an outsider can shake up Washington, and in Laffey's case, they were willing to overlook ideological differences.

"I ran as a reformer," Laffey told supporters Tuesday night, conceding the race and endorsing Chafee. "We take ideas any day."

Meanwhile, in Minnesota, Democrats chose state Rep. Keith Ellison from a field of four main candidates for a Minneapolis House seat being vacated by retiring Rep. Martin O. Sabo (D). In a heavily Democratic district, he is on track to become the first Muslim to serve in Congress.

In New York, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) was nominated for a second term, while Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer won victory as the Democratic nominee for governor.

In a majority-black district in Brooklyn, City Council member David Yassky, the only white candidate in a four-way contest that raised racial tensions, lost to Yvette Clarke in the Democratic primary to replace retiring Rep. Major R. Owens.

In Setback For Democrats, Incumbent Wins Republican Senate Primary (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island won the Republican primary there on Tuesday, fending off a bid from a populist challenger that the national Republican Party had feared would cost it a seat it had held since 1976 in an overwhelmingly Democratic state.

The race was the most closely watched contest in the nine primaries across the country on Tuesday, in a year when Democrats are hoping to capitalize on anti-incumbent sentiment to take control of one or both houses of Congress.

Mr. Chafee's victory, with 53 percent of the vote, dealt the Democrats a big setback in their bid for control of the Senate. The state is crucial to their goal of winning six seats. Polls had shown Mr. Chafee's challenger, Stephen Laffey, running far behind Sheldon Whitehouse, who won the Democratic nomination on Tuesday, and the national Republican Party said it would cede hopes of keeping the seat if Mr. Laffey won.

Mr. Chafee's nomination keeps the race alive until November, with polls showing him and Mr. Whitehouse running even, and guarantees that the national parties will continue to pour money into what has already been a nasty and expensive contest.

Mr. Chafee, the most famously liberal Republican in the Senate and a scion of one of the state's "five families," told supporters gathered at the Biltmore Hotel in Providence that his victory had been a groundswell of "diehard Republicans, independents, and disaffiliated Democrats," who "united behind the cause of honest, independent leadership." He spoke of Republicans' "proud history" in New England.

"Our goal has always been to find the common ground for the common good," he said. "Polarization, partisanship and strict party discipline must not prevail over the spirit of compromise that is so essential to our American democracy."

National Republican organizations spent vast amounts of money on either side, with antitax groups deriding Mr. Chafee as a "Republican in name only" and the National Republican Senatorial Committee overlooking his rejection of much of the party's agenda to campaign fiercely on his behalf. The committee started running pro-Chafee advertisements nearly a year ago, and spent $750,000 on his behalf in the last month alone.

Senator Elizabeth Dole, the committee's chairwoman, congratulated him in a statement for a "hard-earned victory," and added, "Senator Chafee's independent, honest leadership drove a historic turnout and clearly shows he is in a great position to win in November."

More than 63,000 votes were cast, far outpacing the previous record of about 45,000 votes in a Republican primary in Rhode Island.

Democrats were in no mood to give up the fight.

"When Lincoln Chafee, an incumbent Republican senator, can barely win his own primary, you know he'll have trouble in the general election," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is leading the Democrats' effort to win the Senate. "Rhode Islanders, more than voters in any other state, know we need a new direction and real change in this country, which is why Sheldon Whitehouse will be the next U.S. senator from Rhode Island."

Mr. Laffey, who campaigned door to door across the state in a recreational vehicle with his wife and five children in tow, even as the national Republicans ridiculed him, conceded shortly before 11 p.m., saying he would vote for Mr. Chafee in November. "The voters have spoken," he said, and added, with a nod to his family and the citizens of Cranston who elected him mayor, "A lot of things have worked out very well. This election didn't."

In the District of Columbia, Adrian M. Fenty, a City Council member, defeated Linda W. Cropp, the Council's longtime chairwoman, with 57 percent in the Democratic mayoral primary, making him the presumptive mayor in the heavily Democratic city.

In Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, easily won the Republican nomination in the contest to replace Senator Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat who is retiring after 30 years.

Mr. Steele, a rising star in the party who would be the first black Republican in the Senate if elected, declared victory in the primary at his campaign headquarters in Greenbelt shortly after 10 p.m. He will face either Representative Benjamin L. Cardin or Kweisi Mfume, the former head of the N.A.A.C.P., who led 16 other Democratic candidates.

The results in Maryland were coming in slowly after election problems early in the day. Some polls opened late, and voters were turned away at others.

A Circuit Court judge in Montgomery County ordered that polls be kept open an hour later, until 9 p.m., as did one in Baltimore, after a lawsuit filed by the Maryland Democratic Party and the N.A.A.C.P.

In Minnesota, Keith Ellison, a state legislator, won the Democratic Congressional nomination in the heavily Democratic Fifth District, defeating three rivals to put him on a path to become the first Muslim member of Congress.

Chafee Wins In Pivotal R.I. Race (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062251

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- Sen. Lincoln Chafee, with the backing of the national Republican Party, last night secured a solid victory over conservative Republican challenger Stephen Laffey in the most closely watched race on a night when nine states and the District held primaries.

With 99 percent of precincts reporting, the liberal Mr. Chafee had 34,042 votes, or 54 percent, to 29,431 votes (46 percent) for Mr. Laffey, the Cranston mayor who was backed by the free-market advocacy group Club for Growth.

"To the voters of Rhode Island, thank you," Mr. Chafee told a screaming crowd of supporters at the Biltmore Hotel in Providence. He said the victory was a validation of independent-minded Rhode Island and an endorsement of leaders who have the "guts" to take difficult votes and work across the aisle.

Mr. Chafee's Democratic challenger, Sheldon Whitehouse, got 82 percent of the vote against two other candidates in the Democratic primary.

Elsewhere, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton easily beat anti-war challenger Jonathan Tasini in that state's Democratic primary, clearing the way for a November matchup against Republican underdog John Spencer, the former mayor of Yonkers.

In Vermont, independent Rep. Bernard Sanders won the Democratic nomination for the Senate seat of retiring Sen. James M. Jeffords, while businessman Richard Tarrant took an early lead in the Republican Senate primary.

In Arizona, four Republicans, including Don Goldwater, nephew of the late Barry Goldwater, competed for the nomination to challenge Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano. In Minnesota, Democratic state Rep. Keith Ellison was leading in his race for an open House seat that would make him the first Muslim in Congress.

The battle between Mr. Chafee and Mr. Laffey was in the spotlight yesterday because national Republicans said it was key to their party's hope of maintaining its Senate majority. They insisted that Mr. Chafee, who has bucked his party on issues such as tax cuts and abortion, has the only shot in this left-leaning state to beat a Democratic challenge and win the general election in November.

National Republicans ran ads, sent volunteers and gave resources to help Mr. Chafee win.

But Republicans in Rhode Island were split. Mr. Chafee faced a notable challenge from Mr. Laffey, who is pro-life, pledged to cut taxes and won the support of the Club For Growth. The national group spent $500,000 in Rhode Island and ran ads bashing Mr. Chafee as a tax-and-spend liberal.

The bitter primary here highlighted an ideological fight within the Republican Party, which played out along the same lines in an Arizona primary to fill the House seat left open by retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe. Local Republicans were angered when the national party intervened to support state Rep. Steve Huffman, a moderate who in a recent poll was trailing a former state lawmaker, Randy Graf, who is focused on halting illegal immigration.

The Republican infighting has been compared to the test Democrats faced in Connecticut last month, when they ousted Joe Lieberman in favor of a more liberal Democrat who they felt was more in line with their party's values.

Likewise, some Rhode Island Republicans are tired of Mr. Chafee's left-leaning tendencies.

"Chafee, to me, is a Democrat in a Republican jacket," said 37-year-old Michael Camardo of Cranston, who supported Mr. Laffey. Mr. Camardo said Mr. Chafee probably has a better chance of winning in November, but added, "I have to vote my conscience."

But Mr. Chafee, known for his maverick stands against President Bush and his party, retains support in this Democratic state where most voters register as independent -- known locally as "unaffiliated."

"I like his independence," Barbara Brogan, 74, of Cranston, said of Mr. Chafee yesterday, after she voted for him at the Daniel D. Waterman Elementary School.

Club for Growth President Pat Toomey said that regardless of the outcome, the close primary contest showed that "voters still care about pocketbook issues like lower taxes, lower spending and less government waste." The strength of Mr. Laffey's challenge "shows that the power of our ideas will be an influential factor in this election cycle."

Mr. Chafee still faces a tough challenge in November, with polls showing a close race between him and Mr. Whitehouse.

Voters In Nine States Pick Candidates For November (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2006

Voters from Arizona to Vermont cast ballots in hard-fought primary battles on Tuesday, soundly renominating New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and effectively choosing Adrian Fenty as mayor of the nation's capital.

On the busiest primary day of the year, Rep. Ben Cardin was leading former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume for the Democratic Senate nomination in Maryland. The winner will face Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the Republican Party's best hope for electing an African-American to major statewide office this year.

Voting glitches in Baltimore and Montgomery County, Maryland's largest voting jurisdiction, prompted Circuit Court judges to order polls there to stay open for an extra hour, until 9 p.m.

In Montgomery County, a Washington suburb, election officials had failed to deliver computer cards to start electronic voting machines when polls opened at 7 a.m., forcing some voters to use paper ballots. In Baltimore, some election judges failed to show up on time.

In Arizona, conservative Republican Randy Graf, a former state legislator and pro golfer, was tapping voter concern about illegal immigration in a race against state Rep. Steve Huffman, a moderate Republican backed by party leaders for a tossup House district that stretches from Tucson to the Mexican border.

Meanwhile, a Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday had good news for Democrats hoping to pick up the 15 seats they need to regain control of the House. By 53%-41%, registered voters in a generic ballot test — that is, one without candidates' names — said they were inclined to support the Democratic candidate in their district over the Republican.

The Democratic advantage on the question was 6 percentage points in January and surged as high as 15 points in the spring. Three weeks ago, it had narrowed to 2 points. That survey was taken in the wake of arrests in London of suspects accused of planning to blow up American airliners.

“This election cycle was defined six months ago and nothing has really changed it,” said Chuck Todd of the online political newsletter Hotline.

“The only question is whether it's going to be a good year or a great one to be a Democrat.”

Democrats are more energized: By 47%-42%, they said they were more enthusiastic about voting in November than usual. By 47%-40%, Republicans said they were less enthusiastic.

The telephone survey of 1,002 adults has a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points. The subsample of 925 registered voters has an error margin of +/-4 points.

The race that got the most national attention Tuesday was the Republican primary in Democratic Rhode Island, where Sen. Lincoln Chafee beat back a challenge from Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey.

Among contests in eight other states — Arizona, Delaware, Maryland, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New York, Vermont and Wisconsin — and the District of Columbia:

•In D.C., Fenty decisively defeated City Council Chairwoman Linda Cropp for the Democratic bid for mayor. His victory in the overwhelmingly Democratic city all but guarantees election in November.

•In Minnesota, state Rep. Keith Ellison was leading former state Democratic-Farmer-Labor party chairman Mike Erlandson in a battle for the Democratic nomination for a House seat in Minneapolis and its suburbs. If nominated and elected, Ellison would be the first Muslim in Congress.

•In New York, in a battle for a Brooklyn House seat that spotlighted racial divisions, New York City Councilwoman Yvette Clarke and City Councilman David Yassky were leading. Yassky was seeking to become the first white representative from the district since political pioneer Shirley Chisholm won it four decades ago. The other contenders included Chris Owens, who hoped to succeed his father, Major Owens.

•Also in New York, Clinton swept more than eight in 10 votes, trouncing anti-war challenger Jonathan Tasini. Ex-Yonkers mayor John Spencer won the GOP nomination to face her.

Spitzer And Cuomo Win In N.Y. Primary (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

DOJ_NMG_0062253

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer won the Democratic nomination for New York governor tonight, with his party hoping he will lead it to a potentially historic moment this November: a sweep of top statewide offices.

Andrew M. Cuomo won the Democratic nomination for attorney general, and Senator Hillary Clinton won renomination for a second term in the Senate. In the day's most closely contested major race, Yvette D. Clarke won the primary for a Congressional seat in Brooklyn.

The election in New York was one of nine primaries around the nation. In Rhode Island, Lincoln Chafee, the Senate's most famously liberal Republican, held off a conservative challenger, Stephen Laffey, in a nasty contest fueled by huge amounts of money from national Republican groups on both sides. With 83 percent of the state's precincts reporting, Mr. Chafee had 54.4 percent of the vote to Mr. Laffey's 45.6 percent, and Mr. Laffey conceded defeat.

Mr. Spitzer's battle ended with a concession speech by his opponent, Nassau County Executive Thomas R. Suozzi, who said he would support Mr. Spitzer's fall campaign. Mr. Spitzer had 81 percent of the vote, while Mr. Suozzi had 19 percent, with 95 percent of the precincts reporting.

Mr. Cuomo won 52.8 percent of the votes in his contest against a fixture of New York City politics, Mark Green, who had 32.5 percent of the vote with 96 percent of the precincts reporting. Sean Moloney had 9.5 percent of the votes, and Charles King received 5.1 percent.

The Cuomo-Green race was among the most bitter of the year: Mr. Green, a former city public advocate and candidate for mayor in 2001, ran television ads excoriating Mr. Cuomo's ethics, while Mr. Cuomo aggressively sought the restoration of his family's political dynasty — in decline after his father, Mario M. Cuomo, the state's last Democratic governor, lost in 1994, and Mr. Cuomo lost his own bid for governor in 2002.

Mrs. Clinton's contest carried broad significance as well. By showing strength among a relatively liberal, antiwar primary electorate, she demonstrated that her vote for military action in Iraq in 2002 did not damage her political standing as it did with Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, who lost his bid for a third re-nomination last month to an antiwar challenger, Ned Lamont.

Her little-known opponent in the New York race, a union organizer named Jonathan Tasini, tried to tap into antiwar sentiments in New York, yet he had little money and did not effectively turn the race into a message-sending moment about Iraq. With 95 percent of the precincts reporting, Mrs. Clinton had 83.2 percent of the votes and Mr. Tasini had 16.8 percent.

In the Republican race to challenge Mrs. Clinton this fall, John Spencer, a conservative former Yonkers mayor, defeated a former Reagan administration aide, Kathleen Troia McFarland, a moderate. Mr. Spencer had 60.3 percent of the votes to 39.7 percent for Ms. McFarland with 95 percent of precincts reporting. The Republican candidates for governor and attorney general, John Faso and Jeanine F. Pirro, did not face primary contests.

With a degree of unity, endorsements and money that they have rarely enjoyed before, New York Democrats appeared positioned to become an exceptionally dominant party in the state. They have never held the top statewide offices and both Senate seats in modern history; indeed, Republicans came closer during the Rockefeller era in the 1970's, when Jacob K. Javits and James L. Buckley were senators and Louis J. Lefkowitz was attorney general. (Only State Comptroller Arthur Levitt was a Democrat.)

The last time one party controlled the statewide offices and both Senate seats was 1949 — all Republicans.

Democrats have been growing in number faster than Republicans since 2000, adding 530,000 for a total of 5.5 million party members, compared with 54,000 more Republicans for a total of 3.1 million. Yet a Democrat has not held the governor's office since 1994 and the New York City mayor's office since 1993.

Mr. Spitzer has proved exceptionally popular for his prosecutions of white-collar crime, and his running mate, State Senator David A. Paterson, and Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi are also well-regarded. Mrs. Clinton and the state's senior senator, Charles E. Schumer, have high approval ratings.

Turnout appeared relatively light across the state, with Mr. Green and Mr. Cuomo hanging on whether Democrats would turn out to vote in closely fought races in Queens and Brooklyn — and cast ballots in the attorney general's race as well. In one mistake, roughly 200,000 New York voters who had recently moved were given the wrong information about where they could vote, according to officials at the city's Board of Elections.

Mr. Green, who has also run for United States Senate twice before, has not said if a loss will end his quest for elective office. At 61, he has said only that he will continue to teach and write if he loses, yet has not ruled out running again.

He had hoped to overcome Mr. Cuomo's financial and labor advantages by leveraging newspaper endorsements, including one from The New York Times, and riding relatively high turnout in a Brooklyn race. That four-person contest for a historically black Congressional seat in Brooklyn was won by one of three black candidates, Ms. Clarke. She and a white candidate, David Yassky, both members of the City Council, had been favored in polls in recent days. With 93 percent of the precincts reporting, Ms. Clarke had 30 percent of the votes and Mr. Yassky had 27 percent. Carl Andrews had 22 percent, and Chris Owens had 20 percent.

The Republican candidate for governor, Mr. Faso, a former State Assembly leader, spent the day campaigning in Plattsburgh and courting donors, as well as trying to dampen the glow of the Spitzer victory in the coming news media coverage.

"I know what the conventional wisdom says, and I know there's a desire on the part of some to cancel the general election and just coronate Mr. Spitzer," Mr. Faso said in a phone interview.

"But I think when people figure out that he has pursued a lot of dubious cases as A.G., at the expense of the public interest, and at the expense of going after Medicaid fraud, and when they realize his agenda will mean much higher taxes for New Yorkers, I don't think they'll vote for them," Mr. Faso said.

Mr. Spitzer, his advisers noted, has repeatedly said he has no plans to raise taxes. The Democratic candidate has made billions of dollars in spending promises during this campaign, however, and his advisers said that Mr. Spitzer would continue offering details this fall to show how he would pay for his proposals.

Mr. Spitzer plans to continue his television ad campaign for at least another week, though he has no new commercials yet for the general election. He had about $12 million on hand at the start of September. He is not re-calibrating his political message for the general election, his advisers say; he will focus this fall on delivering more policy speeches, preparing for his two debates against Mr. Faso in Ithaca and Buffalo, and wrapping up his work as attorney general for the last eight years.

Mr. Faso said he was planning an aggressive campaign strategy centered on two themes: Cutting taxes and criticizing Mr. Spitzer's performance in office, which has been criticized by some Wall Street executives and legal analysts — as well as Mr. Suozzi — as coercive and destructively anti-business.

Yet Mr. Faso also acknowledged that he is not nearly as well known as Mr. Spitzer, and he may face the same problems as Mr. Suozzi in spreading his message and raising his profile.

Mr. Suozzi spent more than $8 million this year and never moved in the opinion polls. Mr. Faso has struggled to raise money, and reported having only $1.5 million on hand in his last campaign finance report, in July. He has not been able to afford to buy television time since his starting announcement on Valentine's Day; Republicans close to Mr. Faso said he may start broadcasting ads as early as next week.

Spitzer advisers declined to say if they would expend some of their new political capital on Democratic allies in tight Congressional and State Senate races. Democrats need to win five seats to take control of the State Senate, which would make governing far easier for Mr. Spitzer if he won.

But the Spitzer camp also does not want to become bogged down and perhaps tainted by losses at the hands of the Republican Senate leaders, who are the one faction in the state party that still has significant stature. Mr. Pataki is leaving office after three terms with relatively poor approval ratings, and he has been increasingly preoccupied with exploring whether to run for president in 2008.

Travels With Eliot (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

The following story didn't get much play outside the pages of the feisty New York Sun. But a recent episode involving New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a gambling mogul with business before the state and use of the latter's Gulfstream jet for political campaigning is revealing.

DOJ_NMG_0062255

Yesterday Mr. Spitzer won the Democratic nomination for Governor in a rout, and on the campaign trail he's spent a lot of time talking about ending "the pay-to-play culture in Albany by making it against the law for those who do business with the state to give gifts to state employees or to donate to candidates for state office." But it turns out that the Spitzer campaign hasn't been practicing what it preaches.

Mr. Spitzer has accepted discounted rides to fund-raisers nationwide on the private jet of Richard Fields, a casino developer whose companies have donated $200,000 to Mr. Spitzer's campaign. Mr. Fields represents a Wisconsin Indian tribe attempting to win approval to build a casino in New York's Catskills region. The tribe has sued New York state to reclaim what it says are ancestral lands. As AG, Mr. Spitzer represents the state. Mr. Fields is also part of a group bidding to operate thoroughbred racing at New York's Aqueduct, Saratoga and Belmont race tracks. The next Governor will likely play a major role in the outcome of both matters.

The Spitzer camp initially side-stepped the obvious conflict-of-interest questions by insisting that it "has followed the letter of the law when it comes to reimbursement for air travel." And it's true that under federal regulations, which the Spitzer campaign says it followed, the AG is required to reimburse Mr. Fields for the equivalent of a first-class plane ticket, even if that amount represents a fraction of the actual cost of chartering a jet.

This "letter of the law" line is nonetheless rich coming from Sheriff Spitzer, who's spent the past half-decade patrolling private business for similar behavior and rejecting letter-of-the-law defenses from his targets. As the Sun noted in a recent editorial, "General Spitzer has zealously pursued all sorts of alleged conflicts of interest, from investment advisers and stock analysts to insurance brokers to Richard Grasso's compensation as head of the New York Stock Exchange."

Mr. Spitzer remains the favorite in November. But under pressure from his GOP rival, John Faso, he recently decided to pay "all the costs" when chartering flights in the future. That's very big of Mr. Spitzer, but the whole episode calls into question the sincerity of his calls for reform in Albany. Campaign speeches notwithstanding, his behavior suggests that a vote for Mr. Spitzer is a vote for the status quo.

Cardin Leads In Maryland's Senate Race (WT)

By S.A. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin last night was leading the Democratic nomination for a U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, topping former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume in a widely watched contest in which race was a key issue.

With 49 percent of the state's precincts reporting, Mr. Cardin had 46 percent of the vote, and Mr. Mfume had 37 percent. A total of 18 Democratic candidates were vying to succeed Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat who is retiring.

In November's general election, Mr. Cardin, a 10-term congressman, would face Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who easily bested nine rivals for the Republican nomination. Mr. Steele received about 85 percent in the Republican primary.

When early results showed Mr. Cardin leading Mr. Mfume, cheers and applause erupted from the roughly 300 people at Mr. Cardin's planned victory party at a ballroom in the Wyndham Baltimore hotel.

The results scrolled across three large projection TV screens above the stage where Mr. Cardin was expected to deliver his victory speech late last night.

Among the revelers were state Democratic Party leaders, including House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer and Rep. C.A. Dutch Ruppersberger.

Also in the crowd was the Rev. Jeff P. Williams, a black Miami minister who organizes get-out-the-vote drives for the national Democratic Party aimed at black religious communities.

The Mfume rally was lightly attended, with only about 100 people in a largely empty ballroom at the France-Merrick Performing Arts Center in Baltimore.

Mr. Mfume had not taken the stage by 10:40 p.m.

The mood was somber, with one of Mr. Mfume's top strategists' admitting that he thought the candidate would lose.

But Mfume campaign spokesman Mark Clack remained optimistic.

DOJ_NMG_0062256

"We're feeling very good. We weren't expected to be here," Mr. Clack said. "We've proved ourselves to be a pretty resourceful and resilient campaign."

In other statewide contests, Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler was leading in the Democratic primary for attorney general, topping Baltimore lawyer Stuart O. Simms.

Mr. Gansler had 55 percent of the vote, and Mr. Simms had 43 percent. They were competing to succeed Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., a Democrat who is retiring.

In November, Mr. Gansler would square off against Frederick County State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle, who ran unopposed for the Republican nomination.

Meanwhile, Anne Arundel County Executive Janet S. Owens was leading in the Democratic primary for comptroller, besting the incumbent -- William Donald Schaefer -- in a contest marked by personal gibes and stinging remarks by both candidates.

Mrs. Owens had 42 percent of the vote, and Mr. Schaefer had 32 percent. Delegate Peter Franchot of Montgomery County also had 32 percent.

Mr. Schaefer called Mrs. Owens "Mother Hubbard" and "little prissy miss," and she said Mr. Schaefer, 84, was "too old" for the job.

Mrs. Owens, 62, likely will face former Montgomery County Council member Stephen N. Abrams or Anne M. McCarthy, dean of the University of Baltimore Merrick School of Business, who were competing for the Republican nomination.

Mrs. McCarthy had about 44 percent and Mr. Abrams had about 36 percent in early results.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and his running mate, Delegate Anthony G. Brown of Prince George's County, were unopposed in the Democratic primary for governor and lieutenant governor. They will face Republican nominees Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and his running mate, state Disabilities Secretary Kristen Cox in November.

Many voters in Montgomery County and in Baltimore were delayed -- and even turned away -- because some election officials did not show up on time to open polls and others forgot to provide voter-access cards for the electronic voting machines that were used statewide for the first time yesterday.

"This might not be over tonight," said a state Democratic Party official who asked not to be named. "It seems like whenever voters can't vote, the election is affected."

Elections officials in Montgomery County and Baltimore petitioned the circuit courts to keep the polls open an extra hour last night.

Polls closed at 8 p.m. statewide, and complete results were not available by press time.

The U.S. Senate contest between Mr. Steele and Mr. Cardin will be one of the most closely watched races in the country.

A rising star among Republicans, Mr. Steele was recruited to run by the national Republican Party. He is the party's first truly competitive Senate candidate in Maryland in a quarter century, largely because of his potential to win votes from blacks who are usually loyal to the Democratic Party.

Two operatives for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee were fired last year after they illegally obtained Mr. Steele's credit report. One of the operatives pleaded guilty in federal court to a misdemeanor charge of computer fraud stemming from the credit-report scandal.

The national Democratic and Republican parties say that they will put vast amounts of cash and other resources into the Maryland Senate campaigns.

Race was a factor in the primary contest and promises to become an even more potent element in the general election.

For nearly a year, Mr. Mfume, who is black, has complained of Maryland's "old-line party bosses" discouraging his fundraising and trying to "coronate" Mr. Cardin, who is white, as the nominee.

Maryland's top Democrats, including Mr. Hoyer and state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., who are white, have supported Mr. Cardin.

Even the party's black leaders were slow to get behind Mr. Mfume's campaign. U.S. Reps. Albert R. Wynn and Elijah E. Cummings, both Maryland Democrats, did not endorse him until late last month.

Blacks make up the Democratic Party's most loyal voting bloc, and black leaders say the dismissive treatment of Mr. Mfume has embittered their constituents and may drive them to support Mr. Steele.

Cardin Far Ahead In Senate Primary; Leggett Has Big Lead In Montgomery (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And John Wagner

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Maryland's Democratic primary voters gave Baltimore Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin a commanding lead over former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume last night in the race to be the party's candidate for U.S. Senate, but chaos at polling sites delayed final results for that and other key races.

In Montgomery County, Isiah "Ike" Leggett maintained a strong lead over Steven A. Silverman to become the party's nominee for county executive, even though hundreds, possibly thousands, of provisional ballots sat uncounted at election headquarters in Rockville.

And Montgomery State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler defeated Baltimore lawyer Stuart O. Simms to be the party's nominee for attorney general.

As returns trickled in, they showed a surprisingly close contest for Prince George's county executive, with incumbent Jack B. Johnson holding a slight lead over former state delegate Rushern L. Baker III with half of the votes counted. Johnson declared victory about 1 a.m., but Baker told supporters that he wasn't ready to concede.

Also tight was a race that became a referendum on the patriarch of Maryland politics, William Donald Schaefer, the 84-year-old comptroller and former governor, who was on the verge of seeing his five-decade career come to an abrupt end. His fate awaited returns in Montgomery, where rampant voting problems slowed a final count.

Anne Arundel County Executive Janet S. Owens and Montgomery Del. Peter Franchot both held leads over Schaefer at times yesterday. Last night, Franchot predicted the uncounted ballots in Montgomery could determine the outcome.

"It has been an exciting election day with lots of twists and turns," he said in a statement released early this morning. "This election will not be over until every vote is counted."

All morning, confusion reigned as outraged voters were turned back from voting sites in Montgomery County because an election worker failed to provide key cards needed to make the electronic voting machines functional.

The snags reportedly included voting machines with no power cords at one Baltimore precinct, provisional ballots issued only in Spanish at a Silver Spring site and poll workers who arrived hours late in Anne Arundel County. At Piney Branch Elementary School in Takoma Park, officials quickly ran out of paper ballots and began telling voters to use scraps of paper. The impediments to voting prompted legal challenges and resulted in court orders to extend voting by an hour in Montgomery County and Baltimore.

Those votes, as with many cast while machines were down, were recorded on provisional paper ballots that won't be counted until Monday. While Republicans had only a handful of contested races, Democrats who reached working voting machines encountered a primary ballot that included a new generation of candidates.

Veteran Democrat Rep. Albert R. Wynn faced a spirited challenge from Donna Edwards but maintained a solid lead. Reps. Chris Van Hollen and Steny H. Hoyer easily won their nominations.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and his Democratic competitor, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, ran unopposed yesterday -- the first time in years that neither party's nomination for governor was contested. Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) pulled out of the race in June.

With questions swirling about disruptions to voting, Ehrlich appeared at a Prince George's County church wearing a white polo shirt with "Ehrlich for Governor" stitched on the front and immediately pointed the finger at Democrats. He said the party's aggressive pursuit of changes to the state elections apparatus left local officials befuddled.

He refused to accept an apology from Nancy Dacek, the former Montgomery County Council member he appointed to the county's top local elections post. Democrats fired back. House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) said if the governor "wants to blame somebody for this, he should look in the mirror."

State Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), who had no primary challenge, compared the elections official who forgot to include the electronic voting cards to "someone going to work with no pants on."

"It's a hideous mess," Frosh said.

DOJ_NMG_0062258

Cardin and Mfume supporters hunkered down at locations four blocks apart in downtown Baltimore all evening. Shortly after midnight, Mfume briefly appeared before a crowd of supporters to say the race wasn't over. Mfume political adviser Walter Ludwig said that though Cardin's lead was sizeable, the Mfume team still saw "a path to victory" because so many votes in Baltimore remained uncounted.

After a day spent darting from one polling station to another, Cardin returned to Capitol Hill in the evening to cast votes in Congress before heading to the hotel where his supporters mingled in a large ballroom dominated by a pair of projection-screen TVs.

A victory by either candidate will set up what looks to be one of the most costly and combative Senate races in Maryland in a generation. The winner will replace Paul S. Sarbanes (D), who is retiring.

From the outset, Mfume lagged far behind Cardin in raising money. Cardin had spent $3.8 million on the race as of Aug. 23, more than four times the roughly $800,000 Mfume spent, according to campaign finance reports. In the end, though, the matchup was between Cardin, a steady legislative technician with 40 years in public life, and Mfume, an electric orator who had led both the Congressional Black Caucus and the NAACP.

Now the Democratic nominee faces Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who had nominal primary opposition. Steele was pulled into the campaign by a who's who of national GOP leaders, but he has distanced himself publicly from his deep party roots, instead investing heavily in an effort to convert fence-sitting Democrats and unaffiliated voters.

Steele took the unusual step of visiting both Johnson and Baker's election night parties. After visiting Baker's hotel suite, Steele told a reporter he was there as a "Prince Georgian" and he firmly believes "you can't let the party line blur the friendship."

Steele has also hoped to capitalize on unease among some black voters about how sincerely the Democratic Party has valued their longstanding allegiance.

Four years ago, Steele became the first African American to be elected statewide in Maryland, and now he makes no secret of his strategy to peel away black votes from the Democrats.

But Johns Hopkins University political science professor Matthew Crenson said Democrats may have "ducked a big bullet" on the subject of race, because Mfume and Cardin have assiduously avoided the issue, focusing instead on the war in Iraq, the plight of the nation's uninsured and ethics reform in Washington.

When the two debated during the final days of an 18-month contest, the toughest swipe Mfume took at Cardin had to do not with race but with the special interest and lobbyist money invested in his campaign.

"The big worry of the Democrats and the big hope of the Republicans was that the [primary] campaign would become racially polarizing," Crenson said. "But it's been a fairly muted and mutually respectful campaign."

Democrats have planned a series of "unity" events for this week, and party leaders have pledged to bring Cardin and Mfume together onstage in an effort to help soothe any concerns about racial division. But the party will have to address primary results that show a ticket dominated by white men.

Unity may be tougher for those involved in some of the primary's more bitter contests, including the race for state comptroller, in which Anne Arundel County Executive Janet S. Owens and Montgomery Del. Peter Franchot both threw some hard punches at Schaefer.

Schaefer, who began his public life in 1955 on the Baltimore City Council, sought one more term. But his close ties to Ehrlich and controversial remarks on immigrants and women have not endeared him to the state's mostly liberal Democrats. Franchot focused his assault on Schaefer's unabashed praise of the Republican governor, claiming to be the only "real Democrat" in the contest. Owens emphasized Schaefer's age .

Schaefer was the only statewide official on the Democratic side who sought reelection. Gansler, the Montgomery County state's attorney, and Simms, a former Baltimore state's attorney, battled over the seat being vacated by veteran Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (Montgomery County Council member Tom Perez's name appeared on the ballot, but the state's high court ruled him ineligible to compete for the post.)

Simms had signed on to be Duncan's lieutenant governor candidate, but when Duncan left the race, Simms and others, including those who believed the Baltimore region should not be without a candidate for attorney general, encouraged him to shift his target. He drew a number of high-profile supporters, but his campaign was hindered by a lack of money and a late start.

Gansler, by contrast, has been planning his campaign for years. He has a Web site filled with proposals on combating gangs and pursuing polluters, and he has raised almost $2 million. Frederick County State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle ran unopposed on the Republican side.

Two other vitriolic contests were centered in Prince George's County, where winning the nomination usually means election. Incumbents Wynn and Johnson faced aggressive challenges.

Wynn battled Edwards, who mounted a challenge from the left, accusing the seven-term incumbent of coddling business interests and knocking him for voting to support the Iraq war.

Edwards put Wynn on his heels at a caustic NAACP debate, which ended with a Wynn supporter being arrested on suspicion of striking an Edwards volunteer during a skirmish over campaign signs. Wynn campaigned as someone who could deliver projects to his district, rattling off a long list of improvements that were financed with federal aid.

Johnson, meanwhile, ran hard for a second term by emphasizing an economic boom and rising property tax revenue, which have brought added services and school construction money.

But Baker, who lost to Johnson in a five-man race four years ago, took after the incumbent, saying he ignored the county's rising crime problem and knocking a series of county contracts Johnson handed to friends and campaign supporters.

Nothing that dramatic occurred during the Montgomery county executive contest, which largely focused on the question of which candidate could be better trusted to ease traffic and check the efforts of developers.

Leggett said that he would do a better job of controlling growth and standing up to developers who have been generous to Silverman's campaign. Silverman, in turn, has cast himself as the more decisive leader and said he would be more aggressive in funding road projects and the proposed Purple Line.

Election Board Workers' Error Hinders Voting (WP)

By Christian Davenport And Miranda S. Spivack

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

The most basic of human errors threw Maryland's primary election into chaos yesterday: Someone forgot the wallet-size plastic cards needed to operate the voting machines in Montgomery County, frustrating early morning voters who lined up outside polling places and often were turned away without voting.

Courts ordered polls to remain open an extra hour in the county and in Baltimore, where at least two dozen polling places opened late, but it seemed doubtful that the extensions would resolve the confusion.

Some Montgomery County polling places didn't receive word of the order to remain open until minutes before 8 p.m., when they had been scheduled to close. Others ran short on the paper ballots that the court instructed be used during the extended hour of voting, with voters scribbling their choices on scraps of paper in Takoma Park.

"You had to laugh. It got more and more ludicrous," said Dennis Desmond, who cast his "vote" on a discarded flier handed to him by election officials after ballots ran out in Takoma Park.

He said election workers rushed to a nearby pharmacy to buy envelopes in which the makeshift ballots could be sealed.

The number of paper ballots cast won't be known until today. They will not be counted until Monday.

When all of the county's 238 polling places opened in Montgomery, the state's most populous jurisdiction, the electronic voting machines were inoperable. Many precincts handed out provisional paper ballots as soon as the precinct doors opened at 7 a.m., but at some polls those ballots ran out, and at others election officials didn't know that paper ballots were an option. They just told people to come back later.

Although the cards necessary to activate most of the voting machines arrived by 8:30, election officials said some of the machines weren't working until 10 a.m. -- three hours after polls opened. Voters said some didn't start operating until even later.

Partisan bickering broke out, with the governor blaming the Democratic legislature, and the Democrats pointing the finger at the governor.

Nancy H. Dacek, who was appointed as president of the county's Board of Elections by Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), apologized for the error.

"We regret what happened this morning. It was just a fluke," Dacek said. "There was a glitch. It's now been taken care of."

DOJ_NMG_0062260

The cards that went astray are called voter access cards and look like white ATM cards with a golden computer chip embedded in them. They are issued to voters once election judges verify they are registered to vote. When the cards are placed into the voting machines, the ballot appears on the touch screen.

County election officials said they simply forgot to include the cards in the supply bags provided to the chief election judge of each polling place.

The trouble began Friday when eight county election employees and a supervisor met in a locked room on the first floor of the election headquarters building at 751 Twinbrook Pkwy. in Rockville.

They packed the large canvas bags that were to contain the items needed to operate the computerized voting system. But the stacks of the critical voter access cards were forgotten, locked a few feet away behind a caged door. Once the bags were packed, they were padlocked for security, and polling place judges were prohibited from opening them until yesterday morning.

About 6 a.m., the judges realized the cards were missing, said Margaret Jurgensen, the county's elections director. She said the county has checklists to keep employees from forgetting to pack any of the items, but she did not know whether they were used.

Jurgensen said the error "was a team effort."

Linda H. Lamone, chairman of the State Board of Elections, said she was appalled by the day's events and said it was the work of poorly trained election judges.

"We push the information out to them," said Lamone, who was appointed by Ehrlich's Democratic predecessor, Parris N. Glendening. "If they choose not to follow it, there's nothing we can do."

Ehrlich's initial reaction on learning of the problems was: "That's negligence. That's inexcusable."

Later in the day, the governor added: "The training is Linda Lamone's responsibility, period. The apology should come from her. . . . She's going to have to answer a lot of questions tomorrow."

But Douglas F. Gansler (D), the Montgomery state's attorney who is running for attorney general, joined several other candidates who lambasted the county election board yesterday.

"The level of incompetence that led to this is almost surreal -- especially in Montgomery County," he said.

When David Belkin showed up to vote at a polling place in Bethesda at 8:30 a.m., he was told he could vote by provisional ballot, but the line was too long and he was late for a meeting.

"The degree of incompetence is beyond belief," he said. "It's just incredible. It's not like this was a surprise. They knew the election was coming. And whoever is responsible should be fired today."

Gareth Rosenau, a lawyer with the Federal Railroad Commission, said the voting cards arrived shortly after he did at the polling place in Takoma Park. But when the registered Democrat put his card into the voting machine, a Republican ballot appeared on the screen, he said.

Other voters were having the same problem, he said, and complained to election officials, who didn't know how to fix the machines so they would produce the proper ballots.

"I felt like I was in a Third World country," Rosenau said.

Baltimore was also plagued by election day problems, prompting a judge there to extend voting by an hour as well.

The Maryland Democratic Party alleged in a court filing that at least 75 precincts in Baltimore opened late because election officials failed to show up on time and struggled with the electronic voting machines the city was using for the first time.

Baltimore Elections Administrator Gene Raynor said there were problems with some judges showing up on time. But he said the number of affected precincts was closer to "two dozen."

"When you have 1,500 [election judges], you're going to have problems with some of them," he said.

States across the country scrambled to revamp their election systems after the debacle in Florida during the 2000 presidential election. In an attempt to avoid hanging chads that plagued that election, many states, including Maryland, moved to an electronic voting system. Montgomery has been using the electronic voting machines since 2002 without significant problems.

DOJ_NMG_0062261

Critics have described the electronic systems as vulnerable, and a report in June by Common Cause concluded that they "are highly vulnerable to machine malfunction and human manipulation." It also found that Maryland was one of 17 states with voting systems that are at "high risk" because their machines don't have a paper ballot backup system.

In Prince George's County, about 15 to 20 of the county's 206 precincts were delayed an average of about 25 minutes yesterday morning, according to Alisha Alexander, deputy elections administrator for the Prince George's County Board of Elections. Most of the precincts were in the northern part of the county, including Beltsville and University Park.

Alexander said about 20 technicians, who were scheduled to deliver and set up electronic poll books by 6 a.m., quit yesterday morning, resulting in long lines and frustrated voters at numerous polling places.

"We had to find other staff and send them out," said Robert J. Antonetti, the interim Prince George's elections administrator.

Mehlman To Spend $60M, Five Times Dean's $12M (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 13, 2006

The Republican National Committee (RNC) will spend its entire bank account, $60 million or more, helping Republicans try to retain control of Congress in the midterm elections.

The looming spending spree appears to have spurred Democratic House leaders to reach agreement over how much the Democratic National Committee (DNC) will help counter this onslaught.

The relationship between the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) and DNC has been rocky. There is dispute over whether it took House Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn's (S.C.) intervention to broker the deal announced yesterday under which part of the DNC's $12 million will be funneled to 40 House races. Targeted House Democratic candidates will receive about $60,000 from the party committee.

One Democratic official said Clyburn had to bring the sides together, but another official denied it.

The DNC money will also be spent on Senate and gubernatorial races, and voter turnout activities in battleground states.

It is an open question whether the deal between the DNC and DCCC will be enough to offset the financial advantage that the RNC cash will give Republican candidates this fall.

RNC chairman Ken Mehlman has put in place a plan to raise money aggressively throughout the fall and has made clear that he will not hold back any money for the 2008 presidential election.

In total, the RNC plans to spend more than $60 million on targeted federal races, a record for a national party committee in a midterm election, according to a GOP official familiar with their plans. The funds are "targeted for competitive federal races," the official said, adding that half would pay for get-out-the-vote operations

Democrats, however, say they are counting on a major boost from their union allies. The AFL-CIO is planning to spend $40 million on get-out-the-vote operations, said Democratic officials.

DNC Chairman Howard Dean said yesterday's deal shows the party is unified. He is still negotiating with Democratic Senate leaders over how DNC money will be spent to help Senate candidates. .

"We're busy talking to them," said Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC), when asked about the DNC's role.

One GOP source familiar with Mehlman's plans said the committee would raise money aggressively through the fall and would probably collect $15 million to add to its account. The RNC had $43.6 million in the bank at the end of July.

The DNC reported $11.3 million in cash on hand at that time.

Although national party committees are commonly thought of as focused on raising money for White House campaigns and building party infrastructure for presidential election cycles, the RNC has morphed into a complement to the congressional fundraising committees, the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC).

Mehlman can afford to focus on congressional races this year because fundraising for gubernatorial contests has been largely segregated from the national party committees. The Republican Governors Association has raised $25.9 million for Election Day, according to Political Money Line, a nonpartisan organization that tracks fundraising. Its Democratic counterpart has raised $17.9 million.

Republican lawmakers and political strategists believe that Mehlman cannot risk losing control of the Senate or House by a seat or two and still have any money left in his accounts. Even a million dollars could make the difference in a close race that determines control of either chamber.

"I'm sure every penny he's got between now and November will go into those races," said Republican strategist Charlie Black. "I think it will make some difference."

Frank Donatelli, White House political director under Ronald Reagan, said there is little doubt the RNC's focus is on Congress.

"They're spending a heck of a lot. I didn't know that they're emptying the bank accounts but they're being very aggressive on fundraising and are spending a heck of lot of money on House and Senate races," he said. "It's a huge amount of money."

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), who had weighed chairing the NRSC next year, praised Mehlman's tactics.

"He's going to pull out all the stops because Ken is a great tactician, he knows what needs to be done," said Thune. "He knows that the House and Senate are going to be won or lost in the ground game, that's what he has perfected in the last couple of elections and it takes money to implement that.

"You don't want to end an election with money in the bank because people are going to say 'Why didn't you put more into the ground? Why didn't you put more into the mail? Why didn't you put more in television?' So I think he's going to raise it and he's going to expend it in places where it makes a difference."

Political spending has been a contentious subject among Democratic leaders this cycle as Dean has sought innovative ways to raise and invest party funds. Dean paid less attention to wealthy donors than past party chairman did, focusing instead on raising cash through the Internet and from small-dollar donors.

Dean's 50-state strategy has spread money to solidly Republican states where the Democratic party structure has atrophied in recent years. Some Democrats think the money would be better spent in swing states and districts where their party has more opportunity for immediate victories.

Schumer and DCCC chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) have challenged Dean this year over the strategy. Emanuel stomped angrily out of a contentious meeting with Dean and Schumer in May, according to press reports.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer declined to discuss Dean's strategy but dismissed the impact of Republican spending.

"God bless them if they want to spend $60 million," said Singer. "A field program is only as good as the amount of enthusiasm there is for the Republican Party. It's clear that the Republican base is dispirited, unenthused and withdrawn. If people are not energized behind what they're selling, and they are not, it won't make a difference."

But one expert predicts it will make a difference.

"The wildcard in the remaining weeks of this midterm election is the substantial amount of money the RNC has on hand," said Michael Toner, the Republican-appointed chairman of the Federal Election Commission. "That money could make the difference down the stretch in a number of competitive House and Senate elections.

Survey Says: Voter Anger May Not Result In Anti-GOP Tsunami (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

National polls are showing high — and in many cases, increasing — levels of voter frustration with the direction of the country, politics as usual and the Republican leadership.

But in Out There's second unscientific poll this year of state capitol reporters from around the country, we find surprisingly few indications that voter anger is translating into a national anti-Republican — or even an anti-incumbent — wave.

During August, Out There sent a survey to a range of members of capitol-beat, a national association for reporters who cover politics and government in the state capitals. Twenty-six reporters in 20 states responded.

The study merits some major caveats. This obviously is not a substitute for professional polls. The reporters' assessments will be subjective, and the view from a statehouse press room can be somewhat limited.

DOJ_NMG_0062263

In addition, of the 20 states represented in this survey, 13 are red states, compared to just seven blue states. However, many of the Congressional seats that the Democrats must win are located in red states.

Of the 36 Republican-held House seats deemed to be in play by handicapper Charlie Cook, 15 are located in states with at least one survey respondent, as are eight of the 10 Democratic-held House seats that Cook considers in play. Four states represented in the survey have competitive Senate contests this fall and nine have highly competitive gubernatorial races.

Where state Capitol reporters can be helpful is that they have their finger on the outside-the-Beltway pulse better than many Washington, D.C., reporters do. And according to our survey, they generally detect a modest sentiment against Republicans, but not one that inevitably will translate into political gains for Congressional Democrats.

Asked "Do you sense a wave of anti-incumbency developing in your state (that is, an urge to 'throw the bums out,' irrespective of party)?" only five respondents gave a "strong yes," while 14 offered a "weak yes." Seven answered "no."

The results were slightly more negative when the following question was asked: "Do you sense a wave of specific anti-Republican sentiment?" On that question, five respondents gave a strong yes, 12 gave a weak yes and nine said no.

"There is clearly a feeling against incumbents, but not much chance to vote against them in state legislative races — too many are unopposed — and very little opportunity in Congressional races," said one Florida reporter.

Moreover, this reporter said, "although there is some anti-Republican sentiment afoot in the state, I'm not sure how much it will impact the races because the Democrats have failed to field good candidates in many instances."

The question that garnered the clearest response was one that asked whether voters were dissatisfied with Congress as an institution. On that question, 15 respondents offered a strong yes and seven gave a weak yes. Only three said voters were generally satisfied with Congress.

But this view dramatically was tempered by the answers to a follow-up question. Asked, "Do you sense voter dissatisfaction with their particular Member of Congress?" not a single respondent gave a strong yes. Nine gave a weak yes, while a whopping 17 said voters were not dissatisfied with their Member of Congress.

"There's strong dissatisfaction with Congress, but it's that old, 'We hate them as a group — but don't touch my local guy,'" the Florida reporter said.

A North Carolina journalist added that dissatisfaction with Congress is "a bit heightened, but mostly the usual background late-night-comic frustration with the 'bums in Washington.' Congress has been such a do-nothing group this year, they don't seem to have left a strong impression, good or bad."

All Politics Is Local — Mostly

Another finding from the survey that should comfort Republicans is that state Capitol reporters see voters paying more attention to local issues than national issues so far this campaign season. Eleven respondents said voters were paying more attention to local issues, compared to six who said national issues are predominating. Another nine chose neither or both.

The survey also looked at the issue landscape right now, and the findings offer somewhat mixed results for the two parties.

Far and away, the issue voters are focusing on the most is gasoline prices, respondents said. No less than 24 of them said voters felt "very strongly" about gas prices, while two others said voters felt "somewhat strongly."

The next-highest ranked issues were Iraq and immigration. Interest in Iraq was called very strong by 16 respondents and somewhat strong by eight. Immigration earned 15 very strong votes and seven somewhat strong votes.

If the voters are indeed focusing on these three issues more than than any others, it probably helps Democrats more than Republicans. Gas prices are a clear rhetorical winner for Democrats. And the Iraq War may be the biggest cause of President Bush's plunge in popularity.

"We're a big military state," said a North Carolina journalist, "and even around military bases, people are related to or are friends with folks who have had to ship out or got killed. That's making for some unhappy voters who might take out their frustrations by either voting Democratic or by simply not showing up."

But a front-and-center role for the Iraq War also could heighten voter sentiment in support of the troops — a plus for the GOP.

"In a flag-waving state that has provided much manpower to the struggle against terror, many folks still equate opposition to the war to denigrating our troops," said one Georgia journalist.

DOJ_NMG_0062264

In the meantime, the immigration debate's impact likely will depend on whether voters demand a tough crackdown on immigrants or whether they are more eager to see politicians implement a broader, more comprehensive policy like the one sought in pending Senate legislation.

If it's the former, the GOP could benefit, and if it's the latter, it could be more of a wash. At least two reporters said they sense a sentiment in favor of the latter.

"The immigration debate seems like it would be out of place in the upper Midwest," said one Iowa journalist, but voters "are very concerned about national security, and they see porous borders as a disaster waiting to happen. There are a few racists among them, but in large they just want the immigration service to know who is coming into this country."

A North Carolina journalist called immigration "an issue where folks are looking for national leadership and not getting it. It's not so much an anti-immigrant sentiment as it is that the system isn't working, and it's having adverse affects on the job market and public safety."

Mixed News for Both Parties

The next tier of issues offers bits of comfort for both parties.

Health care — where Democrats tend to have the historical edge — was cited as a very strong issue by 11 respondents and as a somewhat strong issue by another 13.

In the meantime, "culture war" issues such as abortion and stem-cell research were cited as having very strong resonance by eight respondents and as having a somewhat strong resonance by 13 respondents. Republicans tend to get a turnout boost when social issues are high on the agenda, but it's also possible that this trend could be undercut by a backlash that energizes liberals and moderates.

And interest in the economy was cited as very strong by eight respondents and as somewhat strong by 15 respondents. By the numbers, the national economy seems fairly healthy, but voters in general appear to be downbeat about the nation's economic prospects, suggesting that this level of interest in economic conditions could benefit Democrats.

In certain states, such as Michigan, the economy is a major flashpoint, and in that case, the incumbent Democratic governor, Jennifer Granholm, arguably faces even greater ire than does the GOP in Washington, D.C.

"The economy, the economy and the economy round out the top three," said one Michigan reporter. "Throw in gas prices once or twice there as well."

Other issues being touted by the parties seem to be inspiring more modest levels of interest, according to our poll.

Corruption, a key issue for Democrats for most of this year, is attracting moderate interest, with seven respondents saying voters felt very strongly about it and 13 saying that voters felt somewhat strongly. Often, voters are more concerned about scandals in state government than scandals at the federal level, which could mean that any voting impact in federal races would be diluted.

Respondents cited similar levels of voter interest in the Medicare drug benefit's shortcomings, another key Democratic issue. This topic attracted seven votes for very strong and 16 votes for somewhat strong.

Interest in the environment, another traditional Democratic issue, came in even lower, with four choosing very strongly, 13 choosing somewhat strongly and nine choosing not strongly.

At least one Republican "base" issue also fared poorly in the poll. Judicial nominations, a top issue for conservatives, received less support than any other issue in the poll, with 21 respondents saying there was no interest at all in the issue.

Then again, the poll suggests that if you don't like the findings, just wait a few weeks.

Said one Georgia journalist during the August recess, "I get the strong sense that people are not thinking about politics at all."

Sparring Democrats Strike A Deal On Financing To Get Out The Vote Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062265

Chicago's Rep. Rahm Emanuel likes to speak of "Kumbaya" moments when referring to political rivals coming together. Finally, after months of sometimes expletive-laced sparring, the architect of House Democrats' election efforts seems to be having his moment with Howard Dean. The Democratic Party chairman apparently has agreed to pony up $12 million for get-out-the-vote drives aimed at capturing control of Congress Nov. 7.

The sum, together with the House Democrats' own money and the $40 million that the AFL-CIO has said it will spend to mobilize voters for Democrats in the most hotly contested congressional races, could effectively put the Democrats on par financially with the vaunted Republican "GOTV" program, for which party Chairman Ken Mehlman has pledged about $40 million. And that would blunt the Republicans' one clear advantage in an otherwise bleak election year for the party in power.

The agreement comes none too soon. Yet another shoe still hasn't dropped: Mr. Dean remains in talks with New York's Sen. Chuck Schumer, Mr. Emanuel's counterpart, over funds for Senate races. The process of identifying potential voters, contacting them at home or by phone, getting them to vote early in states where that is allowed, or on Election Day when it's not, is one that has to be under way months before November arrives. That means now.

Democrats insist the spat between Chairman Dean on one side and Messrs. Emanuel and Schumer on the other hasn't hobbled their efforts; the well-funded House and Senate campaign committees had enough money to get started with field operations in the 15 states and 40 congressional districts with marquee election contests. Democrats need to net 15 House districts and six Senate seats to claim majorities. Their nightmare: the prospect of running short of money in the campaign's crucial final weeks.

At issue is the conflict between Mr. Dean's emphasis on a long-term "50-State Strategy" of financing party-building efforts everywhere, even in the reddest of states, and congressional Democrats' immediate demands to target money in the places where the party has its best shots of breaking Republicans' 12-year reign. The Democratic National Committee chairman currently is left with about $11 million on hand.

Mr. Emanuel had sought about $20 million just for his House races. "Money is not a philosophical argument to me," he said at one point. "You either have it or you don't."

He wanted to control any money he got; Mr. Schumer has been willing to let the DNC funnel money to state parties for statewide voter mobilization. The long-simmering dispute exploded publicly last May, when word leaked that Mr. Emanuel had bolted from a meeting of the Democratic trio, cursing at the failure to come to agreement. "The way you build long-term is to succeed short-term," he said at the time. For months after, he and Mr. Dean hardly spoke, Democrats say. Another House Democratic leadership figure, Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, is said to have helped broker this week's deal between Mr. Dean and Mr. Emanuel's Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

As for Mr. Schumer, Mr. Dean told DNC members at their summer meeting in mid-August that he'd reached tentative agreement with the senator, and soon would with Rep. Emanuel; Schumer staffers immediately refuted Mr. Dean's claim. A month later, on word of the Dean-Emanuel pact, the senator said in a statement Tuesday, "We're still in the process of negotiating and we're hopeful that we'll have an amicable agreement that makes everyone happy."

Meanwhile, his Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee -- which has out-raised Sen. Elizabeth Dole's National Republican Senatorial Committee -- has been at work for 18 months in what a staffer called "the most extensive GOTV operation ever" for Democrats. Mr. Schumer has positioned operatives in 15 states where Democrats have targeted Republican seats or are defending a few of their own, and plans to send upwards of $30 million for field operations there. Additional money from Mr. Dean would mean "water and nutrients" to grow that effort through Nov. 7, one Democratic Senate strategist said.

For Democrats generally, an end to the infighting can't come soon enough. Most say both sides are right -- the party needs a permanent 50-state strategy that quits ceding whole regions to Republicans, but it also must target resources now to take advantage of this year's opportunities. Only egos stood in the way of compromise, as many Democrats saw it.

The Democrats' saga has been rare entertainment for beleaguered Republicans. Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, Mr. Emanuel's opposite as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, often would contrast his "partnership" with RNC Chairman Mehlman with what seemed the Democrats' dysfunctional family. On Monday, Mr. Mehlman said his party's turnout operation, with its proven results in 2002 and 2004, would protect Republicans' House and Senate majorities.

If indeed the Democrats have now joined hands -- and funds -- to boost their own turnout efforts, that is bad news for Republicans. As the song goes, "Someone's crying, Lord, kumbaya/Oh Lord, kumbaya."

Dean Pledges November Aid (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean has pledged $12 million to his party's 2006 campaign efforts — with at least $5 million going to House and Senate Democrats — in a move that may help soothe tensions between the national party chief and his Congressional counterparts.

Dean struck a deal with Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) on Tuesday to devote roughly $60,000 to get-out-the-vote efforts in 40 targeted House races.

Dean and Emanuel have differed sharply on election-year strategy, and their feud has been well publicized in the press. It has been previously reported that the two men are not on speaking terms.

The deal was brokered by DCCC Executive Director Karin Johanson and DNC Executive Director Tom McMahon. One source familiar with the discussion indicated that initially Dean wanted to seek assurances that Emanuel would stop attacking Dean and his 50-state strategy in return for the financial commitment, but that never materialized.

The massive financial shortfall of the DNC in comparison to the Republican National Committee has been a source of concern for Emanuel and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.). While the Democrats' House and Senate committees are ahead of or at cash parity with their GOP counterparts, as of July 31 the DNC had $11.3 million in reserve compared to the RNC's $43.6 million.

This week, RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman touted an overall $47 million edge of Republican campaign entities over Democrats, when all of the committees and state parties are taken into account.

In a statement, Dean touted the party's unity heading into November and also alluded to the fact that the $12 million effort comes on top of the DNC's 50-state strategy spending.

"Democrats are unified and prepared to win up and down the ballot, all across America this November," Dean said. "Building on successful efforts over the past year, we're in the final stretch and the DNC is making unprecedented investments to ensure that Democrats retake control of Congress and are elected at every level of government."

A deal has not yet been reached between the DNC and Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee as to how much of the $12 million will be allocated to Senate races.

But Senate Leadership sources said that the DNC will commit at least $2.5 million to GOTV efforts in targeted contests.

The DNC's contributions for field operations will be doled out to state parties and coordinated campaign efforts.

Much of the money will be spent in key states such as Ohio and Pennsylvania, which have highly competitive gubernatorial and Senate races as well as several top tier House races.

Democratic aides called the effort historic, noting that the AFL-CIO has pledged to spent $40 million in the midterm elections.

"This is a record-breaking amount to focus on field for Congressional races in 2006. This has never been done before," said DCCC spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg.

"I think this is going to be a pretty historic, multimillion turnout operation," added another party operative.

Still, the brokering of the deal gave Republicans an opening to the highlight how the intraparty divisions among Democrats contrast with the GOP's turnout efforts. The RNC already has said it will fund the turnout operations for all House contests through its 72-hour program.

"It's nice that less than 60 days before election the DCCC chairman and the DNC chairman have decided to set aside their egos, speak and make nice," said National Republican Congressional Committee spokesman Carl Forti. "While the NRCC chairman and RNC chairman have been coordinating on turnout programs for months."

From the beginning of the cycle, Emanuel has been focused on raising the money to fund a massive TV air war for the fall campaign, and expressed concern that Dean would not have enough money to fund the ground war.

DOJ_NMG_0062267

One party operative familiar with the situation said Dean's priority all along has been funding the GOTV efforts.

"Dean was confident that if we didn't have money for the field operation, that would be critical," the operative said.

But both the DSCC and DCCC have taken measures to help implement field operations for their candidates.

The DSCC has been transferring money to state parties that are hosting key Senate races to help build the early infrastructure for a field operation.

Likewise, many Democratic House candidates have been carrying out a field plan for months and one operative noted that the DCCC's top staff have come from a field background.

"Do they really think Karin Johanson and Michael Whouley needed to hear from Howard Dean that we should have a field program?" the operative said. "If we needed Howard Dean to tell us we needed a field plan then why were our House candidates executing their field plans months ago?"

But Dean sympathizers say that the money that has been already been spent through their 50-state strategy efforts will benefit Congressional candidates as well. For example, the DNC has spent $8 million to update voter files around the country and has had paid organizers in Indiana since last year.

Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.), who is personally very close to Dean, helped to broker the deal, sources indicated. Clyburn met with Dean several months ago to talk about his belief that the field operation will be key.

Dean Agrees To Finance Some Programs For Turnout (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Ending a long and cantankerous standoff with House Democratic leaders, Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, has agreed to a limited program to finance get-out-the-vote operations this November, party officials said Tuesday.

But Mr. Dean remained at loggerheads with Senate Democrats, who continued to insist he provide more money.

The committee said it would provide $12 million to finance turnout operations for candidates running for the House and the Senate, and for state races. Just $2.6 million would go to finance turnout operations in 40 House races, far less than House Democratic leaders had asked for.

By contrast, the Republican National Committee has said it will spend more than $30 million of the $176 million raised this cycle to finance Republican turnout efforts, most of it going to House and Senate races.

Mr. Dean had staved off demands for more money from Democratic leaders in Congress, saying it was in the long-term interest of the Democrats to instead use the nearly $100 million he has raised this year to build strong Democratic organizations in all 50 states by giving them money to hire staff members.

The disagreement had sparked a lively feud between Mr. Dean and Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who is leading the Democratic effort to win back the House. Mr. Emanuel and Mr. Dean stopped speaking to each other several months ago.

Mr. Emanuel's aides said he was satisfied with the deal. "Yeah, we're happy," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Between our effort, the D.N.C. effort, the labor effort and what other Democrats are doing, we're going to have what we need for voter turnout."

Mr. Emanuel's counterpart in the Senate, Charles E. Schumer of New York, did not share his assessment. "We're still in the process of negotiating," Mr. Schumer said. "We're hoping that we'll have an amicable agreement that will make everyone happy."

Democratic Forces Salve Wounds (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

After months of behind-the-scenes infighting and public name-calling, leaders of the Democratic National Committee and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee reached agreement yesterday on a funding program to underwrite get-out-the-vote operations in the November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0062268

The national party agreed to put $12 million into voter-mobilization efforts this fall, with $2.4 million of it earmarked for 40 key House districts that are seen as competitive. The rest of the money will go to help candidates for Senate and governor and for outreach to the party's key constituencies.

"Democrats are unified and prepared to win up-and-down the ballot, all across America this November," DNC Chairman Howard Dean said in a statement.

"We feel good," said DCCC spokesman Bill Burton. "We're going to have the money we need to get out the voters we need in the places we need them."

Dean said the national party is making an unprecedented investment in the fall elections, but other Democrats said the $12 million figure is roughly the same as what it spent on House and Senate races in 2002. That year, the DNC spent millions more on gubernatorial races and redistricting and lent the DCCC close to $5 million in the final weeks of a losing campaign.

Dean and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the congressional campaign committee, have clashed throughout the year over the DNC's spending priorities. Dean has staunchly defended his "50-state" program, aimed at rebuilding state parties across the country. Emanuel has argued that the national party should target its resources this fall on those states and races that will determine who controls the next Congress.

Emanuel has engaged in expletive-laden shouting matches with Dean, walking out of one meeting with the former Vermont governor. But the DNC leader has rallied state party leaders, who are appreciative of the national committee's financial assistance, to defend his approach.

DNC officials talked about trying to include a clause in the agreement that would have provided additional assistance if Emanuel stopped bad-mouthing Dean, the blog Hotline reported yesterday, but a party source said it was never a serious proposal.

The Democratic Senate Campaign Committee also has pressed Dean to put more money into the fall campaigns. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the committee chairman, said in a statement he remains hopeful that an amicable agreement for more money can be achieved.Hacking Denied in Leak

The saga of how California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's private comments about a Latina legislator became public took another turn yesterday when the campaign manager for his Democratic challenger admitted the campaign had leaked the tape to the news media. But she denied hacking the Schwarzenegger computer system to get it.

"No one hacked," Cathy Calfo, campaign manager for California comptroller Phil Angelides, told reporters, according to the Associated Press. "They accessed information that was accessible to the public."

Schwarzenegger spokesman Adam Mendelsohn said the information was in a private area on the governor's Web site. Another gubernatorial official, legal affairs secretary Andrea Lynn Hoch, said the file was protected by a password.

It was all reminiscent of the 1988 presidential campaign, when then-Massachusetts Gov. Michael S. Dukakis (D) admitted that his campaign manager had leaked a tape damaging to Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) to the New York Times. His campaign manager, John Sasso, was forced to resign.

Schwarzenegger apologized for his remarks after they were published in the Los Angeles Times. They came in a private meeting, during which he and a top aide were speculating whether Republican Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia's heritage was Cuban or Puerto Rican.

"They are all very hot," Schwarzenegger said. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

Calfo said Angelides did not know that two of his staffers had passed the file on to the newspaper and said she was unhappy they had acted without her knowledge.

Democrats May Not Need A Contract With America To Win (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, September 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062269

WASHINGTON - If they're still looking to close the deal on November's midterm elections, why haven't the Democrats rolled out their own 2006 version of the Republicans' Contract with America, which was widely credited with helping that party win control of Congress in 1994?

One reason could be the influence of Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster who thinks the contract is overrated.

Mellman is a Democratic insider who's long advised leaders of his party and worked for all three of the Democrats' national political operations as well as state parties and officials. He doesn't just crunch numbers about today's voters, however. He has a keen eye for history. And his professorial take on 1994 is that the conventional wisdom is wrong, that the contract did not work as advertised.

To refresh your memory, Newt Gingrich and about 340 Republican House candidates unveiled the contract on the steps of the Capitol on Sept. 27, 1994. The contract promised that, if given power, House Republicans would enact eight proposals on their first day, then vote within 100 days on each of 10 more. The agenda promised votes on such poll-tested and popular issues as welfare restructuring and a child tax credit.

Sealing the legend, the Republicans went on to win 54 seats and take the House for the first time in 40 years.

Yet, as Mellman notes, the contract didn't transform the campaign.

Weeks later, the Times Mirror Center for the People & the Press - now the Pew Research Center - found that only 29 percent of registered voters had heard of the contract. Of them, half said it made no difference to their votes, a quarter said it made them more likely to vote Republican and a quarter said it made them less likely to vote Republican.

Said poll director Andy Kohut: "The much-ballyhooed Republican Contract with America has failed to do much to improve the prospects of Republican candidates."

One reason the contract might have cost as many Republican votes as it delivered was that it became a big juicy target. Democrats launched a $2 million ad campaign against it and hammered Republicans who signed on to it.

Republicans today would love to see a Democratic contract so they could line up ads against it.

Many Democrats think there's no need for a contract-like set of bumper-sticker proposals this year. The key to victory in November, they say, is the same force that drove the 1994 elections: anger and disappointment with the president and his party.

In 1994, Americans had turned against Democratic President Bill Clinton and the Democratic Congress. They didn't like gays in the military, an assault-weapons ban, tax hikes and Clinton's big-government health-care proposal.

They felt that way both before and after the contract was unveiled. Clinton's approval rating in the Gallup poll was 42 percent before the Republican agenda was announced and 46 percent the week before the election, statistically unchanged.

President Bush's approval rating now is 39 percent.

So rather than roll out a contract, Democrats might just heed the lesson of 1994, stick with the agenda they already have (raise the minimum wage, help pay for college, enact security revisions recommended by the Sept. 11 commission) and hope to ride anger at Bush into power.

Or they might just go with the bumper sticker that Gingrich himself suggested several months ago: "Had enough?"

That might not help them govern. Regardless of its impact on voters, the contract served as a blueprint for what Republicans would do in power and gave them claim to a mandate to do it.

But the slogan could be a winning strategy.

Nation: New Democrats' PAC Aids 'Red To Blue' Team (RC)

By Various Writers

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

As the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee showcases the candidates in its "Red to Blue" program tonight in Washington, D.C., members of the New Democrat Coalition will announce today that they are contributing at least $120,000 to the program's recipients.

Several top-flight Democratic challengers and open-seat candidates will be in town tonight as part of House Democrats' "March to the Majority" events.

Already the political action committee of the NDC has given $263,000 to Democrats in competitive House races.

DOJ_NMG_0062270

Today, the NDC, through Member contributions, will give $5,000 each to Darcy Burner, who is challenging Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.); Phyllis Busansky, in the race to replace Rep. Mike Bilirakis (R-Fla.); Joe Courtney, challenger to Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.); Tammy Duckworth, the Democrat in Illinois' open 6th district race; Diane Farrell, who is in a rematch with Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.); Gabrielle Giffords, who was expected to win the Democratic primary Tuesday in Arizona's open 8th district; Ron Klein, who is challenging Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.); Lois Murphy, who is in a rematch with Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.); and Ed Perlmutter, the Democrat in Colorado's open 7th district race.

In addition, Rep. Adam Smith (Wash.), the chairman of the NDC PAC, is giving $1,000 to each of the Democrats who are getting money from the PAC today, plus $1,000 each to Michael Arcuri, the Democrat in New York's open 24th district; John Cranley, who is challenging Rep. Steve Chabot (R-Ohio); ex-Rep. Baron Hill, who is in a rematch with Rep. Mike Sodrel (R-Ind.); Christine Jennings, the Democrat in Florida's open 13th district; ex-Rep. Ken Lucas, who is running against Rep. Geoff Davis (R-Ky.); Joe Sestak, who is challenging Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.); and Heath Shuler, who is challenging Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.).

NDC leaders expect to parcel the rest of the money out as Election Day draws nearer.

Bernie and Willie Team in New Senate TV Ad

Country icon and political activist Willie Nelson appears in the latest commercial for the Senate campaign of Rep. Bernie Sanders (I).

The spot was taped during Nelson's Aug. 8 visit to the Green Mountain State on Sanders' behalf. The two had met before at one of the Farm Aid rallies that Nelson had organized.

Interestingly, one shot taken during the rally for family farmers held in Charlotte, Vt., puts Sanders, Nelson and state Rep. David Zuckerman into the frame.

Zuckerman is the legislator who weighed a bid to succeed Sanders as the state's lone Congressman on the Progressive ticket — a move that seriously would have hindered the chances of state Sen. Peter Welch (D).

Sanders, and national and state Democrats, implored would-be Progressive candidates to stay out of the House race so as not to enhance the chances that the Progressive and Democratic candidate would split the left-leaning vote, opening the door for a Republican to win the seat.

Republicans have high hopes that retired Maj. Gen. Martha Rainville (R), who was heavily favored to win the GOP primary Tuesday night, can give Welch a run for his money even in a two-way race. But a new poll conducted for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee found Welch leading Rainville, 52 percent to 42 percent. The survey of 400 likely voters, taken Sept. 5-7 by Greenberg Quinlan Rosner, had a 4.9 percent margin of error.

Sanders appears to hold a commanding lead over Republican Richard Tarrant in the Senate contest.

Abortion Is Focus of Stender's First TV Ad

State Assemblywoman Linda Stender (D) on Tuesday launched her first TV ad in her bid to unseat Rep. Mike Ferguson (R). The ad, produced by All Points Communications LLC, focuses on the Congressman's position on abortion rights.

The ad features an unseen interviewer asking women on the street whether they knew of Ferguson's opposition to abortion "even in cases of rape and incest" and that he "wants to change the Constitution to make abortion a crime."

"These women are not criminals," one young woman responds. "They are not criminals at all. What does he want to do, send them to jail?"

A graphic then comes on the screen that reads, "Do You Really Know Mike Ferguson?" and directs viewers to a Web site, whymikewhy.com.

The north-central New Jersey 7th district voted narrowly for President Bush in 2000 and 2004, but national Democrats believe Stender has a real chance there this year, especially if she emphasizes her positions on social issues. The ad is expected to run on local cable TV channels for an indefinite period.

EMILY Adds Jennings to Its Candidate List

EMILY's List announced Tuesday that the organization is endorsing bank executive Christine Jennings (D) in the open-seat race to succeed Rep. Katherine Harris (R).

Jennings won the Democratic primary last week and faces what is still viewed as an uphill battle against wealthy car dealer Vern Buchanan (R) in November.

"Christine Jennings is a perfect fit to fill the leadership void suffered by the 13th district under Rep. Katherine Harris," EMILY's List President Ellen Malcolm said in a statement.

Harris is vacating the seat to run for Senate. The 13th district voted 56 percent for President Bush in the 2004 presidential election. Harris, however, won two terms in the House with 55 percent of the vote each time.

Porter Distances Himself From Manager's Words

Rep. Jon Porter (R) told the Las Vegas Review-Journal this week that his campaign chairman lied about his opponent — sort of.

Earlier, campaign manager Mike Slanker had told the paper that Tessa Hafen (D), former press secretary to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), had never made a mortgage payment in Nevada and had never held a job there.

"There's no question he should have qualified it," the paper on Monday quoted Porter as saying about Slanker.

Then he zinged her anyway.

"The bottom line is, she hasn't lived in Nevada for 12 years," Porter told the paper. "Voters need to know our backgrounds."

For the record, Hafen is a native of Henderson, and her father sits on the city council there. She also owns a home in the 3rd district and previously has worked in the state.

VIRGINIA Poll Indicates 'Macaca' May Have Hurt Allen

A Mason-Dixon Polling & Research poll released last weekend showed Sen. George Allen (R) with a slim 46 percent to 42 percent lead over former Reagan administration Navy Secretary Jim Webb (D).

The poll of 625 likely voters was conducted for a group of newspapers in the state. It had a 4 percent margin of error.

A July Mason-Dixon poll showed Allen with a 48 percent to 32 percent lead over Webb.

The new poll was taken after Allen's highly publicized gaffe while campaigning in August. That's when the Senator, at an event in southwestern Virginia, pointed to a Webb campaign volunteer of East-Indian descent, called him "macaca" and said, "Welcome to America."

Macaca is a type of monkey and is considered a racial slur in some languages. The volunteer, S.R. Sidarth, was born in Northern Virginia.

Both Allen and Webb currently are airing TV ads. Allen has been on TV for several weeks, while Webb went on the air this week.

The new Mason-Dixon poll showed that 20 percent of likely voters did not recognize Webb's name.

Midterm Loss Could Be '08 Gain For GOP White House Hopefuls (HILL)

By By Elana Schor And Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 13, 2006

A growing number of House Republicans are taking to the trail warning swing voters that a Democratic takeover would hand key chairmanships to the party's liberal wing. But some strategists see a silver lining to a GOP loss in November: its White House hopefuls can don the mantle of outsiders.

"The best possible thing for Republicans in 2008 would be Democrats controlling the House," conservative strategist and Weekly Standard editor William Kristol said earlier this year on Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report."

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) becoming Speaker, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) leading the Ways and Means Committee and Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) chairing Judiciary, Kristol added, would help "[Sen.] John McCain [R-Ariz.] or Rudy Giuliani or [Massachusetts Gov.] Mitt Romney (R) become president."

As both parties prepare for the best and spin for the worst, 2008 could find Republicans turning a Democratic House majority into bogeymen or Democrats continuing to link GOP majorities to the Bush administration. Political analyst and University of Virginia professor Larry Sabato wondered whether Democrats would find success in a narrow electoral failure.

"You can [argue] that Democrats would be much better if they got 217 seats in the House and 49 in the Senate, just enough to make sure nothing was done but not enough to be held accountable," Sabato said. "Republicans, by contrast, will benefit almost certainly from a Democratic takeover … because they can not be in charge of everything and can respond that Democrats are causing gridlock."

Among Kristol's trio of 2008 centrist GOP frontrunners, Giuliani and Romney could distance themselves from Washington regardless of the party controlling Congress. Although McCain could be more likely than other presidential hopefuls to maintain comity with a Democratic-controlled chamber, he would be forced to relinquish a chairman's gavel if Republicans lose the Senate.

"It all depends on the mood of the country," McCain said when asked if having an opposition majority to criticize could bear fruit in 2008. "If the party in power and the president in power have high approval ratings, no. If not, yes."

McCain's midterm forecast, issued last month on NBC's "Meet the Press," called for continued Republican control of the Senate but an uncertain House. "I think [Republicans will keep the majority], but it's just too early," McCain said.

Across the aisle from McCain, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is not in line for a chairmanship if Democrats defy the odds and win the Senate. But a Democratic-controlled Congress that seeks to further expose the Bush administration's mishandling of the Iraq war, even if centered in the House, could subject Clinton's vote to authorize the war to more scrutiny in a presidential primary.

Clinton made her own 2006 predictions during a campaign swing last month in upstate New York. She saw Democratic success "as long as we don't have candidates who fade when the heat is strong. ... If we don't elect one or both houses Democrat, we will not be able to do what we need to do in Iraq or anywhere else."

Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), also eyeing a White House run, acknowledged that Democrats would face policy pressures if they took back one or both chambers. Still, he took an optimistic view of congressional control as a springboard to the White House.

"The burden will be on us to prove we can do better, prove we can deliver the results Americans expect," Bayh said. "It's a burden we want. With governing comes responsibility, and we will need to give the public a taste of what they can expect if we were really leading the country."

Recalling his run as the Hoosier State's governor, during which Democrats controlled the legislature and later faced a 50-50 deadlock, Bayh added, "I'd much prefer having a majority to work with."

Jennifer Duffy, editor of the Cook Political Report, cautioned that the "burden" Bayh's party seeks could saddle them with a short record to run on in 2008.

"If Democrats have one or both chambers, with that comes the responsibility to govern," Duffy said. "But they won't have the majorities to govern and they have a president of the other party, [so] whatever does reach his desk probably gets vetoed. That puts them in a weaker place as far as '08 goes."

DOJ_NMG_0062273

One prominent Democratic pollster, who asked to remain anonymous speaking so close to the election, also raised the specter of tense gridlock in the wake of narrow Democratic victory this fall. That outcome would favor Democratic outsiders who can decry both parties' inaction, he added, a camp led by former vice-presidential nominee and Sen. John Edwards (N.C.) and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Still, the pollster said, "It's better to win than to lose."

Republican pollster Bill McInturff, of Public Opinion Strategies, dismissed any link between 2006 and 2008.

"There is little evidence that even significant off-year elections have any impact on the following presidential election," McInturff said via e-mail, citing former President Clinton's win two years after the Republicans swept into power and former President Reagan's landslide victory after a GOP stumble in 1982.

Yet, both Clinton and Reagan scored those wins running for re-election. McCain, Giuliani, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) have topped recent White House polls, and Clinton's fundraising advantage makes her a formidable opponent for any Democratic challenger, but with Vice President Cheney not seeking to step up, neither party has anointed an obvious heir.

Grover Norquist, the longtime Republican operative who heads Americans for Tax Reform, emphasized that uncertainty in arguing that smart candidates would not bet on their opponents handing them ammunition.

"You always want to have as much power as possible because it allows you to shape events," Norquist said. "We don't know what's going to happen."

Former Rep. Vin Weber (R-Minn.), now a lobbyist and frequent GOP political adviser, questioned the strategy of finding an upside to losing.

"You hear this calculation that you'd be better off losing, but no candidate or party can conduct themselves on that basis. … You cannot go into the campaign cycle [saying it is] better off to lose," Weber said.

Most presidential hopefuls, from McCain to Clinton to Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), have sought to stave off White House speculation until after the midterms. But the notion that party leaders are focusing on this fall and leaving presidential plans aside, however, did not wash with Duffy.

"Thinking about it?" she said. "They're obsessed with it."

How To Win By Losing (NYT)

By Ramesh Ponnuru

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Washington

CONSERVATIVES are dreading the November elections. The Republican capture of the House of Representatives in 1994 was one of modern conservatism's signal political accomplishments. Now the Democrats are poised to take back the House. If that happens, however, conservatives will find several silver linings in the outcome.

It would be worse for conservatives if Republicans actually gained seats. The Congressional wing of the party lost its reformist zeal years ago and has been trying to win elections based on pork and incumbency. An election victory would reward that strategy, leaving the congressmen even less interested in restraining spending, reforming government programs and revamping the tax code. Political incompetence and complacency, sporadic corruption and widespread cynicism: having paid a price for none of it, Republicans would indulge in more of the same.

Of course, that's just a thought experiment. Almost nobody thinks that Republicans are going to pick up seats. The question is whether they will have a reduced majority or no majority. And outright loss might be preferable. A narrower House majority would most likely accomplish even less than the current one has. The party's small moderate caucus would gain in power and use it to frustrate conservatives. With no conservative reforms on the horizon, congressmen would revert to the pork strategy.

A straight loss, on the other hand, would make the Republicans hungrier and sharpen their wits. Freed from the obligation of cobbling together thin majorities for watered-down legislation, Republicans would be able to stand for something attractive. Some conservatives worry that Republican officialdom will see defeat as a reason to turn left. But that didn't happen after the last major Republican defeat in 1992. Then, conservatives were able to persuade the party that it had not lost power because it was too far right. They would make the same case this winter, but with more voices in the news media than they had back then.

The effects of victory on the Democrats may also be helpful to Republicans. Powerlessness has stoked Democrats' rage. If the party wins the House, its left-leaning "net-roots" may grow more enraged still, because the Democrats would then have the illusion of power without its reality. Even under their most optimistic calculations, they would have the smallest Democratic majority since 1957 — and they will have to deal with a Republican president and (probably) Senate.

House Democrats could initiate countless investigations of the administration and schedule votes to make Republicans look bad. But they could not do much to affect either the conduct of foreign policy or the composition of the courts, which are the areas where their most fervent supporters most desperately want influence. If the Democrats try to appease their base by impeaching the president, they will probably increase President Bush's poll numbers, much as Republicans once improved President Bill Clinton's.

So the policy tradeoffs for Republicans are not especially troubling. They would still be able to set foreign policy and appoint judges. They would be blocked only from making domestic-policy reforms they show no sign of attempting anyway.

There is also the matter of the 2008 elections. Do Republicans really want to go into 2008 running a unified government? The last time an election maintained unified party control from one presidency to another was in 1928. And the 2008 elections matter more than the 2006 elections, because, again, the president has more say over foreign policy and the courts than the House does. If Democrats win the House now, the next Republican presidential candidate will be able to run against Nancy Pelosi and the liberal committee chairmen who would suddenly be in the headlines.

Winning in 2006 will make it harder for Democrats to address their long-term structural problems. It has happened before. They confused the Watergate landslide of 1974 for a mandate to embrace McGovernism for 20 years. If they win because of high gas prices, bad war news and conservative discontent now, they will be less likely to adopt new approaches to national security and social issues. That, too, will help Republicans in 2008.

Who knows? If Republicans play their cards right, and the Democrats prove unequal to the task of running the House, the voters could put the Republicans back in power on Capitol Hill in 2008. After a few years in the wilderness, maybe they will be disposed to using that power for conservative ends.

Citing Ethics, Rep. Mollohan Seeks To Turn Tables On Wakim (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W. Va.) faulted Republican state Del. Chris Wakim's ethics in a recent television advertisement alleging that Wakim, a bar owner, illegally paid winnings on video poker machines.

The allegations stem from 1996 when a patron of Wakim's bar, Knotty Pines, in Wheeling, W. Va., sued Wakim after being charged with driving under the influence of alcohol. In testimony from the deposition obtained by The Hill, Wakim's wife, Jeannette, said the bar paid winnings to patrons who gambled on video machines. Under state law, this was illegal.

The plaintiff's lawyer asked Jeannette Wakim if bartenders would loan cash to patrons to play the poker machines.

"Yes, it is [accurate]," she said.

Asked if people who played the machines were paid in cash, she replied, "Yes, they are," and the lawyer continued to press Wakim on whether patrons drank free when they played the video poker machines.

Will Holley, a spokesman for Wakim, defended the business practice, saying, "Everybody was doing it."

Gerry Griffith, a spokesman for Mollohan's campaign, disagreed.

"I would like to see Mr. Wakim prove that everybody did it. Everybody didn't do it. That argument doesn't hold water when our teenagers use it. It doesn't hold water when a man who wants to be a lawmaker uses it."

In 2001, West Virginia's then-Gov. Bob Wise (D) signed legislation that legalized and taxed video poker gambling, and banned the games from convenience and grocery stores and gas stations.

DOJ_NMG_0062275

West Virginia newspapers criticized Wakim for aligning a coalition of pub owners with religious groups who opposed making gambling legal.

"Chris opposed the bill because it gave preferential treatment and unfair tax advantages to large, out-of-state corporations who would take the money out of West Virginia at the expense of small businesses and fraternal, community-oriented organizations," said Holley.

Democrats also raised questions about whether Wakim paid sales tax on revenue earned from gambling machines. Holley said that tax records do not exist because they do not have to be saved for more than three years.

"Every dollar that was put into those machines was recorded and the city, state and federal governments all had access to those records to ensure tax compliance," he said. "Moreover, Chris's corporate records for 2000 were audited by the state government and there were no discrepancies found, whatsoever."

Allegations of ethical misconduct define the race, which is one of the few bright spots for Republicans in an otherwise terrible political climate. Federal investigators are scrutinizing Mollohan, a senior appropriator, for allegedly steering federal money to nonprofit organization and business interests run by family members and campaign supporters. Mollohan, a 12-term lawmaker, represents a district President Bush won in 2004 with 58 percent of the vote. Mollohan won 68 percent of the vote in 2004 and ran unopposed in 2002.

The media has raised questions about the accuracy of Wakim's resume. Wakim amended his campaign website biography in August because he had implied that he earned a master's degree in public policy from Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. Instead, he earned a master's degree in liberal arts from Harvard's Extension School.

Democrats and a veterans group also criticized Wakim for claiming that he is a Gulf War veteran even though he never served in combat or overseas during his 11-year career in the Army. Wakim served on an Army base in Massachusetts during the first Gulf War.

Now Democrats are raising questions about Wakim's business acumen. On his campaign website, Wakim writes that as an investment banker in Chicago, he managed a $180 million fund. He worked for the Prospect Heights, Ill.-based Household International, a bank that specialized in high-interest loans to customers with poor credit histories. HSBC, the British banking concern, purchased Household in 2002.

Other documents obtained by The Hill show that the West Virginia Alcohol Beverage Control Administration fined Wakim on two occasions.

In April 1996, the Alcohol Beverage Control Administration received a letter of complaint that Knotty Pines violated state liquor laws. Agents entered the bar at 4 a.m., and patrons were drinking and playing the machines. Wakim's wife waived a hearing and paid a $200 fine and $50 in court costs.

In November 2000, the state's Alcohol Beverage Control Administration cited Wakim's bar, the Tropicana Club, for "immoral conduct."

The agents' written notes say that they watched patrons play the video machines. At first, the poker machines would not take the agents' money. But the machine was fixed and they won and were paid by the bartender from a grey box and the cash register. The winnings were recorded in a booklet.

They also wrote in the report that they asked for a Jack Daniels and Coke to take away. According to the written report, the bartender mixed a "Crown and Coke in a Styrofoam cup and put a lid on it. She said she was not supposed to do it. She handed him the drink. We left the bar at 11:55 p.m."

Courtney Unveils New Ad On 'bush's No.1 Fan' (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Democratic House challenger Joe Courtney (Conn.) unveiled his first campaign commercial yesterday, tagging incumbent Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.) as "George Bush's No. 1 supporter" on energy, healthcare and Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0062276

The TV spot, which began running in the Hartford media market, underscores Courtney's effort to publicize Simmons' record of votes supporting the White House, which a recent study ranked first in the state delegation. The ad, set at a baseball game, features 30 people waving foam No. 1 fingers to represent Simmons' state ranking.

In New Mexico, A Horse Race (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. -- A Rhodes Scholar with a doctorate from Oxford, Rep. Heather Wilson has never faced doubts about her smarts. But proving her independence to the voters of New Mexico's First District gets harder with each passing day of the Iraq war.

Polls show the 45-year-old Republican running neck-and-neck with her Democratic challenger, Patricia Madrid, New Mexico's attorney general and a proven vote getter. As a member of the House Intelligence Committee, Ms. Wilson is feeling public anger over faulty prewar assumptions and the U.S.'s costs and casualties.

"The people understand: We want the troops home and the regime change here," says Terry Riley, a local activist for Veterans for Peace. "It is a good day to be on the street."

For President Bush, the election here poses a two-part test. First is public support for the war: "The eyes of the nation will be on this race," said Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), who flew in Saturday to help Ms. Wilson. Second is the administration's fall offensive on national security, with which the White House hopes to knock Democrats back on their heels. But unless Mr. Bush calibrates his demands for additional powers from Congress, he risks smothering endangered Republicans just when they need to show some independence.

Ms. Wilson isn't alone in this regard. Other Republicans, such as Connecticut Rep. Christopher Shays, are also paying a political price for supporting the president's Iraq policy. But Rep. Wilson's military background, past White House service under the president's father, and position on the Intelligence panel make her unique, and her race largely dominates this Southwest state.

"Sometimes the leaders of my party in Congress and in the White House don't agree with me, but I've always been willing to stand up and fight for things," Ms. Wilson says in a television ad. A Madrid ad counters: "Heather Wilson is on the Intelligence Committee but she never questioned George Bush on the war. That's not independence. Not by a long shot."

Ms. Wilson has begun to say more publicly that she had early doubts about prewar intelligence. But even as she tries to separate herself from the White House, this Air Force Academy graduate is being drawn into the fight over expanding the president's authority to conduct warrantless surveillance of electronic communications to and from the U.S.

Her legislation, introduced this summer, will be the starting point for House Republicans beginning committee markups today. The National Security Agency had input, Ms. Wilson says, noting that she didn't share the final proposal with the agency before the bill was filed.

"This is not an administration bill," Ms. Wilson says. But by subtly changing the definitions of electronic surveillance, the legislation, according to critics, gives the NSA license to intercept a broad range of international communications without a warrant. The political question -- for Congress and potentially Ms. Wilson -- is whether the administration will insist on even more flexibility than she has offered.

Her bill permits the president to go outside existing law to tap domestic calls for 60 days after a terrorist attack. But the Justice Department last week asked for similar authority before an attack.

"We think the president cannot and should not wait for thousands of Americans to die before initiating vital intelligence collection," Steve Bradbury, head of the department's office of legal counsel, told the House Judiciary Committee. Noting that Mr. Bush has operated until now without authorization from Congress, Ms. Wilson responds: "It is surprising that five years after 9/11 that the administration realizes it doesn't have the legal authority to keep us safe."

Asked if she felt pressure to avoid confrontation with the White House, Ms. Wilson said: "I can be educated, I can be persuaded. I negotiate, but pressure doesn't work with me. It never has."

DOJ_NMG_0062277

Republicans have held this House seat for decades, but John Kerry carried the First District in the 2004 presidential elections, and the Hispanic vote has grown to more than 30%. In eight years, Ms. Wilson has survived tight elections, but this is her first against a woman and looks closer.

In 2004, the congresswoman led by six points in a similar poll by the Albuquerque Journal at this juncture. Now, her margin is half that -- 45% to 42% -- after hammering Ms. Madrid for weeks with ads alleging the attorney general is cozy with casino interests, and has turned a blind eye to corruption in state government.

Ms. Madrid says, "It's a diversionary tactic, and I don't think it's worked, because I'm still even in the polls after they've spent a tremendous amount of money trying to discredit me." Asked what she thinks the campaign is about, she answers: "The war in Iraq."

"I believed that from the day I announced," Ms. Madrid says. "People are very frustrated that 'Stay the course' really means paralysis....This race is beyond our particular personalities, Heather and I. I can feel the mood of the country in my district....There's a bit of the flavor of the '60s."

In her Stetson and bolero, the 59-year-old attorney is very much the picture of old New Mexico, a black-clad figure walking in the state-fair parade in Albuquerque.

Ms. Wilson, a native of New Hampshire in pink polo shirt and khakis, appears more the transplanted Anglo walking the same parade route. The parking lot where marchers gathered beforehand was a composite of New Mexico: Apache tribesmen, Hispanic high-school military-cadet bands and white evangelical Christians.

"It's definitely a very interesting place," says Philip Muller, a political consultant transplanted from the Bay Area in California. "Even though it's a Democratic state, the Native Americans and Hispanics are very patriotic. It's conservative, but they are Democrats."

Ms. Madrid has two brothers who served in the Vietnam War. "This Driver is a Vet" reads the sign on the truck pulling her float in the parade.

"I feel very comfortable and confident," Ms. Wilson says. But there is anecdotal evidence that her fabled ground organization is having trouble this year, and state Republicans even sued county election officials, demanding changes in the locations of early-voting satellite sites.

The costly air war has Ms. Wilson tapping supporters in the oil industry for donations, including at a fund-raiser in Houston this week. She has resisted Democratic efforts to pressure companies to pay higher royalties for energy extracted from federal lands. She is among the top recipients of oil money in the House this year -- a fact Democrats have sought to exploit amid voter concern about fuel prices.

Voters Riding A Blue Wave (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson

Chicago Tribune, September 13, 2006

The percentage of Illinois voters who call themselves Democrats is at its highest pre-election level in more than a decade, posing a problem for Republicans trying to win the governor's mansion and key congressional seats, a Tribune/WGN-TV poll shows.

The poll found 43 percent of voters identified themselves as Democrats while a little more than a quarter of the voters identified themselves as Republicans. The 17 percentage point difference ranks among the most polarized partisan spreads in more than 16 years of Tribune surveys taken prior to an election day.

The results of the poll echo surveys taken nationally that show an increase in voters lining up in the Democratic column, a factor attributed to dissatisfaction with the Republican White House and GOP-led Congress on issues ranging from the war in Iraq to economic uncertainties.

The findings of the Tribune poll indicate the potential for trouble in Illinois for Republicans trying to revitalize a political party beset by scandal and infighting. The survey was conducted in the days following the sentencing of former Gov. George Ryan, whose corruption-tainted tenure helped end a quarter century of Republican administrations.

Because Illinois has no true partisan registration procedure, survey respondents were asked if they "considered themselves" to be a Democrat, a Republican or an independent/middle-of-the-road voter.

The findings largely represent the mood of the voter, which can fluctuate greatly due to a variety of political or news events. The survey of 600 registered voters likely to vote Nov. 7 has a margin of error of 4 percentage points. The results are considered very fluid and could change closer to the election.

Yet the findings of the poll, conducted Thursday through Sunday, could be problematic for Republican governor candidate Judy Baar Topinka (who faces a 12 percentage-point deficit in her challenge to Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich), for GOP candidates in the suburban congressional races and for Republicans in down-ballot races.

Chris Mooney, professor of political science at the University of Illinois at Springfield, said the poll findings reflected recent dissatisfaction with President Bush's administration and anti-war sentiment on top of the state's longer-term demographic trend toward the Democrats.

"The population has become more and more urban, it's become more and more non-white," Mooney said. "This [national] short-term bump toward Democrats is exacerbating the long-term trend."

Previous Tribune polling conducted during the last 16 years by Market Shares Corp. of Mt. Prospect, covering seven previous general elections, found nearly the same trend toward Democrats in the 1996 presidential election year. That year, President Bill Clinton was seeking re-election against a backdrop of investigation and criticism.

In 1996, 42 percent of Illinois voters identified themselves as Democrats in the October preceding the election while 27 percent aligned with Republicans—a 15 percentage point spread. Clinton ended up winning Illinois in 1996 with 54 percent of the vote and Democrats retook control of the Illinois House from Republicans after a two-year hiatus.

Traditionally, Democrats have enjoyed a plurality of the state's voters, meaning Republicans need to capture the support of their party faithful as well as a healthy majority of self-described independents to win.

In 1994, when the GOP kept the governor's chair and swept all statewide offices and control of the General Assembly, the percentage of voters who identified themselves as Democrats fell to 33 percent while Republicans were at 31 percent and independents were at 33 percent.

But the most recent Tribune poll found that even in longtime Republican-leaning regions, the GOP no longer might have the upper hand. In the collar counties, 31 percent of voters aligned themselves with Republicans while 29 percent identified with Democrats. Outside the Chicago metropolitan region, voters split equally at 36 percent between Democrats and Republicans.

"Here in Illinois, the Republicans are doing nothing to stop the bleeding so people will move more toward Democrats and the Democratic label to reaffirm their concerns at the national level," said Steve Brown, a spokesman for House Speaker Michael Madigan, the veteran Southwest Side lawmaker who also chairs the state Democratic Party.

Andy McKenna, the state's Republican chairman, acknowledged the GOP in Illinois suffered "tough years" in 2002 and 2004. But, he said, with Democrats in control of the state, "they're going to be judged by their leadership and I think the deficiencies in their leadership are beginning to show up" in the form of investigations into the Blagojevich administration.

Mooney, the U. of I. at Springfield professor, said he believed the party identification among voters might not be a significant factor in high profile races such as governor, where the candidates and their positions are well known.

"The partisan effect is the default when [the voters] don't have anything else to judge a candidate by," Mooney said. "You don't get that at the gubernatorial level. People know who Rod Blagojevich is and who Judy Baar Topinka is and more people will know by Election Day."

Some House Members Seeking Higher Offices Miss ’06 Votes (HILL)

By Tyler Kirtley And Ari Ruben

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Reps. Jim Davis (D-Fla.) and Butch Otter (R-Idaho) are both running for governor. Davis has missed 152 votes in 2006; Otter has missed 3.

They are among 16 members of the House that are running for a higher office this year. Statewide campaigns require time, money, and a great deal of energy. For some House members, it also leads to a lot of missed votes.

DOJ_NMG_0062279

The 16 congressmen have missed an average of 50 floor votes in 2006. Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.), who is running for the Senate, has been absent on 113 votes while Rep. Jim Nussle (R-Iowa), who is in a tight race for governor, has missed 110 votes.

Davis last week won the Democratic primary and hopes to replace term-limited Jeb Bush as governor of the Sunshine State.

Josh Ernest, the campaign's communications director, said, "[Davis] has worked very hard to balance his responsibilities as a member of Congress and his responsibilities as a state-wide candidate in Florida …. Over the course of his 10-year career in Congress, his attendance record is 93 percent."

When such a significant focus is placed on the campaign for the next office, missed votes can often resurface as political liabilities. In the 2004 presidential election, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and John Edwards (D-N.C.) were consistently criticized for missing votes on the Senate floor in favor of holding campaign events across the nation.

Already in 2006, Ford has been criticized for spending too much time away from D.C. as he battles to be the next Senator from Tennessee. In early July, the Tennessee Republican Party released a statement highlighting Ford's missed votes: "No respected employer would hire someone like Ford, who has a history of not showing up for work. I predict Tennessee voters will follow suit."

But the move backfired when further research showed that former Rep. Van Hilleary (R-Tenn.), who recently lost to Bob Corker in the Senate GOP primary in Tennessee, had missed more votes than Ford when he unsuccessfully ran for governor in 2002.

Otter has tried to avoid these problems by focusing on his duties in the House, saying, "If you do your best with the task at hand, folks tend to give you the benefit of the doubt when you ask for a promotion. My commitment to constituents has always been that representing them in Congress would remain my first priority, and it has."

However, Otter – unlike Davis — faced minimal opposition in his primary.

A pair of Republican congressmen has taken a more nuanced position in attempting to balance campaign necessities with the duties of serving in the House. Mark Green (R-Wis.) and Mark Kennedy (R-Minn.) knew that they needed to spend considerable time on the campaign trail in order to win this fall, and would inevitably miss votes. They have volunteered to return the salary that they would have earned for each day's worth of votes that they miss.

Both Green and Kennedy had stellar voting records in 2005. Green missed only seven and Kennedy missed none, being one of nine members to make every vote. While Kennedy has missed 20 votes in 2006, his office emphasizes that only 4 were missed because of campaigning.

Some of the 16 candidates running for higher office did not comment for this article.

Others were upfront. Gerry Fritz, spokeswoman for Rep. Katherine Harris's (R-Fla.), said, "She certainly tries to make as many votes as she can … [but] the campaign for Senate is the priority."

Harris is leaving the House in the long hopes of unseating Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.).

Casey College Speech Irks Some Catholics (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

Some Catholic conservatives are accusing the Catholic University of America of publicly favoring Democrat Bob Casey Jr. over Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania two months before an election that could decide who controls the Senate next year.

With the explicit permission of Catholic University's president, the Rev. David M. O'Connell, Mr. Casey will give the prestigious 38th annual Pope John XXIII Lecture tomorrow at the university's law school, Veryl Miles, the law school's dean, confirmed. Mr. Casey is an alumnus of Catholic.

Mrs. Miles acknowledged that Mr. Casey "has positions that differ from the church's teachings, but he is not being invited to speak on that."

"The university is clearly taking sides and has no business doing this in one of the most important elections in the country," said Bob Destro, a professor and former acting dean at the law school.

DOJ_NMG_0062280

"The race is one of the most hotly contested and important in the country ... and the votes of the Catholic community are likely to provide the margin of victory," Mr. Destro said yesterday in a letter to Father O'Connell.

Other prominent people have been barred from formal addresses on the campus because their views differed from Catholic teaching, Mr. Destro and others noted.

"Casey should not be given a free pass to speak at a Catholic institution, given his public opposition to the church's teachings on some critical life issues and on 'homosexual marriage,'" said Joseph Cella, president of Fidelis, a Catholic activist group.

The Cardinal Newman Society issued its own protest, saying that by "choosing a Catholic dissenter and active U.S. candidate for a prestigious lecture on public morality, the Catholic University of America law school is compromising its academic purpose, Catholic mission and political neutrality."

Mr. Santorum, a Republican, is a pro-life Catholic who opposes same-sex "marriage." He has steadily narrowed the gap with his challenger and now trails Mr. Casey by 4 percentage points in the latest John Zogby poll.

Through an aide, Father O'Connell declined to say whether he thought the invitation to Mr. Casey would be read by many Catholic voters in Pennsylvania as a signal that the hierarchy of one of the nation's top-rated Catholic universities was embracing Mr. Casey's candidacy.

"Whoever selected Casey for this honor must have known the impact it could have on his political campaign, and that violates academic neutrality," said Cardinal Newman Society President Patrick J. Reilly in an e-mailed statement. "They also must be aware that, regardless of politics, inviting a public dissenter to speak on 'America's Moral Compass' is a scandal to the faithful and undermines [the university's] Catholic identity."

Father O'Connell could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Mrs. Miles said that in June, when she decided to invite Mr. Casey to lecture on the importance of pro bono work for Catholic lawyers, she didn't think a speech to be given in an academic setting in the nation's capital would have much to do with a Pennsylvania election.

"I did know he was running for the Senate, but we are not in Pennsylvania, and this is not an election that would impact this community in Washington," she said.

Angelides Camp Says It Gave Arnold Tape To Times (LAT)

By Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

SACRAMENTO — The campaign of Democratic gubernatorial candidate and state Treasurer Phil Angelides today said it was the source of audiotapes of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger that were published last week by The Times.

Campaign officials said a researcher obtained the tapes legally from Schwarzenegger's website.

A day earlier, Schwarzenegger administration officials had said the tape was downloaded from a password-protected section of the governor's computer system and thus was unauthorized and "a breach of one or more security protocols."

The administration also said the California Highway Patrol, which is responsible for safeguarding state property, would investigate.

David Garcia, director of media relations at The Times, reiterated today that the newspaper "does not reveal its confidential news sources."

Angelides campaign manager Cathy Calfo said her camp came by the audiotape easily without a password or hacking. She said an Angelides campaign researcher who downloads documents daily from government websites got the material by backtracking from a link sent out Aug. 29 by Schwarzenegger's press office.

The link was suppose to connect listeners with a tape of Schwarzenegger discussing Hurricane Katrina and other topics at Cal State Long Beach.

"They're, I think, trying to distort the issue, make this an issue about someone 'hacking' when no one hacked," said Calfo. "They made a mistake and now they're trying to cover it up."

DOJ_NMG_0062281

Schwarzenegger campaign manager Steve Schmidt, in a conversation with reporters today, offered no evidence that the audiotape had been downloaded from a password-protected site. He referred to a statement issued Monday by Schwarzenegger legal affairs secretary Andrea Hoch that described the site as private and requiring the use of passwords. Schmidt also questioned why the Angelides campaign would leak the tape if it was publicly available.

Calfo said the researcher used the link in the Schwarzenegger press release to download four hours of tapes that included six minutes of Schwarzenegger bantering last spring with his chief of staff, a speechwriter and a speech coach.

In that casual conversation, the governor described Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City) as "hot" — a fiery personality — and attributed that temperament to a mix of "black blood" and "Latino blood."

On the recording, the governor and his staff also comment on other lawmakers: Republican Assembly members Kevin McCarthy of Bakersfield and George Plescia of San Diego, calling McCarthy "Bakersfield boy" and comparing Plescia to a startled deer.

After The Times published the audiotape last week, the governor apologized and said reading a transcription of his comments made him cringe.

Calfo said that she did not know that campaign workers had obtained the audiotape until Monday afternoon, and she added that she was "not happy" about it. She described Angelides as "surprised" and "disappointed."

"The information was accessible on a public website," said Calfo. "I can say I would have handled it very differently. I think that I would have directed reporters to that public website.

"I feel like a decision like that should have been made at the highest levels of the campaign and it wasn't," she said.

Angelides spokeswoman Amanda Crumley identified the two campaign workers involved in the downloading and leak as researcher Sean Sullivan and press spokesman Dan Newman.

On Monday, the communications director for the Schwarzenegger campaign called on Angelides to denounce "the unethical actions" taken on his behalf.

"Phil Angelides has a long history of gutter politics," said Katie Levinson in a statement, "and it is clear this most recent example was a calculated effort to smear the governor's reputation." nancy.vogel@latimes.com

Rival Admits Leaking Schwarzenegger Tape (AP-Y)

By Laura Kurtzman

AP, September 12, 2006

The campaign of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's Democratic rival acknowledged Tuesday that it downloaded — and leaked to the media — a recording of a private meeting in which the governor described a Hispanic legislator as having a "very hot" personality.

But Cathy Calfo, campaign manager for Democrat Phil Angelides, said the campaign had done nothing wrong because the file was available publicly on the governor's Web site.

"No one hacked," Calfo said at a news conference to address the role played by the Angelides campaign, first reported by The Sacramento Bee. "They accessed information that was available to the public."

Schwarzenegger spokesman Adam Mendelsohn said someone would have had to snoop to find the audio file.

"The file that was leaked to the Los Angeles Times was in a private area of the governor's server not accessible to the public without manipulation of information," he said.

Schwarzenegger's legal affairs secretary, Andrea Lynn Hoch, said the sound file was stored in a password-protected area. She said she forwarded the Internet Protocol address used to download the file to the California Highway Patrol, which is investigating.

Calfo said she was unhappy that two campaign staffers had passed the audio clip to the Times without her knowledge. Angelides did not know about it, either, she said.

"We're looking into it now," she said. "Am I happy? No."

DOJ_NMG_0062282

Earlier Tuesday, Schwarzenegger campaign spokeswoman Katie Levinson called on Angelides to "denounce the unethical actions taken on his behalf" and accused him of trying to smear the governor. Schwarzenegger is seeking re-election in November.

The recording of the governor's comments caused a minor controversy, with some Democrats complaining bitterly and others saying the remarks were playful and not offensive.

The recording was made during a speech-writing session in the governor's office last March. In it, Schwarzenegger and his chief of staff, Susan Kennedy, speculate lightheartedly about the ethnic background of state Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia.

After they chat about whether she is Cuban or Puerto Rican, Schwarzenegger says: "They are all very hot. They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

With Garcia by his side, the governor apologized for his remarks on Friday, saying he cringed when he read them. Garcia said she was not offended.

Schwarzenegger, who was in Los Angeles on Tuesday to sign a bill raising the minimum wage, said of the controversy: "I don't really want to interfere with all this little, trivial things."

Asked whether the recording could have been on a public part of the governor's Web site, Schwarzenegger said, "Let the experts deal with that."

Governor's Comments Were Leaked By Foe's Camp (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 12 — The campaign of the Democratic candidate for governor, Phil Angelides, said Tuesday that it was the source of audio files containing impolitic remarks by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger. Those remarks were the subject of a front page article last week in The Los Angeles Times, which led to an apology by the governor.

Mr. Angelides's campaign manager, Cathy Calfo, said at a news conference in Sacramento that the files had been culled from a Web site accessible by the public and that campaign staff members had not trespassed into a secure area of the governor's office.

The California Highway Patrol, at the request of Mr. Schwarzenegger's office, is investigating whether the files were obtained illegally. Mr. Schwarzenegger's communications director, Adam Mendelsohn, said Tuesday that while the Web site with the audio files was not as secure as it ought to be, it was not publicly accessible.

"That area was password protected," Mr. Mendelsohn said, "but the administration knows that with enough manipulation, it could be accessed."

Last week, The Los Angeles Times reported that in a private meeting with his chief of staff, Susan Kennedy, and one of his speechwriters, Gary Delsohn, Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, surmised that a Republican colleague of Puerto Rican descent was passionate because of her ethnicity. The exchange had been recorded by Mr. Delsohn to use as reference material.

"I mean Cuban, Puerto Rican, they are all very hot," Mr. Schwarzenegger said, comparing the colleague, Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia, to a bodybuilder he once knew. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

While Ms. Garcia said she did not mind the remark, the Angelides campaign sharply criticized the governor, who called a news conference on Friday and offered an apology. The matter was then referred to the Highway Patrol, which is in charge of policing state facilities.

Speaking to reporters on Tuesday, Ms. Calfo called the Schwarzenegger camp's characterization of the episode "politically motivated" and "outrageous" and added, "We believe these audio files accessed through a public Web site requiring no password are a matter of public record."

She said that anyone who received a news release e-mailed by the governor's office in August with an audio file about Hurricane Katrina could have clicked on a link and with a few strikes of the backspace key have been linked to the audio files. Those files, she said, have since been removed from the site.

DOJ_NMG_0062283

Ms. Calfo said two members of the campaign staff — one in the press office and another in the research department — gave the downloaded files to The Los Angeles Times without her knowledge. She was "not happy about it," she said.

The episode is perhaps the singular snapshot of the sleepy governor's race, in which Mr. Schwarzenegger has trotted far ahead of Mr. Angelides but once again has found that his biggest liability can be the space between his nose and his chin.

His remarks about Democrats, women, nurses and others since taking office in 2003 have caused controversy many times, and dogged him during his first campaign.

"This reminds us that Arnold Schwarzenegger is capable of verbal self-destruction at any point in the campaign," said Bruce E. Cain, the director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California, Berkeley.

At the same time, Mr. Angelides, has been unable to use a weak moment for Mr. Schwarzenegger to define his own campaign better. Instead, he has been put on the defensive and his campaign forced to fend off claims of being underhanded.

"Voters know that Arnold has a penchant for saying things he shouldn't say," said Garry South, a Democratic political consultant. "But they don't have a clue who Phil Angelides is."

Thad Kousser, a professor of political science at the University of California, San Diego, said that neither side had emerged particularly well from the episode, but that that could change if it was determined whether the Web site was publicly accessible.

"If it turns out that the tape was hacked," Mr. Kousser said, "it feeds into the feeling about the Angelides campaign that he is too political and too negative."

Either way, it is not the stuff of a great policy debate, he said.

"This is California politics," Mr. Kousser added, "so it always seems ridiculous."

Colorado Rule Limits Union's Contributions (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

DENVER -- Colorado Secretary of State Gigi Dennis is taking on the state's powerful unions over their anonymous donations on behalf of their members to political campaigns.

Mrs. Dennis, a Republican, ruled last month that small-donor committees, the source of most union contributions, must have permission from contributors before they can use dues money for political campaigns.

She also required such committees to attest that the donations came from U.S. citizens, as mandated by the state constitution. Small-donor committees typically bundle contributions of less than $20, which are not subject to disclosure laws.

State Democrats and union leaders have fired back with a lawsuit that goes before a hearing tomorrow in Denver District Court.

Clear Peak Colorado, a left-leaning 527 group, is running radio ads accusing Mrs. Dennis of "trying to muffle thousands of Coloradans -- teachers, nurses, firefighters, workers of all kinds." A 527 is an independent political advocacy group so named for the section of the IRS code that governs its nonprofit status.

"She's clearly using her office as a platform to advance the Republican agenda," said John Willard, spokesman for Clear Peak Colorado.

But state Republicans, who have long complained about the lack of transparency in union giving to Democrats, cheered the move as a necessary step in ridding the political system of potentially illegal donations.

"It is time to Colorado's unions to stop collecting political money from people who are illegally in this country," said Colorado Republican Party Chairman Bob Martinez.

Republican political consultant Rob Fairbank said small-group committees gave $1.5 million in bundled, anonymous donations in the 2004 legislative races. Democrats took over both houses of the legislature that year after a surge in campaign spending.

Before the Aug. 5 ruling, unions had contributed $1.35 million to Democratic legislative candidates, accounting for more than 40 percent of Democratic fundraising in key legislative races, according to a Rocky Mountain News analysis.

"You have this large amount of anonymous money that goes into campaigns at a rate of 10 times more than individuals can give," Mr. Fairbank said. "There's a reason to believe that some of this is coming from noncitizens."

DOJ_NMG_0062284

Mr. Fairbank, a former state legislator, has filed his own complaint with the Secretary of State's Office against the union Mountain West Regional Council of Carpenters, arguing that the small-donor committee knowingly accepts donations from illegal aliens.

The union differs from others in that it lists members who give political contributions of less than $20. Mr. Fairbank's consulting group, Politically Direct, did a spot check of those donors and found four noncitizens.

He was tipped off to possible abuse by union executive Jim Gleason, who was quoted two weeks ago as saying that his union is trying to recruit immigrants to bolster its membership.

"When you have union bosses in Colorado stating that large numbers of their members are not U.S. citizens, then the secretary of state has a responsibility to do something," Mr. Fairbanks said.

Not so, said critics, who say Mrs. Dennis is more interested in cutting off Democratic campaign funding than catching a few illegal donors.

Democrats also argue that Mrs. Dennis has overstepped her authority, noting that the state legislature recently defeated a so-called "paycheck protection" bill that would have required unions to ask permission before using dues for political campaigns.

Mrs. Dennis said she was following the orders of voters, who in 2002 approved Amendment 27, a campaign-finance reform initiative that requires the secretary of state to "promulgate such rules ... as may be necessary to administer and enforce" the amendment.

New Stem Cell Ethics Issue Emerges (LAT)

By Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

UC San Francisco researcher Renee Reijo Pera has a well-equipped laboratory, generous funding and an ample staff of scientists working to create new lines of embryonic stem cells.

She has everything she needs to do cutting-edge work except one thing: fresh human eggs.

While the world debates the morality of stem cell research, scientists are grappling with a more basic issue — a shortage of eggs that they say is crippling their work.

"Without eggs, there's no research," said Dr. Robert Lanza, medical director of the biotechnology company Advanced Cell Technology Inc.

Women routinely provide their eggs to fertility clinic patients, who pay $5,000 to $50,000.

But stem cell researchers are forbidden to pay for eggs by ethical guidelines from some of the most influential scientific organizations in the world, including the National Academies, which advises the U.S. government on scientific issues. California, Massachusetts, Canada, South Korea and the European Union all have passed laws barring payments.

Laurie Zoloth, a bioethicist at Northwestern University's Feinberg School of Medicine, said payments to donors would create an exploitative trade, taking advantage of women who might be so desperate for money that it clouded their judgment about the medical risks of the harvesting procedure. Bone marrow and kidney donors are unpaid for that reason, she said.

But stem cell researchers argue that it is only fair to pay donors because of the time, discomfort and risks involved. They note that research subjects are compensated for their time.

Researchers have so far complied with the payment restrictions, but the shortage has become so acute that some scientists are beginning to contest the ethical underpinnings of the status quo.

"We need to make a decision: Do you want the research to proceed or not?" Lanza said.

Though much stem cell research can be conducted without human eggs, they are key to one of the most important areas: the creation of stem cells that are genetically matched to patients.

These cells could generate replacement tissues for damaged hearts, spinal cords and other organs without requiring patients to take anti-rejection drugs. Researchers also say they would be able to create cells with the genes for specific disorders to study without risking a patient's safety.

Traditional embryonic stem cells are derived from fertility clinic leftovers. Their genetic makeup is left to chance. Customized stem cells are given a specific genetic identity from a particular patient. They are clones of a patient's cells.

DOJ_NMG_0062285

Creating them requires a bit of biochemical magic. Scientists remove the DNA from an egg and replace it with DNA from the patient. Then the egg must be tricked into dividing as if it had been fertilized.

The technique, called somatic cell nuclear transfer, produced Dolly the cloned sheep in 1996. It has since been used to clone horses, cats, one dog and other animals.

Stem cell researchers aren't interested in cloning babies. They only want the cloned cells to divide for a few days until they form a cluster of about 150 cells, known as a blastocyst. Then they can harvest the stem cells.

The problem is that getting cells to reach that point is difficult. Disgraced South Korean scientist Hwang Woo-suk went through 2,236 eggs, and as government investigators later discovered, he did not produce a single embryo.

British researcher Alison P. Murdoch at Newcastle University created three human embryo clones, but none lasted long enough to produce stem cells.

Acquiring thousands of eggs will take more than an appeal to the altruism of volunteers, scientists fear.

Extracting eggs involves weeks of psychological and medical testing, followed by more than a week of hormone injections. When the time is right, the donor is sedated as a doctor uses a long needle to extract eggs in their follicles. One cycle typically produces seven or eight usable eggs.

The procedure, though routine, includes such possible risks as bloating, headaches and ovarian hyperstimulation, which can be fatal.

Despite opposition from some social conservatives, paying women to donate eggs for in vitro fertilization has become a largely accepted practice, partly because the goal is to help a someone have a baby.

Stem cell research, on the other hand, is steeped in controversy, and the idea of donors profiting from a process that ultimately destroys embryos is viewed by many as unseemly.

The first explicit prohibition on paying egg donors appeared in Proposition 71, the 2004 California initiative that authorized $3 billion in state spending on stem cell research. In an effort to prevent the exploitation of women and to make the measure more appealing to voters, it specifically ruled out compensation to publicly funded researchers, though it does permit reimbursement for some expenses.

That policy influenced the National Academies, which warned in a 2005 report that payments to egg donors "might undermine public confidence" in stem cell research.

Although the organization can't enforce its guidelines, they became the ethical blueprint for most American universities and private labs.

The controversy has delayed UCSF's plans to accept donor eggs for research. The result is that Reijo Pera's lab must rely on leftover eggs that didn't merge with sperm in the university's in vitro fertilization clinic.

Such "failed-to-fertilize" eggs have become the workhorse of nuclear transfer experiments, even though researchers suspect the eggs are too flawed to produce cloned embryos.

Scientists have been speaking out, testifying before legislators in Massachusetts, where compensation was outlawed last year, and California, where a bill banning all compensation was sent to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Aug. 31.

The controversy prompted the American Society for Reproductive Medicine's ethics committee to revisit the issue. The panel concluded that if it was permissible for fertility patients to pay women for their eggs, stem cell researchers should be able to do so too.

"Regardless of the application of the eggs, the process was still the same," said the committee's chairman, Dr. Robert G. Brzyski, a reproductive endocrinologist at University of Texas Health Science Center at San Antonio.

So far, the lobbying efforts haven't made much difference. The payment restrictions in California's Proposition 71 have become the de facto standard throughout the world, in large part because researchers elsewhere have to play by those rules if they want to collaborate with state-funded scientists.

Proposition 71's rules cannot be changed until three years after its passage.

That has forced researchers to get creative. Murdoch, of Newcastle University, is offering to fund fertility treatment for women who are willing to give half their eggs to scientists.

DOJ_NMG_0062286

Though critics see the bargain as tantamount to paying women for their eggs, Murdoch notes a key difference: The women are already seeking in vitro fertilization, so they aren't taking on medical risk for money.

Researchers also are pursuing scientific solutions, such as trying to artificially ripen immature eggs that are discarded by fertility clinics. Scientists also have considered salvaging eggs from ovaries that are removed during routine surgeries and growing them from scratch using human embryonic stem cells.

"The egg bottleneck will be overcome," said Dr. Irving L. Weissman, director of Stanford University's Institute for Stem Cell Biology and Regenerative Medicine. But "it will take time."

In the meantime, Advanced Cell Technology is relying on newspaper ads to recruit egg donors. Several women responded to the ads, which began running in December, but backed out when they learned they could not be compensated, Lanza said.

After 10 months, one woman has passed the physical and mental health exams. She was scheduled to begin the egg retrieval regimen last week and could have eight eggs ready to harvest in early October.

Senator May Ease View On Portfolios Of Fannie, Freddie (WSJ)

By Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a move that could clear the way for congressional passage of legislation toughening the regulation of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, Senate Banking Chairman Richard Shelby indicated new flexibility on the most divisive issue: specific limits on the mortgage giants' portfolios.

Mr. Shelby said that as long as the risks posed by the companies' size are addressed, it might not matter if specific portfolio limits are written into law or if this is overseen by a strong new federal regulator. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, emerging from separate accounting scandals, together hold more than $1.4 trillion in their mortgage portfolios. "There has to be some concern about the growth of the portfolios, because that's where the risk is," Mr. Shelby said in an interview.

The Treasury Department also signaled more flexibility yesterday. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has "clearly indicated a willingness to discuss meaningful alternative solutions" to address risks posed by the companies, said Randal Quarles, undersecretary for domestic finance. In the past, Mr. Shelby has pressed for specific limits on the companies' portfolios. Last year, his committee narrowly passed a bill to establish a new regulator and force the companies to strip certain assets from their portfolios.

Separately, Freddie Mac said the Justice Department's investigation into the company's $5 billion accounting scandal is inactive, and it doesn't expect to face charges. Freddie Mac spokesman Doug Duvall said federal prosecutors have "not initiated contact with us in well over two years and it is our understanding that the matter is inactive. Accordingly, we expect no further action in this matter." A spokesman for Chuck Rosenberg, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia, declined to comment. News that the investigation into Freddie Mac appeared to have ended was reported earlier by the Washington Post.

Flush With Jobs, Wyoming Woos Rust Belt Labor (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

GILLETTE, Wyo., Sept. 6 — Houston Mellentine, 10, held up the rattlesnake tail he kept in a box. “Killed it right over there,” he said, pointing to the edge of his family’s dirt front yard.

His mother, Melissa, sat in a folding chair as the sun set one recent evening, eyeing the snake’s tail in her son’s hand. “They don’t have rattlesnakes in Michigan,” she said somewhat longingly, at least not in her old front yard.

But then, Michigan has few of the types of jobs that brought the Mellentines here.

Labor-starved Wyoming, with its energy boom in coal, oil and natural gas, is vigorously courting the workers of the Rust Belt — in particular, those in Michigan’s struggling auto industry. And the workers are responding, and adjusting to a very different life in the West.

Wyoming economic development officials and company representatives are planning their third recruiting trip this year, visiting job fairs next month in Flint, Lansing and Grand Rapids. A billboard depicting a lush Wyoming will go up on the highway outside Flint later this month and be seen by an estimated 65,000 people a day.

DOJ_NMG_0062287

"Michigan has been very good for us," said Ruth Benson, the director of the Campbell County Economic Development Corporation, who has twice led recruiting expeditions to depressed cities in Michigan.

So far, about 1,500 Michigan residents have signed up to receive job postings through the Wyoming work force Web site, and at least several hundred, employers and recruiters say, have moved to the state.

Mrs. Mellentine's husband, Joe, is one of those who heard the call. Mr. Mellentine, 35, a former ironworker and landscaper from Chesaning, just outside Flint, moved here in March after hearing about Wyoming at a job fair. "I came to get a piece of the American pie," said Mr. Mellentine, who works for a company that prepares sites for natural gas drilling.

Mrs. Mellentine and their two sons joined him in July, and he has since talked three of his childhood friends in Michigan into heading West as well.

They are all still very much adjusting to the change. But many former Michigan residents say their Wyoming experience — voting for change with their feet, trading the comfortable and familiar for a boomtown life more than 1,000 miles from home — has reaffirmed their faith that good things can still happen with a little gumption.

"A lot of people are afraid to take a chance," said Eric Chapdelaine, 33, who was lured here by Mr. Mellentine and is now driving a cargo truck to coal mines and drilling sites. "But you've got to make it happen — or sit back and let it happen."

The local police are also aware of the Michigan labor pool. Chief Richard Adriaens of the Gillette police was hired in 2004 from a suburb near Detroit. Since then, he has returned and found three more fellow Michiganders to add to the town's 48-officer roster, with another recruiting swing planned for later this year.

Michigan is attractive, Chief Adriaens said, because the police training is excellent, but the job market is not. "We've tried some other areas that had depressed economies, but they weren't the same," he said.

Officials in Michigan, where the unemployment rate was about 7 percent in July, said they were unconcerned about the Wyoming employment campaign, mostly because it had involved only a small fraction of the state's workers and had not signaled a wholesale migration. The state also has some experience with this situation: in the early 1980's, thousands of laid-off auto workers moved to Texas during the oil boom there.

"It's a good thing that people that have salable skills use them, even when we have to lose them," said Michael Shore, a spokesman for the Michigan Economic Development Corporation.

By the standards of the nation's past great labor migrations — the industrial revolution in the late 1800's that filled urban factories with former farmers, the Dust Bowl diaspora to California in the 1930's, the tide of blacks from the South in World War II seeking work in northern factories — what is happening here is an aberration, historians and geographers say.

Economic trends have mostly gone the other way since World War II, they say, anchoring blue-collar life. Families that require two incomes to make ends meet are less able to leave, even when one income is lost. A college education increases knowledge of options that may exist elsewhere, but many blue-collar workers do not have a degree.

"People with high education and skills are the first to leave a declining area," said Mark E. Reisinger, an assistant professor of geography at the State University of New York at Binghamton who studies labor mobility. "People who never left home to go to school are more tied to place."

Wyoming recruiters say there is another element to their admiration for Michigan. Not only are the people there akin to Wyomingites in the ways and wiles of work, but they also have an inner toughness, they say, that can only come from surviving harsh northern winters.

The state tried a job campaign in the South last fall after Hurricane Katrina, hoping to draw displaced oil industry workers. But the effort largely flopped when people who were used to working on the balmy Gulf Coast got wind of what life can be like in Wyoming in January.

"People keep talking about the winters, but I'm not scared," said Tami Studer, who moved to Casper this summer from Lansing with her husband, Philip, who now works nights for a company that makes equipment for natural gas drilling. One conversation at the local Wal-Mart, though, did give her pause, she said. A boy was talking about the thermometer hitting 43 below.

The other word often mentioned by the newly arrived is "empty." Wyoming has just about 500,000 people spread across 97,000 square miles. Michigan has nearly 10 million people in 57,000 square miles.

DOJ_NMG_0062288

"I thought I was a country girl until I came here," Mrs. Mellentine said. "But I love it."

What happens down the road in Wyoming — whether transplanted lives will take root or last just a season or two — will probably depend on people like Josh Dagen.

Mr. Dagen is 19 and three months out of Byron High School in Michigan. He arrived here in late July, had a job the next day driving a dump truck at a coal mine and now makes about $1,000 a week, including overtime, he said.

When asked if he planned to stay in Wyoming, he said, "I'm not sure yet."

"But if things go well," he added, "I might stay, because nothing is going to happen in Michigan in the next 10 years at least, and there's money out here to be made."

Mr. Dagen said he was encouraging his parents to move.

"We're thinking about it," his mother, Kristine, said in a telephone interview. "Seems like every other person I talk to knows somebody who's going out there, or has gone out there, or is talking about it."

But Harley Mellentine, Houston's 12-year-old brother, is not so sure that Wyoming will be a perfect fit for him.

"Michigan will always be home," he said firmly, sitting outside the family house. "No matter how long we stay here, Michigan is always going to be home to me."

America's Dynamic Workforce (HILL)

By Elaine Chao

The Hill, September 13, 2006

Those who hoped that the collapse of the World Trade Center buildings would collapse the American economy have been greatly disappointed. Five-years after those horrific attacks, America's economy is strong and growing — thanks to the strength, resiliency and competitiveness of our nation's economy and our workforce.

The national unemployment rate (4.7 percent in August) is a full one percent lower than the 5.7 percent average for the decade of the 1990s. Our economy has generated job growth for 36 months straight, with more than 5.7 million net new jobs created since August 2003. In 2005, real hourly earnings were 1.7 percent higher than in 2000, compared to a 1.6 percent decline in real earnings between 1990 and 1995.

Moreover, the average amount of total compensation in 2005 was 7 percent higher than in 2000. Workers know that overall compensation is what really counts because it includes all of the benefits that workers cherish, including health care coverage, paid time off and retirement benefits.

After-tax income, per capita, has gone up by 8.9 percent since the beginning of President George W. Bush's administration. That means more money in the pockets of working men and women.

Specifically, it means that the average American brings home over $2,000 more each year than they did in January 2001. That's real (inflation-adjusted) money that is going to be spent, saved or invested by the people who earned it. Despite the unprecedented challenges that our country has faced over the past five years, the president's policies have created the climate for the steady, consistent growth that is the envy of other major industrialized nations.

Germany and France, for example, have unemployment rates nearly double that of the U.S. and long-term unemployment rates that are nearly three times as high. The median length of unemployment in Germany is more than 52 weeks, compared with 8.9 weeks for Americans. And in Europe, gasoline prices are more than $6 per gallon! A snapshot of our nation's economy and workforce are included in a newly released Department of Labor publication entitled America's Dynamic Workforce.

Today, America competes in a worldwide economy. Some countries are vying with each other to attract the lowest-skilled, lowest-paid jobs. That's not where America's economic future lies. Our country must attract and create the highest-skilled, highest-paid jobs in the world for America's workers.

There are millions of new jobs in industries that did not exist a generation ago. These industries provide high-value, high-paying jobs and demand workers with higher skills and more education. This does not necessarily mean a 4-year college degree, but it does mean that additional specialized training will become the norm for the American worker.

For workers supporting families, making house and car payments and contributing to their retirement, affording the cost of continuing education can seem a stretch. That's why this administration strives to make effective investments in worthwhile education and training programs that prepare workers for jobs. And that's why this administration advocates innovative ways for workers to access career development opportunities.

The president's Career Advancement Accounts proposal would empower eligible workers with up to $3,000 to purchase the education and training that suits them best. Career Advancement Accounts would give many workers a chance to take the next step up the career ladder, increasing the opportunity for them to achieve their American dream. Career Advancement Accounts are Pell grants for workers.

America's greatest economic strengths are our workforce and an economic system that empowers the individual and creates limitless opportunities to build better lives. The challenge is to ensure that our nation's workers have access to the education and skills training they need to thrive and remain competitive in the 21st century economy. With the right tools and skills, American workers can and will out-compete anyone in the world.

Chao is the U.S. Secretary of Labor. For a copy of the America's Dynamic Workforce publication go to www.dol.gov.

Why I Started The Project (USAT)

By Grover Norquist

USA Today, September 13, 2006

In 1989, I read an advertisement placed by a major American corporation, whose central concerns were promoting free trade and low taxes, looking for a chief Washington lobbyist. The ad specified the company was looking for a Democrat. But why? Most Democrats were opposing free trade and low taxes, and supporting trial lawyer abuse of companies such as the one looking to hire.

Why did the ad demand a Democrat? Because the year was 1989 and we were in the 35th year of Democrat Party dominance of the House of Representatives. Businesses were told to hire Democrats and contribute to Democrats (or else!) even though most opposed the goals of American business. Many businesses hired and contributed as they were told. They "paid to play." In his book Honest Graft, longtime journalist Brooks Jackson describes how Democrat enforcer Tony Coehlo operated to get free-market businesses to act against the interest of their shareholders.

That is why, in 1989, I created the K Street Project to encourage trade associations and Washington offices of Fortune 500 firms to hire men and women who share their values and goals: low taxes, less spending, free trade — and to avoid the pressures to hire for "access." The K Street Project is transparent. Its website is www.Kstreetproject.com.

Some partisan Democrats have claimed that the K Street Project is the Republican version of how Coehlo and the Democrat majority acted for 40 years. Here they are just projecting their own misbehavior. If any Republican today says "hire my staff" for access, that is just as wrong as when the Democrat majority did it for 40 years.

My goal is a Washington where labor unions hire big-government, tax-and-spend liberals because that is what they believe in — regardless of whether the presidency or Congress is Republican or Democrat. And where businesses that want simply to be left alone should hire free-market men and women who understand that low taxes, limited government and an end to runaway labor union and trial lawyer abuses are good for America and good for their employees, customers and stockholders.

Hire for principle and sound policy, not access.

Grover Norquist is president of Americans for Tax Reform and founder of the K Street Project.

Amid Scandals, GOP Keeps Lobbyist Machine Humming (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2006

A snapshot of ethics on Capitol Hill this year is not a pretty picture. Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader known for hardball tactics and coziness with lobbyists, was indicted and resigned. His pal, superlobbyist Jack Abramoff, is set to report to prison Oct. 2. Ex-representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., is already there.

Numerous laws, meanwhile, have been larded with tax breaks and money earmarked for special interests, thanks in part to a burgeoning lobbying community that views Washington less as a seat of government than as a potential profit center.

With all this, one might think that a sense of shame would prompt Congress to clean up the stench, particularly with the elections a mere eight weeks away. Think again. Virtually nothing has changed.

Nowhere is this clearer than in an organization called the K Street Project. Named for the road that is home to many of Washington's biggest lobbying firms, it is dedicated to the proposition that lobbyists — at least those who represent business interests — can be brought into the Republican coalition to keep the party in the majority.

Despite all that has transpired, the K Street Project lumbers on, keeping tabs on who is hired by major lobbying firms and trade associations. The process enables a broader GOP effort to badger those firms into hiring Republicans, and the firms to go to Capitol Hill to ask for favors in return. On Tuesday, the home page of the Project's website reported in bold red letters that Pulte Homes' new lobbyist has contributed to the Bush/Cheney '04 campaign, Sen. George Allen, R-Va., and the Republican National Committee.

The K Street Project, founded by anti-tax activist Grover Norquist, is more a symbol than a cause of what's amiss in Washington. But it serves as clear illustration of how badly broken Congress is, how little desire there is to fix it, and how far the GOP has strayed from the principles of limited government and unfettered free enterprise. It forces Republicans to abandon core principles by picking winners and losers among industries, based on how willing they are to play along. Results include:

•Micromanaging business. Several recent laws have rewarded some industries and punished others. The most notorious, a 2004 tax bill, granted lavish tax breaks to Oldsmobile dealers and multinational drug companies, among other businesses, while ignoring the film industry, which had dared to hire a Democrat as its top lobbyist.

•Profligate spending. Federal spending, as a percentage of the economy, has risen faster in the past five years than at any time since the New Deal. Among the reasons are lavish giveaways to powerful lobbies, such as energy and drugs, and billions "earmarked" to clients of well-connected lobbyists.

Many Republicans argue the group does nothing that Democrats didn't do when they controlled Congress, and certainly the Democrats' behavior was tawdry for its time. But the philosophy behind the K Street Project takes this behavior to an extreme. It says a lobbyist's political ideology and donations are more important than his or her ability to marshal facts on behalf of the client.

That kind of thinking explains why Washington is such a mess these days — and why visitors might not want to bring a camera.

The Mess In Montgomery (WP)

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

UNTOLD NUMBERS of people were turned away from polling places yesterday in Montgomery County. The official responsible for their disenfranchisement called it "a clerical error." We call it gross incompetence that strikes at the very heart of our government. More than apologies are in order.

Election officials in Maryland's largest and richest jurisdiction, one that prides itself on a reputation for good service, forgot to deliver the computer cards that operate the voting machines. Confusion reigned. Some people were told they couldn't vote and should come back later. Others were given paper provisional ballots, but many precincts ran out of the forms. Communication was abysmal. Many voters who could not make a return trip were frustrated -- as were candidates who feared that the debacle could well make the difference in a close race. With important local, state and federal offices at stake, some were questioning the legitimacy of the election even before the polls closed.

The county Board of Elections has one essential job -- to ensure fair elections -- and yesterday that job wasn't done. The system needs to be held to account. Board President Nancy H. Dacek has promised an investigation, but her standing has been so damaged that she must consider whether her continuance in office serves the public good. Election Director Margaret Jurgensen is paid $113,033 a year to run day-to-day operations; part of that must be telling the public exactly who and what went wrong and what the consequences and remedies are.

It's important to keep politics out of this, and to that end, we were sorry to see Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- who controls the majority of appointments on local election boards and who, in fact, appointed Ms. Dacek -- try to lay blame for what was clearly a local mistake with the state elections administrator, with whom he is feuding. Equally absurd is the Democratic claim that the governor is at fault because he opposed early voting that would have brought the problem to the surface sooner.

DOJ_NMG_0062291

Voters, Democratic and Republican, want one thing -- for their votes to count. The officials charged with that should take a hard look at yesterday's voting in Montgomery, as well as in Baltimore, which also experienced problems, and make sure there is not a repeat on Nov. 7.

Eliminating Early Admissions (NYT)

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Harvard did the right thing by abandoning its early admissions program, the first elite college to do so. We hope other institutions follow its lead and eliminate a process that is inevitably unfair and simply increases the frenzy of a college application process that is unnecessarily pressurized.

Early admissions programs allow students to apply early, typically in November, and get a prompt answer, usually in mid-December, before the regular application season begins in January. The most draconian of these programs require students to agree in advance that they will accept admission if it is offered. Those rejected have a couple of frantic weeks to apply elsewhere.

Colleges love these programs because they can lock in students who really want to enroll, gain an early sense of how admissions are going, and spread out the workload of evaluating applicants. For high-achieving students, it means knowing early whether they will get into their dream college. There is some evidence that applying early increases the chance of admission.

But educators have come to realize that the binding programs have two pernicious effects. They discriminate against students who need financial aid and thus can't commit themselves to one university before they have a chance to compare the aid packages offered by other schools. And they force students to pick a college in the fall, rather than make a more considered choice in the spring.

Harvard has long had a relatively relaxed policy that mitigates some of these problems. Students who apply by Nov. 1 are notified by Dec. 15 as to whether they are admitted, rejected or deferred to the regular pool for further consideration. They don't have to answer Harvard's offer of admission until May 1 and can shop around for better offers. Several other schools, including Yale and Stanford, have adopted similar policies.

Now Harvard has decided to go cold turkey and eliminate its early admissions program beginning with the freshman class entering in September 2008. This is a big step given that 38 percent of the students admitted last year were granted early admission. There will be a two- to three-year trial period to make sure the change does not adversely affect student quality.

Harvard cited several good reasons for the change. It will make the system fairer because students from sophisticated backgrounds and affluent high schools are far more likely to apply for an early admission than minority students or those from high schools with few counselors. It will help reduce the frenzy that has high school students worrying about college choices in their junior years. It will give admissions officers another semester of performance to consider instead of basing early admission on the junior-year record. And there will be the collateral benefit of encouraging high school seniors to keep studying well into the spring instead of goofing off the minute they receive early admission.

By delaying its shift until next fall, Harvard hopes that other institutions will join it. The University of Delaware has already announced a similar move. Harried students and parents should welcome these steps toward a more sensible process.

Syrians Fight Off Attack On U.S. Embassy (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

AP, September 12, 2006

Syrian guards foiled an attempt by suspected al-Qaida-linked militants to blow up the U.S. Embassy on Tuesday, exchanging fire outside the compound's walls with gunmen who shouted "God is great" and tried to storm in with automatic weapons and hand grenades.

The brazen, midmorning assault in a heavily guarded neighborhood of the capital could highlight the Syrian regime's weakening grip on militants, who have battled Syrian security forces repeatedly in recent years.

The attack, which left at least 10 civilians and a Chinese diplomat wounded, came amid high tension between Washington and Damascus.

DOJ_NMG_0062292

The rapid response by Syrian guards won rare praise from the United States, which accuses President Bashar Assad's government of supporting terrorism in its backing of Hezbollah guerrillas and Palestinian militants.

"I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said. No Americans were hurt, and the embassy was not damaged.

White House spokesman Tony Snow also thanked Syrian officials and called for Damascus to "become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists."

But Syria responded with a sharp criticism of the United States, blaming its policies in Lebanon, Iraq and the Palestinian territories for increasing Islamic militancy.

"It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," the Syrian Embassy in Washington said in a statement. "The U.S. should ... start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace in the Middle East."

It curtly said that Syria "performed its duties" under the Geneva Conventions to protect the embassy.

Anti-American sentiment has been rising across the Middle East since Israel's 34-day blitz of Hezbollah in Lebanon that ended nearly a month ago, on top of turmoil in Iraq that many here blame on the United States.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for Tuesday's attack, but suspicion immediately fell on a little-known al-Qaida offshoot called Jund al-Sham, Arabic for Soldiers of Syria.

Syria's ambassador to the U.S., Imad Moustapha, told The Associated Press it was too early to say but "it's logically possible" Jund al-Sham was responsible.

If confirmed, it would be the boldest and most sophisticated attack yet by Jund al-Sham.

At the State Department, deputy spokesman Tom Casey said: "Clearly, it was an organized terrorist attack on our embassy. But exactly who was responsible for it and who they might be affiliated with and what their motives are, are things that we'll just have to look at as the days go on."

Three attackers and a Syrian guard were killed in the attempted bombing of the embassy, located in the same neighborhood as Assad's office and residence. A fourth attacker was wounded and arrested.

The attackers came in two cars, one of them an explosives-laden pickup truck. The first car pulled up in front of the embassy's entrance and three gunmen burst out. Shouting "Allahu akbar" — "God is great" — they threw hand grenades and fired automatic weapons toward the gate and a Syrian guard post, sparking a 15-minute gunbattle.

At the same time, the truck — filled with pipe bombs rigged to gas canisters — pulled up to another gate on the other side of the triangle-shaped compound. But when the shooting erupted, the driver ran away without detonating it. The driver was shot and arrested, and the truck did not explode.

The three attackers tried to throw their grenades over the embassy's white 15-foot-high walls, but none made it over. One blast peppered the wall with pockmarks.

Three Syrian security agents were wounded as well as the 10 civilians and the Chinese diplomat who was watching the gunbattle from the rooftop of the Chinese Embassy across the street.

After the attack, blood was splattered on the sidewalk outside the embassy, along with the burned-out car used by the gunmen.

The U.S. Embassy has about 40 staffers, but no ambassador. The United States withdrew its ambassador several days after the Feb. 14, 2005, assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in a Beirut car bomb — an attack his supporters blamed on Syria. Damascus has denied any role, but the Hariri's killing further soured U.S.-Syrian ties.

Tuesday's attack raised the question of how strong militant groups have grown in Syria — where the highly closed government rarely releases information on security issues, making assessing the terror threat difficult.

Sunni Muslim extremists such as al-Qaida fiercely despise Assad's regime because of its secular ideology and because his father, the late President Hafez Assad, led a crackdown on Muslim fundamentalists that killed thousands in the city of Hama in 1982. They also reject Assad's rule because he belongs to the Shiite Alawite sect of Islam.

Assad has warned of an increasing Islamic threat against his country, saying al-Qaida militants are taking refuge in neighboring Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0062293

But some opponents of his regime have claimed he is hyping the threat to score support with the United States, defuse international pressure and provide a pretext for Syrian meddling in Lebanon.

Syrian security forces have battled several times in the past two years with gunmen believed to belong to Jund al-Sham.

In June, anti-terrorism police fought militants near the Defense Ministry in central Damascus in a clash that killed five people and wounded four. In 2004, four people were killed in a gunfight between police and a team of militants believed to plotting to bomb the Canadian Embassy.

Jund al-Sham was established in Afghanistan by Syrians, Palestinians and Jordanians with links to slain al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Syria is a major crossing point for militants from around the Arab world — including Syria and Lebanon — to slip into Iraq to fight in the insurgency. In the face of U.S. pressure, Damascus has insisted it is doing all it can to stop the infiltrations but that the long desert border is too difficult to seal.

Suspected Islamic Militants Attack The U.S. Embassy In Syria (MCT)

By Rhonda Roumani And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, September 13, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria - Armed gunmen believed to be Islamic militants attacked the U.S. Embassy in Syria's capital Tuesday with gunfire and two explosives-packed cars in a rare instance of extremist violence in this authoritarian and largely secular Arab country.

Syrian security personnel killed three of the attackers, and the assault failed to breach the embassy's security perimeter. One Syrian security guard was killed and more than a dozen people were injured, Syrian officials said. No Americans were hurt.

Witnesses said four assailants shouting "Allahu Akbar" ("God is Great") assaulted the embassy at about 10 a.m. local time, exchanging heavy gunfire with Syrian guards.

Syria's interior minister, Gen. Bassam Abdul Majid, told state-run television that the assailants tried to detonate two cars full of explosives next to the embassy. One car exploded, but another one failed to detonate, he said.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but Syrian officials implied that the attack was the work of a militant group known as Jund al Sham, Arabic for "Soldiers of Syria." Little is known about the group, which is thought to have links to the Iraqi branch of the al-Qaida terrorist network.

The attack underscored the complexities of a region that the Bush administration has sought to divide into supporters and enemies of terrorism. Syria has long supported Hezbollah, Hamas and several Palestinian terrorist groups, but one of al-Qaida's aims is ousting secular regimes such as Syria's and replacing them with Islamic rule.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised Syrian security forces for helping thwart the attack.

"I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that," said Rice, who was visiting Canada.

Syria, run by a secular Baathist Party similar to Saddam Hussein's, fought a virtual civil war with the Islamist Muslim Brotherhood in the early 1980s, and thousands died when government forces leveled the city of Hama, a militant stronghold, in 1982.

In recent years, there have been signs of a reborn radical Islamic movement in Syria, and some Syrians have crossed the border with Iraq to join attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces there.

Still, it remained unclear how a plot could be hatched and carried out in daylight in downtown Damascus, given Syria's pervasive security services.

Syria's embassy in Washington issued a statement condemning the attack, but blamed such incidents on U.S. policy. "It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," the statement said.

U.S.-Syrian relations have been tense since the February 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, which prompted Washington to recall the U.S. ambassador to Syria, Margaret Scobey.

DOJ_NMG_0062294

The wounded included a Syrian embassy guard, a policeman and a security employee of the embassy, seven workers from the Syrian Telecommunications Establishment who were in the area conducting repairs, two Iraqis and a Chinese citizen, Syria's news agency reported.

A State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the attack was bungled and didn't bear the hallmarks of al-Qaida's careful planning.

The embassy in Damascus doesn't meet the State Department's highest security standards, which were imposed after attacks on the U.S. embassies in Beirut in the 1980s and East Africa in 1998. Nevertheless, the Department issued a statement on Tuesday calling the embassy "one of our most heavily defended facilities with multiple physical and technical upgrades".

The low building, surrounded by a whitewashed wall and an 8-foot-high fence and guarded by U.S. Marines, sits on a residential thoroughfare.

The embassy, in a message to U.S. citizens in Syria, said it would be closed on Wednesday. "At present, Americans should maintain a very low profile," it said.

Shortly after the attack, a large plume of smoke could be seen coming from the area surrounding the embassy compound. The charred remains of a car could be seen parked outside of the embassy, along with a trail of blood on a street near the embassy compound.

Syrian security promptly cordoned off the street, forbidding journalists from entering. The area is home to other missions, including the Chinese, Italian and Iraqi embassies, and a school. Mothers were briefly allowed to pass the barricade in order to pick up their children.

In Washington, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said the attackers used improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, packed into the two vehicles. In addition, small IEDs were found in the vicinity of the embassy outside the second, unexploded car, he said.

Casey said he had no information on who was responsible or their motives.

As in Egypt, Jordan and other Arab nations, the Muslim Brotherhood poses the biggest challenge to the Assad regime in Syria. But the Brotherhood, the largest and most respected Islamist movement in the Middle East, in recent years has focused on building its power by participating in elections, prompting complaints from radicals that it's grown too moderate.

Syria Thwarts Attack On U.S. Embassy (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

Syrian authorities thwarted a terrorist attack on the U.S. Embassy in Damascus yesterday, winning Washington's praise, but the two governments blamed each other's policies for the incident and ruled out improving their relations.

Three of the four attackers were killed in a shootout with Syrian police and one was arrested, U.S. and Syrian officials said. There were no American casualties, though one Syrian guard working for the embassy suffered a gunshot wound and another one sustained a minor injury, the State Department said.

"The Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

The Syrian Embassy in Washington was quick to blame U.S. actions for yesterday's attack.

"It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," it said. "What has happened recently in Lebanon, the Palestinian territories and Iraq is exacerbating the fight against global terrorism."

But Mr. Casey said it is Damascus that needs to "evaluate its policies and determine whether its continued support for terrorism is, in fact, an appropriate way to proceed."

U.S. officials said it was Syria's duty to protect any diplomatic mission on its territory and that it would take much more than yesterday's action for Damascus to have a better relationship with Washington.

The attackers "were driving in two vehicles with explosives -- one at the front entrance of the embassy and one toward the rear" of the compound, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

DOJ_NMG_0062295

"The vehicle near the front of the compound did in fact explode. The other wasn't detonated," he said. "The explosive materials in it were defused by Syrian authorities."

The official Syrian news agency, SANA, said 11 bystanders were wounded, including an Iraqi couple and a senior Chinese diplomat. China's Xinhua news agency said the diplomat was slightly wounded by shrapnel while standing on a garage in the Chinese Embassy compound, near the U.S. Embassy.

Television footage showed a van packed with gas canisters with detonators taped to them, as well as bloodstains on the pavement and several damaged vehicles, including a bullet-riddled white car.

U.S. officials said the Syrian military and the Interior Ministry sent forces to the scene of the attack, which began at 10:10 a.m. The officials attributed the quick response to increased security in the Rawda district, where the embassy is located and where many government officials live.

No one claimed responsibility for the attack, but SANA named "the terrorist group Takfiri," which belongs to an Islamic movement that advocates killing Muslims who do not adhere to strict tenets.

Syrian officials were quoted implicating a smaller group within Takfiri, Jund al-Sham, or Soldiers of Syria. It has been blamed for several attacks on civilian installations, including an attempt to occupy buildings near the government television station in June. Police killed four members of the group on that occasion, SANA said.

A State Department official said the attacker arrested yesterday was "providing information," but it was not clear whether U.S. officials would be permitted to question him.

The Syrian government, which the Bush administration accuses of supporting terrorism, exercises tight control within its own borders and deals firmly with violent dissent, even if it is directed against a country it considers hostile.

The United States has listed Syria as a state sponsor of terrorism because of its backing of groups like Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Washington recalled its ambassador from Damascus in February 2005, following the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, in which the U.S. suspects Syrian involvement.

Embassy Attack Puts Syria On Alert (CSM)

By Dan Murphy And Rhonda Roumani

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2006

CAIRO AND DAMASCUS, SYRIA

An attack in Damascus on Tuesday morning that is being described by Syrian officials as an attempt to take over the US Embassy by "Islamist terrorists" helps to emphasize that while there is confrontation between US and Syria both countries are targets of Islamist militants.

Witnesses described a coordinated attack by a group of militants that involved gunfire, car bombs, and grenades and said some of the attackers shouted "God is great" as they engaged Syrian guards outside the compound a little after 10 a.m. local time.

"The US government is grateful for the assistance the Syrians provided," White House press secretary Tony Snow said.

Three militants and one Syrian guard were killed in the attack, with a fourth wounded militant taken into custody. No American citizens were hurt in the assault, though a Syrian guard employed by the embassy was wounded but in stable condition, according to a brief statement by the embassy. A Syrian government guard was in serious condition, according to the official SANA news agency. Attack embarrasses Syrian regime

While this was first and foremost an attack on the US, it is also a major embarrassment for the government in Damascus, a secular authoritarian regime that is viewed by Al Qaeda and its allies as run by apostates.

Local television showed footage of a van that appeared to be loaded with homemade bombs and propane canisters at the scene. The Associated Press quoted witnesses as saying a smaller car bomb did explode.

The US State Department considers Syria to be a supporter of terrorism, largely because of its ties to Hizbullah, the militant Shiite group in Lebanon, and the US government has worked to isolate Syria in recent years. The US ambassador to Syria,

DOJ_NMG_0062296

Margaret Scobey, was recalled in February 2005 after the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, an attack later blamed on Syria by a United Nations investigation.

But the country has also been fighting its own war on terrorism.

The Syrian ambassador to the US, Imad Mustafa, alleged on CNN that the attackers were from Tanzim Jund al-Sham, a militant group that shares much of Al Qaeda's ideology.

In recent months, a number of former US officials have been quietly urging that the US reach out to the Damascus regime, saying it might be possible to drive a wedge between the secular Bashar al-Assad, a member of the country's minority Alawite sect, and his theocratic allies Iran and Hizbullah.

However, the Bush administration has continued to insist that the Assad regime will have to abandon support for Hizbullah before it's viewed as a possible partner for peace.

Mr. Snow said US gratitude "does not mean they are an ally. We are hoping they will become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists." Syria's own war on Islamist militants

Damascus has fought Islamist militants off and on for decades, and famously in a crackdown following an assassination attempt against former President Hafiz al-Assad in 1982, that killed approximately 10,000 residents of the town of Hama, then, as now, a bastion for Sunni Islamist thought.

Islamist militancy has been on the rise inside Syria in the past few years, in part fueled by the flow of jihadis back and forth across its border with Iraq. Last June, four gunmen and a Syrian security agent were killed after an attack outside of Syria's state-run television station.

June 9, Syrian forces engaged in a three-hour firefight in southern Damascus at the house of a shopkeeper they alleged was a Tanzim Jund al-Sham cell leader and said they found a cache of weapons and jihadi propaganda there.

April 27, 2004, Syrian forces foiled what they said was an Islamist car-bomb attack in the same diplomatic quarter of Damascus.

The former United Nations' mission in the area was set on fire by rocket-propelled grenades in that assault. Syrian officials later said the ultimate target of the attack was the Canadian Embassy, which was to have been hit by a car bomb that failed to detonate.

Ayman Abdul Nour, who runs All4Syria, an online news service, says many Syrians are worried about what they see as the spread of Salafi ideology - an intolerant brand of Sunni Islam - inside the country.

"We start asking questions about these fanatic Muslim groups moving freely around the country and the region," he says. It raises "a lot of question about how we can secure our country and about how we can secure our future."

Syria Foils US Embassy Car Bombing (FT)

By Heba Saleh

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Syria on Tuesday foiled a car bomb attack against the US embassy in Damascus, killing three of the four attackers who tried to storm the building in a van loaded with explosives.

No Americans were hurt but a member of the Syrian anti-terrorism forces guarding the embassy was killed, and 11 people injured.

The US, long at odds with Syria, voiced gratitude to Damascus for its swift response.

“Syrian officials came to the aid of the Americans,” White House spokesman Tony Snow said. “The US government is grateful for the assistance the Syrians provided in going after the attackers. We are hoping they will become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists.”

The US withdrew its ambassador last year after Damascus was linked to the assassination of Rafiq Hariri, former Lebanese prime minister. Syria’s support for the Lebanese Shia group Hizbollah and the Palestinian Islamist movement Hamas have also put it at odds with Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0062297

Syrian state television said the attackers – believed to be Islamist militants because of the slogans witnesses reported hearing – were armed with automatic rifles and grenades. Television pictures showed a white van rigged with explosives, including pipe bombs, and the charred remains of another vehicle.

The US has criticised Syria for not doing enough to stop the flow of Islamic militants across its borders into Iraq.

Walid Moallem, Syria's foreign minister, said in a recent interview with the Financial Times that "extremists" had been arrested crossing the Syrian border from Lebanon.

Responding to charges that supplies of arms were still crossing from Syria into Lebanon to rearm the Hizbollah militia, Mr Moallem said the border had been breached by "smugglers" in both directions. He said those arrested were "mainly Arab nationalists".

"We consider these people terrorists because they are aiming to kill and bomb civilian targets," he said.

Syria has indicated repeatedly that it would like to engage in a dialogue with Washington and that it wanted American help in reviving peace talks with Israel. Its success in thwarting the embassy attack is now likely to revive calls from some in Washington who believe in the need to reach out to Damascus. But David Schenker of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy said it was unlikely there would be a shift in American policy. "We're always going to have some problems with this regime," he said. "We have got our priorities. If they were to tone down what they were doing with Hizbollah or stop contributing to the instability then that would be seen in the US as some kind of signal."

Attack On U.S. Embassy Fails In Syria (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria — Attackers tried to blow up the U.S. Embassy in Damascus on Tuesday but were thwarted by Syrian guards in a fierce gunbattle.

Three of the four attackers and a Syrian guard were killed. No Americans were hurt. There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but Imad Moustapha, Syria's ambassador to the United States, said it was "logically possible" that an offshoot of al-Qaeda called Jund al-Sham was responsible.

The group's name in Arabic means Soldiers of Syria. Jund al-Sham was established in Afghanistan in the late 1990s by Syrians, Palestinians and Jordanians. It has carried out several attacks inside Syria in recent years, Moustapha said.

The attackers came in two vehicles: a car followed by a pickup packed with explosives. The three gunmen in the car threw hand grenades and fired automatic weapons toward the embassy gate, prompting an intense, 30-minute gunbattle.

When the firefight erupted, the driver of the bomb-laden truck fled but was shot and arrested by Syrian forces. The truck did not explode.

Afterward, U.S. officials had rare words of praise for the government of Syrian President Bashar Assad. "The Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

The State Department lists Syria as a supporter of terrorists, specifically Hezbollah in Lebanon. The United States withdrew its ambassador to Syria several days after former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri was assassinated in Beirut in February 2005. The United Nations has linked the attack on Hariri to Lebanese plotters with ties to Syria.

White House spokesman Tony Snow also thanked Syria and said it should "become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists."

Syria responded with a stinging statement from its embassy in Washington that blamed U.S. policies in Lebanon, Iraq and the Palestinian territories for increasing Islamic militancy.

"It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," it said. "The U.S. should … start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace in the Middle East."

The attack raised questions about the strength of Islamic militant groups in Syria. Though the United States accuses Syria of supporting terrorism, Assad's secular regime has long been in conflict with such groups. Assad's father and predecessor as president, Hafez Assad, killed thousands in the city of Hama in 1982 during a crackdown on Islamic militants.

DOJ_NMG_0062298

Islamic militancy has been increasing inside Syria in the past few years. Syria is a major crossing point for militants from around the Arab world heading into Iraq to fight in the insurgency there.

Pressured by the United States to seal its border with Iraq, Syria has said that it is doing all it can to stop the infiltrations but that the long desert border is too difficult to close completely.

In June, anti-terrorism police fought militants near the Syrian Defense Ministry in Damascus in a battle that killed five and wounded four.

Ayman Abdul Nour, who runs All4Syria, an online news service, says many Syrians are worried about what they see as the spread of an intolerant strain of Sunni Islam in the country.

U.S. Praises Syria Actions After Embassy Attack (WSJ)

By Mariam Fam And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

The U.S. offered rare praise for the Syrian regime after its security forces killed three men who attacked the U.S. Embassy in Damascus, though Syria responded coolly to Washington's remarks.

The exchange between the countries came after four Islamic militants in two vehicles rigged with explosives tried to storm the U.S. embassy compound with automatic rifles and homemade explosives, according to a State Department account. Syrian security guards waged a fierce defense of the building, killing three of the assailants and wounding the fourth. Syrian news outlets said one Syrian guard was killed and three others wounded, along with 11 bystanders who were wounded. No Americans were hurt.

Senior Bush administration officials immediately applauded the Syrian help and suggested a possible rapprochement with Damascus, which the U.S. has long criticized as a sponsor of terrorism and instability in the region. "We are hoping they will become an ally and make the choice of fighting against terrorists," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice offered condolences for security personnel killed in the attack and thanked Damascus for its help in defending the American embassy.

In a statement, the Syrian Embassy in Washington called the assault "a heinous terrorist attack by an extremist group." But it also lay the underlying blame on U.S. policies in the Middle East, which the embassy said "have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment." The statement urged Washington to "take this opportunity to review its policies in the Middle East and start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace" for the region.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack.

The incident comes at a time of high anti-U.S. sentiment in the region as well as increased turbulence for Syria and its relations with the West. The U.S. was criticized by many for not reaching out to Damascus this summer during the fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite Muslim group. Many Arab states have hoped to enlist U.S. help in weaning Syria away from its growing ties to Iran, which also supports Hezbollah.

Syrian political analyst and writer Faiz Sara said the attack could either boost or further undermine Syrian-U.S. relations, partly depending on how the Syrians handle the investigation.

"If the Syrian government conducted a transparent and objective investigation and publicized the political side of the attack, this might bolster its position as someone fighting terrorism," he said. On the other hand, if the U.S. administration wants to increase its pressure on Syria, it can argue "that the regime orchestrated this operation and ... in that case the gap [between the two countries] will increase."

Some experts said the attack may illustrate the increasing spread of small clusters of militant groups with a shared ideology but limited -- if any -- connection to al Qaeda. "Al Qaeda has been transformed from a military organization with a particular base to an ideology that is being exported to local groups through the Internet and satellite channels," said Mohammed Salah, Cairo bureau chief of the pan-Arab al-Hayat newspaper, who closely monitors Islamic groups.

The Israel-Hezbollah war has put Syria at odds with the West and even with some Sunni Muslim Arab regimes. Already accused of not doing enough to stop the flow of foreign fighters from its territory into Iraq, Syria drew renewed scrutiny recently with Israeli officials complaining that Hezbollah receives arms via land convoys that enter Lebanon from Syria.

Some analysts said yesterday's attack offered Syria an unusual opportunity to boost its stature. "They will say that they too are victims of terrorism and that they want to fight terrorism as much as anyone else, and use this as a chance to show how they're ... doing their job as a government protecting Western interests," said Rami Khouri, a commentator and editor-at-large at the Lebanese Daily Star newspaper.

Gunmen In Syria Hit U.S. Embassy (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria, Wednesday, Sept. 13 — Four gunmen attacked the American Embassy here early Tuesday, storming the compound with grenades and automatic weapons before being repelled by Syrian security forces. Three of the gunmen were killed and a fourth was wounded, Syrian and American officials said.

One Syrian security official was killed and about a dozen people were wounded, including three Syrian security officials and a Syrian guard employed by the embassy. No American personnel were injured and the attackers failed to detonate a vehicle packed with explosives.

The wounded attacker was being questioned by Syrian authorities. The identities of the attackers were not disclosed.

The attack, a rare instance of terrorist violence in the tightly controlled Syrian capital, marked the first time the American Embassy had been a target.

Coming a day after the anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in the United States and after recent threats by Al Qaeda, the attack sent shudders through a region already reeling from a season of violence. Anger toward the United States has surged in recent weeks over its support for Israel during the war in Lebanon this summer.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said it was too early to say who might have been behind the attack. But she praised Syria for responding quickly. “The Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that,” Ms. Rice said Tuesday during a visit to Canada.

Syria, however, was quick to blame the United States. “It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment,” said a statement on Tuesday from the Syrian Embassy in Washington. “What has happened recently in Lebanon, the Palestinian territories and Iraq is exacerbating the fight against global terrorism.”

Relations between Syria and the United States are strained. The United States recalled its ambassador after the assassination of Prime Minister Rafik Hariri of Lebanon in February 2005, because Washington believes Damascus played a role. United States diplomatic representation has since been downgraded to the level of chargé d’affaires.

More recently, the United States has blamed Syria for helping to arm Hezbollah, whose attack on Israeli soldiers along the Lebanese border set off the war in July.

“I think you have to take a look at who is really responsible for the violence in the region,” said Tom Casey, the State Department’s acting spokesman, responding Tuesday to Syria’s statement. “The violence is the responsibility of those who do believe that the only response to any questions or concerns is to throw bombs, is to shoot bullets, is to assassinate people.”

He said Washington continued to consider Syria a sponsor of terrorism, alluding to its support for Hezbollah and the Palestinian group Hamas, both of which are considered terrorist organizations by the United States and many allies.

The attack on the embassy began at 10:10 a.m., when two vehicles approached, one drawing up in front of the compound, the other to an employees’ entrance in the rear.

The minister of information, Mohsen Bilal, said in a telephone interview that one man approached embassy guards with a bouquet. The man said “he would like to hand these flowers over to someone from the embassy, to show his solidarity with them and the victims of 9/11,” Mr. Bilal said.

He said that when the guards refused him entry, the attack began.

Ayman Abdel Nour, a Syrian political analyst, said he was about 25 yards away when he saw two men running away from the embassy, and heard gunfire and men shouting, “God is great!” He took refuge in another embassy nearby.

The sound of gunfire and explosions continued for about 15 minutes, he said. There was a second exchange of automatic-weapons fire and single gunshots after a few minutes of calm, he said, but it ended quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0062300

When he emerged, the attackers' car at the rear of the embassy had been gutted by fire, apparently after having been hit in the gun battle.

Mr. Abdel Nour said friends at the Italian Embassy nearby had seen the attackers lobbing grenades over the high wall surrounding the American Embassy and had seen smoke coming from inside the compound.

Television images from the scene showed pools of blood on the pavement and the remains of the burned-out car. A vehicle with explosives at the front of the embassy was apparently abandoned when one attacker ran to the back to aid other gunmen.

The television also showed Syrian security officials inspecting what appeared to be large propane gas canisters with pipes taped to them.

Mr. Casey, the State Department spokesman, said after the attack "some small unexploded improvised explosive devices" were found, in addition to those in the second vehicle.

"This is a flourishing business today," Mr. Abdel Nour said of the attack. "If you want to open a terrorist cell here, it's an easy business. You'll find a lot of money because of the frustration in the region."

Syria's interior minister, Bassam Abdel Majeed, visited the embassy after the attack and met Tuesday with the new chargé d'affaires, Michael H. Corbin.

By nightfall, residents could see the rear wall scarred by bullets and the roadside blackened by the car fire. Syrian sentry boxes were riddled with shots, as was a window near the employee's entrance.

The Rawda district, where the attack occurred, is one of the most heavily guarded parts of the capital. It houses security installations and the homes of many government officials. A number of foreign embassies are near the American compound, including the Chinese, Italian and the Iraqi missions, while the presidential palace is only about 150 yards away from the Americans.

At least 11 people were wounded in the attack. The local embassy employee wounded was hit by gunfire while checking the attackers' cars when the assault began. The State Department said another embassy guard was slightly injured.

Seven Syrian telephone company employees working in the area were also wounded, as well as an Iraqi man and woman. A senior Chinese diplomat was hit by shrapnel while standing on top of a garage within the Chinese Embassy compound, the New China News Agency reported.

Syria, a strictly secular state, has had trouble with Islamic extremists. In April 2004, four people were killed in a clash between police officers and suspected bombers in the diplomatic quarter of Damascus. Authorities accused Islamic militants of trying to blow up an explosives-laden car near the Canadian Embassy.

The Syrian ambassador to the United States, Imad Moustapha, said Tuesday on CNN that the attackers might have links to a group known as Jund al-Sham, which means Soldiers of the Levant. Last year five of the group's militants were killed in Hama when security agents raided their hideout, uncovering a stash of weapons and explosives.

American intelligence officials in Washington said it was too early to know with confidence who was responsible for the embassy attack, and said there was little evidence yet to support the claim of the Syrian government that Jund al-Sham might have carried it out.

Officials said there was also no evidence linking the attack to the recent message from Al Qaeda's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, who said in a speech broadcast Monday that Al Qaeda would be carrying out attacks in the Middle East.

"This attack would be small beer by Al Qaeda standards," said one intelligence official.

The United States Embassy was closed after the attack and said it would operate with a reduced staff on Wednesday. It issued a statement advising Americans in Syria to keep a low profile and it dismissed students at the Damascus Community School, which is affiliated with the embassy.

Four Armed Men Attack U.S. Embassy In Damascus (WP)

By Rhonda Roumani

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062301

DAMASCUS, Syria, Sept. 12 -- Four armed men attacked the U.S. Embassy on Tuesday, killing one Syrian security guard and wounding several people in what authorities said was an attempt by Islamic guerrillas to storm the diplomatic compound.

Just after 10 a.m., gunmen yelling " Allahu akbar " -- "God is great" -- opened fire on the Syrian security officers who guard the outside of the embassy in Damascus's Rawda district, witnesses said. The attackers threw grenades at the compound, according to witnesses, and shot at the guards with assault rifles during the 15- to 20-minute clash, which left three of the gunmen dead and the fourth reportedly wounded.

In addition to the slain security officer, another guard was wounded, along with a Chinese diplomat and several civilians, including seven Syrian workers and two Iraqis. No Americans were wounded, the embassy said in a statement.

Syria's interior minister, Gen. Bassam Abdel Maguid, said on state television that the attack was a "terrorist operation" carried out by Islamic militants who tried to detonate two cars filled with explosives in front of the embassy.

Syrian authorities said they disarmed a small truck that had been rigged with gas canisters and pipe bombs but had failed to detonate. The charred remains of a car could also be seen in front of the embassy, but witnesses said the relatively small explosion that destroyed it appeared to have been caused by grenades rather than a car bomb.

There were no immediate assertions of responsibility for the attack, and Syrian officials did not blame a specific group, though in the past they have attributed similar strikes to a little-known group called Jund al-Sham, or the Soldiers of the Levant. Reports about the group on Syrian television have shown images of seized weapons, but no information on its goals, makeup, whereabouts or popularity has ever been made available by the government.

U.S. officials praised the Syrian guards who battled the assailants. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking in Stellarton, Nova Scotia, after talks with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, said that "the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said: "We're appreciative of their professional response in this effort."

The Syrian Embassy in Washington issued a statement saying: "In accordance with the Geneva Convention, Syria performed its duties in the best possible manner to protect the U.S. Embassy. . . . Syrian security forces took the full brunt of the attack."

The statement added: "It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment. . . . The U.S. should take this opportunity to review its policies in the Middle East and start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace in the Middle East."

Relations between the United States and Syria have been tense for years, with the Bush administration denouncing the government of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad for its support of Lebanon's Hezbollah militia and for harboring leaders of Palestinian factions that the United States has designated as terrorist groups.

In the months following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Syria shared information related to terrorism with the United States, but after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, President Bush blamed Syria for failing to close its border with Iraq to insurgents. Bush recalled U.S. Ambassador Margaret Scobey from Damascus after the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in February 2005. Many accuse Syria of orchestrating the attack.

The U.S. Embassy compound here is in the capital's diplomatic neighborhood, close to the Iraqi, Italian and Chinese embassies. It is surrounded by white walls described variously as eight to 15 feet high, with U.S. Marines providing security inside the compound and Syrian security forces outside.

Shortly after the attack Tuesday morning, a large plume of smoke rose over the compound, and a trail of blood ran down a nearby street where the gunmen were shot as they tried to escape, witnesses said.

Although the street of the embassy was closed, police allowed parents of students at a nearby school to slip past the barricade to pick up their children, many of whom were in tears. The embassy's American flag, which had been lowered to half-staff the day before in commemoration of the Sept. 11 attacks, was raised to its full height a few hours after the fighting.

"We could not believe that it would happen in the middle of the day in the most secure area of Damascus," said Ayman Abdul-Nour, a political analyst who saw the battle unfold. "In front of me, this gentleman from the Syrian intelligence force in civil uniform stumbled to the ground and blood was coming out of him."

DOJ_NMG_0062302

In recent years, several attacks have been carried out against foreign embassies in Damascus.

In February, demonstrators protesting the publication of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad in European newspapers set fire to the Danish Embassy here. In April 2004, four people were killed in a gun battle that took place on a major road that is flanked by a large number of embassies.

And in December 1998, during a U.S. bombing campaign against Iraq, mobs assaulted U.S. and British diplomatic buildings in Damascus, and Syrian guards and U.S. Marines rescued the wife of U.S. Ambassador Ryan Crocker as rioters broke into the couple's residence.

Syrians Foil Strike On U.S. Embassy (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

CAIRO — Four suspected Islamic militants hurled hand grenades and sprayed machine-gun fire in an attempt to storm the American Embassy in Damascus on Tuesday, but were gunned down by Syrian forces.

The brazen morning attack in the Syrian capital seemed to briefly ease tensions between Washington and Damascus, as U.S. officials thanked Syria for defending the embassy. But the attack also raised questions about President Bashar Assad's grip on security, and his regime's relationship with extremist groups.

"We appreciate the response of the Syrian security forces to help secure our territory," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking at an appearance in Stellarton, Canada. "I do think that the Syrians reacted to this attack in a way that helped to secure our people, and we very much appreciate that."

Other Bush administration officials, however, referred to long-standing tensions with Syria, which remains on the State Department's list of state sponsors of terrorism.

"The Syrian police forces did their job, and they were professional about it," said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. "Now, the next step is for Syria to play a constructive role in the war on terror. Stop harboring terrorist groups, stop being an agent in fomenting terror, and work with us to fight against terror, as Libya has done. That's the next step for Syria."

The Syrian government blamed the bungled attack on a little-known hard-line Sunni militant group that calls itself Jund al Sham, or Soldiers of the Levant, allegedly linked to the Al Qaeda terrorist network.

"It's clearly a terrorist operation," said Interior Minister Gen. Bassam Abdel Majeed.

Three of the militants were killed and a fourth was captured in the morning shootout, which also killed a Syrian security officer and wounded 11 bystanders. Timed explosives rigged to a stolen van at the embassy gate failed to go off and were detonated later by Syrian anti-terrorism agents, the interior minister told state television.

Political analyst Ayman Abdel Nour said he had just climbed out of his car to go see about a visa when a car pulled over outside the embassy and four gunmen leapt out. At first, Nour said, he was confused.

"I thought they were filming a scene for something, because it was the middle of the day, in the middle of the most secure area in Damascus," he said. "Then one of them fell down near me and I saw the blood. I realized it was serious, so I ran and hid."

Nour said he took shelter in a neighboring embassy. The shooting lasted for about 15 minutes, slowing gradually to single bursts of fire. The gunmen pitched hand grenades over the embassy walls, cracking two windows, he said.

None of the embassy staff was hurt in the attack. The 11 bystanders wounded included repairmen from the Syrian Telecommunication Establishment, an Iraqi couple and a Chinese diplomat who was standing on a nearby rooftop.

Perched behind high walls on a heavily fortified hillside, the U.S. Embassy has been at the heart of a stony diplomatic relationship in recent years. The American ambassador withdrew from the Damascus embassy after the February 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in Beirut. A United Nations report accused Syrian intelligence of complicity in the assassination, a charge Syria denies.

The United States also has accused Damascus of letting jihadist fighters slip across its borders to fight in Iraq, as well as tampering in Lebanese affairs and propping up anti-Israel fighters in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

In recent weeks, the United States and Israel accused Damascus of funneling weapons to Hezbollah fighters in Lebanon, where battles between Israel and Shiite Muslim militants raged for 34 days in July and August.

DOJ_NMG_0062303

As relations soured between Washington and Damascus in recent years, the anti-American sentiment that has flared in the Middle East since the war in Iraq also took hold in Syria.

But the U.S. is not the sole target of Islamists: The groups have also waged a long-running blood feud with secular Syria.

The government is dominated by members of the Allawite sect, a Shiite offshoot rejected by hard-line Sunnis. In the 1980s, the Muslim Brotherhood's attempts to oppose the regime were crushed bloodily by Assad's father, President Hafez Assad. To this day, membership in the Sunni militant group is punishable by death.

Since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the Syrian government has struggled to maintain the rigorous street control that once made the Assad regime famous. Syrian troops have repeatedly battled with shadowy gunmen. Tuesday's attack was the third to strike the capital in three years; all were easily repelled by security services.

The attacks have raised speculation about whether Bashar Assad is capable of keeping the country calm.

Some analysts have wondered whether some members of the Syrian government might have worked out a detente of sorts with the more serious jihadi forces, such as those operating in Iraq.

Still others have accused the government of colluding in staged attacks in a bid to draw sympathy from the West.

After each attack, Syrian officials have been quick to remind reporters that Damascus, too, is a target for terrorists.

"The Syrian government is a secular one, and the Baath Party itself is secular, so it's considered by Al Qaeda and others as a pro-Western regime," said a Syrian official who spoke by phone on condition of anonymity. "So Syria is attacked by those groups, and meanwhile the USA is accusing Syria of belonging to the same groups. Both sides are greatly mistaken."

Syrian officials also criticized U.S. policy in the region.

"It is regrettable that U.S. policies in the Middle East have fueled extremism, terrorism and anti-U.S. sentiment," the Syrian Embassy in Washington said in a statement. "The U.S. should … start looking at the root causes of terrorism and broker a comprehensive peace in the Middle East."

But questions linger: Why have militants never struck Syria with the force and skill brought to bear against Arab neighbors such as Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia? Is Syria given a pass by armed groups because of Assad's reputation as an anti-American figure?

"The speculation has been that the Assad regime has put people up to this," said Joshua Landis, a Syria expert at the University of Oklahoma who spent last year living in Damascus. "Are they in league? Have they cut a deal?"

One U.S. counter-terrorism official said it was too soon to tell who was responsible for Tuesday's attack, but said he was not surprised that Syria blamed Jund al Sham.

"Other violent incidents have occurred in Syria and the government has pointed to the group, but there is not a lot known about it," said the official, whose agency does not permit him to discuss terrorism matters on the record.

The official and others, however, said it was also possible that the perpetrators might have been local men with political grievances.

U.S. Eyes New Palestinian Gov't Warily (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 12, 2006

The Bush administration expressed worry Tuesday that a Palestinian national unity government now in formation may not be ready to renounce terrorism or accept Israel's right to exist.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey also reiterated that unless those conditions are met, the Bush administration would not resume U.S. aid to the Palestinian government.

The skeptical comments came a day after the Hamas-led administration and President Mahmoud Abbas' more moderate Fatah Party said they would form a coalition government. In the past half-year international financial sanctions have crippled the Palestinian Authority's ability to pay its 165,000 employees.

While all details on forming a new government are lacking, Casey said "from what we have seen so far we are certainly concerned" that it does not accept demands by the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia that it renounce terrorism and violence, recognize Israel and accept previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

"Obviously, nothing can move forward until such time that there's a government in place that does meet that criteria," Casey said,

Casey commended Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority, for trying to break an impasse with the militant group Hamas and form a responsible government that could meet the aspirations of the Palestinian people.

The United States provides humanitarian aid to the Palestinians, but no direct aid to the Authority. Western countries suspended aid when Hamas, which they consider to be a terror group, took over the Palestinian government earlier this year after an election victory.

"We are continuing to be mindful of the humanitarian needs of the Palestinian people," Casey said. The U.S. government has provided $468 million in direct assistance to them this year, he said

Meanwhile, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was expected to discuss the Palestinian unity efforts with Rice at the State Department on Wednesday.

U.S. Wary Of Palestinian Plan (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Palestinian plans to form a coalition government have created a quandary for the Bush administration, which wants to ease suffering in the Gaza Strip and West Bank without lifting pressure on Hamas.

Leaders of the radical Islamic group, and those of the rival Fatah faction, announced this week that they were close to completing a deal that they hoped would persuade the West to end an aid cutoff that had bankrupted the government and set off factional fighting.

U.S. officials, who consider Hamas a terrorist group, have halted all but direct humanitarian aid since Hamas came to power in January elections. U.S. officials have said they want to avert a humanitarian catastrophe in the territories, but noted Tuesday that the Palestinian proposal might not be enough to end the aid ban.

The U.S. bind was complicated by Europe's warm reaction to the Palestinian unity government plan, posing a risk that a new transatlantic rift could develop over the issue. British Prime Minister Tony Blair said this week after a visit to the region that it might be possible for the West to deal with a unified government.

Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, said U.S. officials would look at details of the plan, which have not been completed.

"We are continuing to be mindful of the humanitarian needs of the Palestinian people," Casey said. But he said that before aid could be resumed, the Palestinians would need to renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

"From what we have seen so far, we are certainly concerned" that the coalition government does not accept those demands, Casey said. The stipulations were laid out in January by the U.S., the United Nations, the European Union and Russia.

Israeli officials did not close the door on potential relations with a unity government when the deal was announced Monday by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, the leader of Fatah.

On Tuesday, an Israeli official sounded more skeptical, saying the deal seemed to be an effort to put a more presentable face on the government without making key changes or concessions.

Restoring aid would lift the pressure on Hamas just when the crunch was beginning to have an effect, the official said, noting that polls showed public support in the territories shifting away from Hamas and toward Fatah. The official spoke on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitivity of the diplomacy underway.

Some analysts said the Bush administration would be influenced by the Israeli government's attitude and probably would not resume aid. But they speculated that Washington could decide not to object to a European decision to resume, or increase, assistance.

"The Americans will probably react coolly to it, but they may say to the Europeans, 'If you have to [resume aid], we can live with it,' " said Nathan Brown, a specialist on Arab politics at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

But David Makovsky of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy predicted that U.S. skepticism would prevail.

DOJ_NMG_0062305

"I think people in Washington are going to be pretty underwhelmed by it," Makovsky said. The Palestinians are "playing with words and trying to get the world to give them as much money as possible without being bound to anything."

Many U.S. lawmakers could object loudly to any resumption of aid. Both houses of Congress have passed bills this year to limit the provision of direct aid to the Palestinian government as long as Hamas is in power. The European Union followed with a partial aid cutoff.

The U.S. government has provided $468 million in direct humanitarian aid to the Palestinians this year, Casey said.

The Palestinians' worsening financial crisis pushed Hamas into an alliance with Fatah, which recognizes Israel's right to exist, in hopes of getting aid flowing again.

But Hamas has no plans to recognize Israel, its spokesmen said. Instead, the government is expected to stake out a nuanced position that implies acceptance of a two-state solution to the Middle East conflict — and therefore of Israel — without saying so explicitly.

The agreement serving as the basis for the proposed government tacitly recognizes Israel by calling for creation of a Palestinian state along borders predating the 1967 Middle East War, meaning in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with Jerusalem as its capital.

That may not be direct enough to satisfy the Bush administration and Israel, but it could convince some European donors that Hamas has shifted its stances sufficiently and sway them to resume financial aid, analysts say.

"What the Palestinians are really hoping for is a breakthrough with the Europeans, who will judge the political program not so much in relation to the three conditions as in the difference in the Hamas position, so they will see this as a positive sign," said Mouin Rabbani, a Jordanian-based analyst for the International Crisis Group.

Hamas Gives Abbas OK For Negotiations (AP)

By Diaa Hadid

AP, September 12, 2006

Hamas officials gave Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas the go-ahead Tuesday for negotiations with Israel, a major shift in the militant Islamic group's position as it works to end its international isolation.

An Israeli military court, meanwhile, ordered the release of 19 Hamas officials — including Cabinet ministers and lawmakers — from an Israeli prison. The men, arrested by Israel after the June 25 capture of Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit by Hamas-linked militants, will remain behind bars for several more days pending an appeal by prosecutors.

Israel said the court decision was not meant to reward Hamas for its moves toward moderation.

"I don't think that right now we would be making gestures of goodwill for the Hamas. We would be making gestures of goodwill to Abu Mazen," Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin said, referring to the moderate Abbas by his nickname. Eisin said the courts were independent of the government.

Hamas, whose ideology calls for Israel's destruction, reached agreement Monday with Abbas' Fatah Party to form a unity government in an effort to end the financial crisis crippling the Palestinian economy. International donors cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority when Hamas formed its Cabinet six months ago. Hamas is listed as a terror group by Israel and the West.

Abbas has long pushed for a resumption of peace talks with Israel, and Hamas said Tuesday he would have full authority to hold those negotiations.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a Hamas leader, said the government itself would not be involved in the talks because negotiations are supposed to be handled by the PLO, headed by Abbas. The distinction could allow Hamas to retain its hard-line credentials with the Palestinian street, while the government gains international acceptance.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas-led government, told Israel's Army Radio in Hebrew that the Palestinians would be ready to establish a state in territories captured by Israel in the 1967 Mideast War — the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem.

Visiting Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Moratinos said the new Palestinian coalition could be a "positive step in principle," but he stopped short of saying whether it would persuade the EU to restore aid to the Palestinian Authority.

While Hamad said Hamas would not recognize Israel's right to exist, the joint government is to be based on a platform many believe implies recognition of the Jewish state.

DOJ_NMG_0062306

"We have nothing against negotiations, we have nothing against a diplomatic process, but we have rights," Hamad said.

Israel, the U.S. and European Union have said Hamas must renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept past peace agreements.

With negotiations over the government guidelines continuing, no date was set for it to take office.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was heading to Washington on Tuesday for talks with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Israel wants to ensure the international community does not reward Hamas for half measures, Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said.

"If the new Palestinian government reaches the three benchmarks and Gilad Shalit is released, then things could move ahead very quickly," he said. "Anything less than that is just a recipe for further stagnation."

And Defense Minister Amir Peretz said Shalit's release could lead to "meaningful talks" with the Palestinians.

Shalit's capture sparked a broad Israeli offensive in Gaza, and security forces arrested three dozen Hamas officials on charges of belonging to a banned group.

The military judge, who ruled Tuesday that 18 of those in custody should be freed, questioned the timing of the arrests, noting the men were permitted to run for office and serve in the Palestinian government for months before their detentions. He said the politicians — including Parliament Speaker Abdel Aziz Duaik and Religious Affairs Minister Nayef Rajoub — should be set released. In a separate hearing, a judge ordered Deputy Prime Minister Nasser Shaer freed.

Prosecutors plan to appeal Thursday. Decisions are expected next week. In the meantime, the 19 remain in prison.

Earlier this week, the court ordered the release of three other Hamas members. That appeal is to be heard Wednesday.

"The arrest of the parliamentarians and ministers was from the beginning an unjust arrest," Haniyeh said. "We hope all of them will be released."

Despite the apparent easing of tensions, Hamas gunmen, along with members of another militant group, battled Israeli troops operating near Gaza's border with Israel, killing one soldier early Tuesday, the army said.

Israeli troops also shot and killed a 13-year-old boy during a raid in the West Bank town of Bethlehem after youths began pelting troops with stones, witnesses and hospital officials said. The Israeli military said soldiers fired after they were attacked by Palestinians. One soldier was wounded.

More Palestinians Urging An End To Paralyzed Governing Authority (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- As the young editor of Hamas's weekly newspaper, Sari Orabi is a careful monitor of what he describes as the "surprisingly frank" debate underway within the party that took control of the Palestinian Authority just over five months ago.

Orabi, sporting blue jeans and bristling hair, said he was among those who argued that the radical Islamic movement should not compete in last January's parliamentary elections, fearing victory would bring sanctions from Israel and international donors that classify Hamas as a terrorist organization.

That prediction has proved true, bankrupting the authority and raising questions within party ranks over whether the government Hamas won the right to run is worth maintaining at all.

"The situation we face is proof that the Palestinian Authority under the occupation is an illusion," Orabi, 26, said recently over tea in an office smashed earlier this year by rampaging members of the security services controlled by the rival Fatah movement. "What is the reason behind this authority? A majority now says it is all a big lie."

Created a dozen years ago to administer the occupied Palestinian territories, the frail political system called the Palestinian Authority is now broke, paralyzed by months of partisan infighting and depleted by Israeli arrests. A growing number of Palestinians -- a group that has expanded in recent months from a core of secular intellectuals to include officials from the leading political movements -- have begun advocating openly for the authority's dissolution.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, facing a strike by civil servants over unpaid wages, agreed this week to form a power-sharing government with Fatah and other factions in hopes of restoring international aid. Whether a new government will revive foreign financial support, which accounts for nearly half the authority's budget, could help determine whether the authority itself remains viable in the face of mounting unrest and disillusion in the territories.

The unity government platform would commit Hamas to accept past agreements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization that recognize Israel. It would mark the first time that Hamas, which does not belong to the PLO and has long opposed the 1993 Oslo peace accords that created the Palestinian Authority, would tacitly accept a two-state solution to the conflict.

But Hamas has so far refused to renounce violence or explicitly recognize the Jewish state -- two of the three conditions set by the United States, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union for a renewal of aid. Israeli officials indicated Tuesday that Israel would not release hundreds of millions of dollars in frozen tax revenue it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority or support an easing of international sanctions against it unless those terms were met.

The result could doom the new coalition government, slated to be headed by Haniyeh, before it takes shape. And failing to win international support after compromising is likely to inflame Hamas activists, some of whom have argued for months that collapsing the authority is preferable to giving up power won in fair elections.

"When you have an authority that is utterly powerless, what do you expect the reaction from the public will be?" said Ali Jarbawi, a professor at Bir Zeit University near Ramallah, who broached the idea of dissolving the Palestinian Authority three years ago in a series of influential journal articles. "More and more people are saying, 'If you can't deliver, you shouldn't exist.' "

Dissolving the Palestinian Authority, once envisioned as the embryo of a future Palestinian state's government, has until now been largely a topic of intellectual debate among professors, U.S.-educated lawyers for the Palestine Liberation Organization and disaffected members of the leading parties.

But the idea has reached further into the political mainstream over a difficult summer during which the authority has lost support among its two chief constituencies: Fatah, which dominated the government for years until its election loss to Hamas, and public employees who have gone months without paychecks. An estimated 1 million Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip depend on authority salaries for their livelihoods.

Jarbawi and others argue that the authority has taken the brunt of the blame for Palestinian political, economic and security failures, even though Israel, through its military presence, border controls and financial ties, remains the decisive power in the territories.

Without the authority, Jarbawi and others contend, Israel would be forced to assume a far greater political and financial role in the territories, taking responsibility for health, education and other services under international law that govern occupation. The Israeli investment could total billions of dollars annually and bring new pressure on the Jewish state to sign a comprehensive peace agreement with the Palestinians.

The authority "was supposed to be a vehicle for the establishment of a Palestinian state, but today the situation is not logical and we alone are paying the price of the occupation," said Hassan Khreisheh, a deputy speaker of the Hamas-controlled parliament who proposed dissolving the Palestinian Authority in a legislative session last month following a 26-day stint in an Israeli jail for belonging to an illegal organization. "The Israeli occupation should be paying for education, health and the administration, while the Palestinian cause should be brought back into the hands of the international community."

Following Hamas's election victory in January, the movement and its allies had remained publicly committed to the authority. But Orabi said elements within Hamas are growing more radical as their government continues to falter under economic sanctions and Israeli pressure. More than 30 Hamas members of parliament, including the speaker and five cabinet ministers, were detained and remain in Israeli custody since the June 25 capture of Israeli army Cpl. Gilad Shalit by gunmen from the movement's military wing. Israel has made Shalit's release a condition for unfreezing the tax revenue.

Ghazi Hamad, a Hamas official and adviser to Haniyeh, warned of radicalization in a scathing critique of Palestinian disunity and his own party's mistakes published last month by the Palestinian newspaper al-Ayyam.

DOJ_NMG_0062308

"We have lost the connection between the resistance and other aspects of life," Hamad wrote, referring to armed confrontation with Israel. "There is an abyss between the resistance, politics and the people. That is why the people are scattered, not unified, not organized."

The authority is also losing legitimacy inside the ranks of Fatah, whose members fill out much of the civil service.

Some of Fatah's young guard, disillusioned by the older generation's corrupt and incompetent leadership, quietly advocated the authority's abolishment when the party was in charge. Hamas officials contend that their rivals began advocating the approach more boldly after losing their hold on the Palestinian ministries, long a source of patronage and power.

"The only justification for this authority was to pay employees, and now that it cannot even do that, there is no reason for it at all," said Tayseer Nasrallah, 45, a Fatah leader from Nablus who is working on a project to reform his party. "The voices for the authority's dissolution are rising inside the party. We need to make a dramatic gesture to force the world to really look for a just solution to this crisis, or we will go back to the occupation run entirely by Israel."

Qaddura Faris, 44, a former minister and a powerful figure within Fatah's young guard, favored dissolving the authority when Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was still alive. But Faris does not believe that authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who succeeded Arafat after his death in November 2004, has the power to govern without the government's institutions. Faris and others say the possible alternatives to the authority, which could include returning to the Israeli occupation that existed before Oslo or perhaps a civil administration by Jordan, are worse.

"If it happened now, we would be left without an umbrella," said Faris, who acknowledged that young Fatah activists are behind the civil servants' strike to pressure Hamas to cede control of the cabinet. "But there is also this impression that if we can form a national unity government, everything will be okay. I don't believe that either."

Blair Urges Lifting Of Palestinian Sanctions (AFP)

AFP, September 12, 2006

Britain's Tony Blair urged the lifting of economic sanctions on the Palestinian Authority, so long as a deal on a cabinet of national unity there meets international conditions.

He made the comments a day after returning from a three-day trip to the Middle East, during which he faced protests over his stance notably during the recent conflict between Israel and Hezbollah militants in Lebanon.

"Yesterday's announcement of a government of national unity in Palestine is precisely what I hoped for," he said, referring to an agreement under which president Mahmud Abbas is to dissolve the current Hamas-led government.

"On the basis it is faithful to the conditions spelled out by the Quartet, that is the UN, EU, US and Russia, we should lift the economic sanctions on the Palestinian authority," added the British prime minister.

He appeared to be referring to international economic sanctions slapped on the Palestinian Authority by the United States and the European Union following the January election of the militant group Hamas, considered a terrorist movement by both Washington and Brussels.

At the time the Middle East Quartet that Blair referred to said the sanctions would remain in place until Hamas renounced violence, recognized Israel and pledged to abide by agreements signed by previous Palestinian leaderships.

The Quartet has long been battling to revive the peace process in the region.

Under a deal announced on Monday, Abbas is to dissolve the current government and charge prime minister Ismail Haniya of the Islamist movement Hamas with forming a new cabinet.

Palestinian officials hope that the formation of the new government will lead to the West ending a freeze on direct aid to the Palestinian Authority, which was adopted after Hamas formed a cabinet in March.

The Western aid freeze has plunged the Palestinian territories into a severe economic crisis, which has been compounded by Israel's two-month military offensive in the Gaza Strip, launched after militants killed two soldiers and seized a third in a cross-border raid.

Hamas has killed scores of Israelis over the years in suicide attacks. But it has not claimed any such attack inside the Jewish state since January 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0062309

Blair made his comments during a speech to the annual Trades Union Congress (TUC) gathering in Brighton, at which he faced protests including from delegates opposed to what they called the "illegal war" in Lebanon.

The British premier last week pledged to resign within a year, as the price of quelling a damaging crisis within his ruling Labour party over his leadership plans.

His speech to the TUC was therefore his last to the gathering as prime minister.

Annan: Israeli Withdrawal "Significant' (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, September 12, 2006

Israel has made "significant progress" in the gradual withdrawal of its forces from south Lebanon in the month since the U.N. Security Council passed a resolution to end the conflict there, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Tuesday in a report.

The report said both Israel and the Islamic militant group Hezbollah had mostly complied with the cease-fire that was called for in that resolution, aside from one major raid by Israel on Aug. 19 and several minor violations.

The U.N. Security Council had asked Annan to report back periodically on the implementation of the resolution, which paved the way for the cease-fire that took effect on Aug. 14.

He said Israel has withdrawn from about two-thirds of the area it occupied in south Lebanon as it tried to oust Hezbollah militants from the area, and has promised to leave entirely by the time Lebanon deploys 15,000 troops and the U.N. sends 5,000 peacekeepers there.

Annan, who recently returned from an 11-day trip to the region, said the process would be finished in the coming weeks. He did not say how many Israeli troops remained in south Lebanon.

"On the ground, significant progress continues to be made as regards the gradual withdrawal of Israeli forces and the deployment of the LAF (Lebanese Armed Forces)," Annan wrote in the report.

Annan said the 34-day conflict, sparked when Hezbollah captured two Israeli soldiers in a July 12 cross-border raid, had plunged the region "back into the instability that prevailed for decades."

He said the underlying causes of conflict in the Middle East had to be addressed to end the violence.

"Other crises cannot be ignored, especially in the occupied Palestinian territory, as they are all interlinked," he said. "Until the international community insists on a just, lasting and comprehensive peace in the Middle East, any one of these conflicts has the potential to erupt and engulf the entire region."

Annan said that during his recent trip to the Middle East, Syrian President Bashar Assad had assured him that Damascus was prepared to delineate its border with Lebanon. That would help settle the issue of the disputed Chebaa Farms area, which sits where the borders of Lebanon, Syria and Israel meet and is occupied by Israel.

Assad also assured him that Syria is willing to increase the number of border guards along the boundary with Lebanon, and give them more training and supplies.

Hezbollah is widely believed to have received weapons and other support from its backers, Syria and Iran.

On other issues, Annan said Israeli maps provided to the U.N. peacekeeping mission in south Lebanon about Israel's cluster bombing of the area were not detailed enough to be of any use. He repeated U.N. findings that said 90 percent of the cluster bombs Israel dropped during the conflict fell in the three days between Aug. 11, when the Security Council approved the cease-fire, and the moment the fighting stopped.

Land For NATO (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

Listening to the post-Lebanon-war debate in Israel leaves me wanting to say just one thing to Israelis: Get a grip on.

Israel is behaving like it lost the Lebanon war and now needs to tear itself apart, limb by limb, with investigations and new elections. Clearly the Israeli Army's logistics broke down, and clearly it was ill-prepared for a guerrilla war against Hezbollah. And clearly it is a sign of the health of Israel's democracy that Israelis feel free to castigate their leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0062310

Nevertheless, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert did a better job, under the circumstances, than he is being credited with, and, more important, the situation evolving in south Lebanon now has the potential to offer a whole new model for peacemaking.

Regarding Mr. Olmert, this war was not easy to manage, because it was about everything and nothing. There was absolutely no reason for the Hezbollah attack on July 12 across the U.N.-recognized Israel-Lebanon border, in which eight Israeli soldiers were killed and two abducted. In that sense, the war was about nothing.

But precisely because it was about nothing, it was also about everything. If Hezbollah could just attack Israel — unprovoked — claiming among its goals the liberation of Jerusalem, and using missiles provided by an Iranian regime that says Israel should be wiped off the map, then it was a war about everything. And Israel had to respond resolutely.

So, gauging the right response was intrinsically hard. In the end, Mr. Olmert bombarded Hezbollah's infrastructure, and, tragically but inevitably, the homes of Hezbollah's Shiite followers, among whom Hezbollah fighters were embedded.

The Israeli response was brutal, but it did send a deterrent message, which Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader, received. As he put it in an interview on Lebanon's NTV, "If I had known on July 11 ... that the operation would lead to such a war, would I do it? I say no, absolutely not."

Even he doesn't think he won.

Give Nasrallah credit for honesty. What Arab leader has ever been so self-critical? Nasrallah was reacting to those Lebanese voices that said: Thanks for passing out $12,000 to families who lost homes in the fighting, but had you spent that money on schools and jobs, rather than a stupid war, we'd all be better off.

The fact that Condi Rice and the French foreign minister, working with the U.N., were able to secure an international peacekeeping force in south Lebanon is a potentially key achievement on two fronts. If the force works — still a big if — Hezbollah will not be able to directly attack Israel without getting embroiled in a conflict with 15,000 French, Italian, Indian and possibly Turkish peacekeepers. That is a big new strategic problem for Hezbollah, Iran and Syria. They can't hit Israel now without harming their ties with the E.U.

More important, what have we learned in recent years? One, Israel's occupations of the West Bank, Gaza and Lebanon are unsustainable. And two, Lebanon and the Palestinians don't have their act together enough yet to control border areas when Israel leaves — either by agreement (Oslo) or by just unilaterally withdrawing and throwing the keys over the fence. As a result, the peace process has not been "land for peace," but "land for war."

When Israel pulls out of Gaza, Lebanon and the West Bank and wants quiet, it needs a reliable structure of authority on the other side, which, right now, neither Lebanon nor the Palestinians alone can provide.

The U.N./European force evolving in Lebanon may offer a new model. It's not "land for peace," or "land for war," but what I'd call "land for NATO." Israel withdraws and the border is secured by a force that is U.N. on the outside but NATO on the inside.

"The fact that it has a heavy European/NATO component makes it credible to Israel, and the fact that it has a U.N. umbrella makes it acceptable to the Arab world," said the U.N. under secretary Shashi Tharoor, the dynamic Indian diplomat who is a finalist to succeed Kofi Annan as secretary general and who deserves U.S. endorsement.

The Europeans have to understand "that something very big is at stake in this force," said the Israeli political theorist Yaron Ezrahi. They have to prove that demilitarization in south Lebanon can give Israel security and Lebanon both sovereignty and an effective international partner to maintain order. If that happens, he added, "it could revive the chances for an eventual Palestinian-Israeli deal on the West Bank and Gaza."

Yes, it's a long shot, but maybe something good can actually come out of this good-for-nothing Lebanon war.

Bomb Kills 7 In Southeastern Turkey (AP)

By Benjamin Harvey

AP, September 12, 2006

A bomb struck a predominantly Kurdish city in southeastern Turkey on Tuesday, killing seven people and wounding 17, the local governor's office said.

Authorities said the bomb was made from powerful explosives and was set off by a cell phone timer. It was not immediately known who placed it, and nobody claimed responsibility.

DOJ_NMG_0062311

The explosion in the city of Diyarbakir happened around 9 p.m. and an investigation had begun, according to a statement from the provincial governor's office, which gave the casualty toll.

The deputy governor of the surrounding Diyarbakir province, Ahmet Aydin, said children were among those killed and two of the injured were in serious condition at a local hospital. Local news stations said five of the seven killed were children.

A Kurdish news agency reported that the blast took place near an elementary school. Witnesses said the blast threw body parts over a wide area and left pools of blood from the killed and injured.

Diyarbakir is Turkey's largest Kurdish-majority city, and the blast came as Kurdish rebels fighting for autonomy in the region have stepped up their attacks.

Also on Tuesday, the Turkish military announced that authorities had defused a remote-controlled bomb planted by Kurdish guerrillas on a busy bridge near the southeastern city of Hatay, and a bomb believed placed by rebels exploded as a freight train carrying coal passed in the eastern province of Bingol, damaging three rail cars.

The United States and Turkey are taking measures to counter Kurdish militants who have training camps in northern Iraq and launch frequent raids into Turkey.

Retired U.S. Air Force Gen. Joseph Ralston arrived in Ankara earlier Tuesday for talks on how to increase U.S.-Turkish cooperation in the fight against the rebels.

More than 37,000 people have been killed in fighting since rebels of the Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, took up arms against the Turkish state in 1984.

Both the United States and Turkey consider the group to be a terrorist organization.

Bomb Blast Kills Eight In Turkey's Main Kurdish City (AFP)

By Mahmut Bozarslan

AFP, September 12, 2006

Eight people, among them six children, were killed and 16 others injured in a powerful bomb blast in Diyarbakir, the largest city in Turkey's mainly Kurdish southeast, officials and hospital sources said.

The blast, the deadliest in a string of bombings across Turkey this year, occurred at around 9 pm (1900 GMT) near a bus stop at a crowded park in Diyarbakir's impoverished Baglar district, in which tea gardens are a favorite venue to relax in the evenings.

The bomb blast was heard throughout the city, shattering the windows of nearby buildings and opening small cracks in several walls.

A statement by the local governor's office identified the cause of the blast as a bomb and said that seven people were killed.

A one-year-old girl succumbed to her injuries later, bringing the death toll to eight, hospital sources said.

Another person was in critical condition.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack.

Diyarbakir, a city of around one million people, is a hotbed of Kurdish separatist militancy.

Covered bodies lay in the midst of pools of blood as the police cordoned off the site and bomb experts clad in white protective gear gathered evidence.

The CNN-Turk news channel said the bomb was detonated by remote control, possibly a mobile telephone.

"We heard that terrible bang and then we saw flames rising as high as five meters from the ground," said Hasan Ozcetinkaya, an employee of a gas station across the street.

"I was resting at home when I heard the explosion. I thought it was either an earthquake or I was losing my mind," Mehmet Sanli, a 75-year-old resident of a building next to the park, said. "I went out barefooted and the street was littered with pieces of glass."

The police launched an extensive security operation after the blast, checking people entering and exiting the city.

Southeast Turkey has been the theatre of a bloody 22-year Kurdish rebellion, led by the separatist Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), which has claimed more than 37,000 lives.

DOJ_NMG_0062312

The PKK, blacklisted as a terrorist group by Turkey, the European Union and the United States, has notably stepped up violence this year after it called off a five-year unilateral ceasefire in June 2004.

At least 75 members of the security forces and 104 rebels have been killed in clashes and attacks since the beginning of the year, according to an AFP count.

Kurdish militants have also claimed responsibility for 16 bomb attacks across Turkey, including tourist resorts in the west, which killed a total of 12 people and left around 200 others injured.

Tuesday's attack is likely to put further strain on the government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, which has come under mounting criticism for failing to stop bloodshed in the southeast.

The bomb exploded hours after the arrival in Ankara of a special US envoy, retired general Joseph W. Ralston, who will hold talks with Turkish officials on Wednesday to discuss measures to curb the PKK.

Ankara has long urged Washington to crack down on PKK bases in neighboring northern Iraq, where the group has enjoyed safe haven for years.

On Monday, Turkey's main Kurdish party, the Democratic Society Party, urged the PKK to call a ceasefire.

French Presidential Hopeful Tours The U.S. (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Nicolas Sarkozy is campaigning hard to be the next president of France on the jogging trails of Central Park and in the corridors of the White House.

On a four-day trip to the United States, the 51-year-old minister of the interior, France's leading presidential hopeful on the right, pinned the Legion of Honor on the police commissioner of New York, honored firefighters in Midtown Manhattan for their losses on 9/11 and signed hundreds of copies of his new best-selling book on France's future.

He told Jewish leaders of his love of Israel, American business leaders of his love of free enterprise, and Francophiles of his love of America. He confessed that he loves to read Hemingway and watch movies like "Miami Vice."

He was received by President Bush at the White House (an exceptional event for a mere minister) and by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, on Capitol Hill.

"My devotion to our relationship with America is well known and has earned me substantial criticism in France," Mr. Sarkozy declared in a speech before the French-American Foundation in Washington on Tuesday, his last day here. "I'm not a coward. I'm proud of this friendship, and I proclaim it gladly."

Mr. Sarkozy is calculating that his courtship of America, and his affinity with some policies of the United States, may win him votes on the French right. And he used his trip here both to burnish his standing as a statesman and separate himself from what he considers his government's clumsy diplomacy in crises like those in Iraq and Lebanon.

Mr. Sarkozy is in many ways the most un-French of politicians, a believer in hard work, raw ambition, the man on the street and the American dream.

Despite the French Republican ideal that ignores religious and ethnic differences, Mr. Sarkozy speaks often of his Hungarian father and his foreign-sounding name, and has disclosed that one of his grandfathers was Jewish.

So for him, the nickname "Sarko the American" is not an insult, but a badge of honor.

In his speech on Tuesday, he blamed journalists on both sides of the Atlantic for writing reports often "so far from the truth" about France's adoration and envy of the United States.

The French, he said, "wear American jeans and love American burgers and pizza.

"Nothing makes a French person prouder than seeing a French actor in an American film," he added. "All French parents dream of sending their child to an American university."

Americans, he said, are "so successful and so misunderstood." Although Mr. Sarkozy opposes the war in Iraq, he criticized President Jacques Chirac for the way he conducted diplomacy with the United States before the war. In 2003, Mr. Chirac threatened to veto a United Nations Security Council resolution justifying the war, which infuriated the United States. Mr. Sarkozy called that decision the basis for the misunderstanding between France and the United States, adding that it was no way to treat a friend.

In a closed-door meeting with more than a dozen Jewish leaders on Monday, he said France should not have waited as long as it did to commit troops to Lebanon and went further than Mr. Chirac in criticizing Hezbollah, calling it a "terrorist" organization, according to one participant, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to disclose what took place at the meeting.

Mr. Sarkozy is running as both an insider and an outsider. He is the head of the ruling party, the Union for a Popular Movement, to which Mr. Chirac belongs, but he often calls for a "rupture" with current policies, including those that he believes inhibit job creation and productivity.

He did not go to the École Nationale d'Administration, the preparatory grand school for French political life, as did much of the country's political elite. "I wasn't destined to have a great role in society," he once said. "I had to go out and get it."

So it is as an outsider that he seems unconcerned that his appearance with Mr. Bush, who is more unpopular than ever in France these days, will hurt politically. On the contrary, Mr. Bush is the most recent in a string of foreign leaders Mr. Sarkozy has met with in recent weeks.

Playing the role of an ad hoc foreign minister, he discussed genocide in Darfur, the nuclear crisis with Iran and peacemaking in Lebanon with the United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, on Monday.

Mr. Sarkozy also appears to be wooing voters on the right through his anti-immigration, anticrime, antiterrorism policies to lure them from the extreme right-wing National Front party of Jean-Marie Le Pen. The highlight of the trip was an unannounced meeting with Mr. Bush at the White House on Tuesday during a scheduled meeting Mr. Sarkozy had with Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser.

Mr. Chirac, who was the first foreign leader to visit Mr. Bush at the White House after the 9/11 attacks, has been waiting for a return invitation ever since.

The purpose of Mr. Bush's appearance was in part to reward Mr. Sarkozy for his America-friendly foreign policy. "Certainly this can be seen as a signal to the current leadership in France," said one senior American official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly. "Sarkozy has shown he has a different attitude towards the United States."

The official said the meeting was negotiated by both sides.

The White House even allowed a photo of the two men to be released, following a day of negotiation with French officials, the official said.

Frederick Jones, the National Security Council spokesman, said Mr. Bush joined the meeting in Mr. Hadley's office for about 25 minutes.

Mr. Sarkozy also met Tuesday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security. To prove that the Bush administration is not taking sides in an election next April in which the parties have yet to choose candidates, Mr. Bush would also be willing to meet Ségolène Royal, the 52-year-old Socialist who is running neck and neck with Mr. Sarkozy in the polls, according to an American and a French official.

Mr. Sarkozy strongly opposes Turkey's bid for membership in the European Union, arguing that it will change Europe's character at a time when France and other European countries cannot manage the problems of their already large Muslim populations.

In the meeting with Jewish leaders, for example, he said Europe had a problem with its own Muslim population and asked, "So why is America advocating Turkish membership in the European Union?" according to one participant. He added, "We don't have a model of handling Muslims in Europe, so why should we bring in the Turks?"

He said the Libyan leader, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, had told him that one day Europe would be Muslim, and added that it would be "terrible" if such a thing happened with American help, the participant said.

Mr. Chirac, by contrast, is much more nuanced, cautiously endorsing Turkey's membership, but saying it could be a 10- to 15-year effort, and even then, would not be certain.

Mr. Sarkozy worked so hard to charm his American interlocutors during his trip that he even struggled to speak English.

DOJ_NMG_0062314

"I run. This morning. In Central Park. With T-shirt firefighters," he told Nicholas Scoppetta, the New York City fire commissioner, at a ceremony honoring New York firefighters.

"Wonderful! Excellent!" Mr. Scoppetta replied. Turning to a reporter, he added: "His English? He'd be the first to say he's a little embarrassed by it. But he's delightful. It's unfortunate that my vote doesn't count in France."

Mr. Sarkozy is already being attacked by his political opponents back home for using the visit — ostensibly a trip to commemorate the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks — for partisan political ends and paying for it with taxpayers' money.

In a television interview on Monday, for example, the former Socialist culture minister and presidential hopeful Jack Lang called Mr. Sarkozy's use of public funds for a trip with personal political aims "illegitimate."

Mr. Sarkozy also defended his actions, telling reporters on Monday that it was "very important" for a French politician to understand global problems, adding, "Of course, I will continue to travel, to understand or learn so that security in France can be ensured."

The tough-talking, law-and-order Mr. Sarkozy was most frank in his meeting with Jewish leaders.

He praised his handling of riots last fall in the Paris suburbs and other cities and explained his continuing popularity. "I have called gangs scum, and I am still leading in the polls," he said, one participant said.

He acknowledged that it is often the French elite who oppose him, adding, "Some of the French elite hate me more than they hate America."

Sarkozy Looks To Closer Ties After Bush Era (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

A bomb scare near the White House on Tuesday delayed a speech by Nicolas Sarkozy, France's interior minister, but only served to strengthen his personal pro-American, pro-Israel message while burnishing his presidential credentials overseas.

However, like David Cameron, leader of Britain's opposition Conservatives in an address in London a day earlierMr Sarkozy was clearly looking towards the post-Bush era, directing his enthusiasm at the American nation and not its current administration.

Mr Sarkozy, front-runner to become the right's presidential candidate next year, mentioned President George W. Bush only briefly and France's Jacques Chirac not at all. In fact the interior minister seemed to distance himself from his own president, speaking of French "arrogance" and calling for a new era in transatlantic relations.

Welcoming his critics' attacks on his pro-American stance, Mr Sarkozy declared: "I'm not a coward. I am proud of this friendship and proclaim it gladly."

Turning to the crisis in Lebanon, Mr Sarkozy also spoke of his affinity to Israel in language that any mainstream American presidential aspirant would adopt.

"I would like to state how close I feel to Israel," he said, departing from the text of his speech. He said Israel's response in Lebanon might be considered "clumsy and disproportionate" but the "truth" was that Israel had a right to defend itself against the "aggressor" Hizbollah. "We are by your side," he said.

Hosted by the French American Foundation in the elegant setting of the National Society of the Daughters of the Revolution, Mr Sarkozy was preaching to the converted. But still he went to great lengths to describe the nations' historic ties and French admiration, if touched with envy, for America's "brilliant successes".

These included its economic, monetary and military power, rich intellectual life, the draw of US universities, its model of social integration, and the television series Miami Vice, jeans, burgers and pizza.

He rejected US pressure on the EU to accept Turkey as a member, saying this was not logical while countries such as France were struggling to integrate their own Muslim populations.

While sounding alarmist in his interpretation of the threat posed by Iran and its nuclear programme, Mr Sarkozy stressed the need for diplomacy and voiced scepticism about sanctions.

U.S. Creates Five Groups To Eye Cuba (MH)

By Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, September 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0062315

WASHINGTON - Convinced that Fidel Castro will never regain the power he once wielded, the Bush administration has created five interagency working groups to monitor Cuba and carry out U.S. policies.

The groups, some of which operate in a war-room-like setting, were quietly set up after the July 31 announcement that the ailing Cuban leader had temporarily ceded power to a collective leadership headed by his brother Raúl, U.S. officials have told The Miami Herald.

Their composition reflects both the administration's Cuban policy priorities as well as the belief that the 80-year-old Castro's status as the island's undisputed leader is finished, regardless of the nature of his still-mysterious ailment.

Thomas Shannon, U.S. assistant secretary of state for the Western Hemisphere, said last month that Castro "does not appear" to be in a position to return to day-to-day management.

Eric Watnik, a State Department spokesman on Cuban issues, went further, telling The Miami Herald that Castro "will never come back to the position that he previously enjoyed." He declined to detail any evidence the U.S. government has for such a belief.

U.S. officials say three of the newly created groups are headed by the State Department: diplomatic actions; strategic communications and democratic promotion. Another that coordinated humanitarian aid to Cuba is run by the Commerce Department, and a fifth, on migration issues, is run jointly by the National Security Council and the Department of Homeland Security.

Many members of the groups work out of the same State Department office in what one person familiar with the operation described as a ``control room."

The State Department is reluctant to give details of the new interagency groups, saying the focus should be on the democratic transition the groups are trying to achieve in Cuba rather than on the U.S. government process.

But the overall idea is to exchange views with other governments and create a common external front as Cuba begins its post-Castro transition, said U.S. officials who asked for anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the issues.

Officials portrayed the working groups as logical outcomes of the Commission on Assistance to a Free Cuba, an interagency Cabinet-level effort that has been convened twice to draft policy recommendations. The second commission report, co-chaired by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, was issued in July, just weeks before Castro underwent surgery for intestinal bleeding caused by a still undisclosed ailment.

It recommended more aid to Castro opponents, a diplomatic campaign to offset Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's alleged efforts to prolong communism in Cuba, and stricter enforcement of existing sanctions. It also recommended more coordination between government agencies.

The establishment of the new interagency working groups came around the same time as the intelligence community was also bolstering its monitoring of Cuba. Last month, U.S. Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte appointed CIA veteran Patrick Maher as acting mission manager for Cuba and Venezuela. Officials say the post had been planned before the announcement of Castro's illness.

HIGH-LEVEL POST

The position is considered "very high level," according to Brian Latell, a retired CIA analyst on Cuba and author of a recent book on Fidel and Raúl Castro, After Fidel.

Such mission managers usually oversee a staff of between four and six people that culls intelligence information on the target countries. Though the post is essentially one of coordination, the manager is also expected to "be an activist" to stimulate better information gathering from the different branches of the intelligence services, Latell said.

The creation of the post also underlined the national security importance of Cuba and Venezuela. Only Iran and North Korea -- both perceived as nuclear threats -- currently have similar U.S. mission managers overseeing them. Three other managers oversee counterterrorism, counterintelligence and counterproliferation.

The Bush administration's policy on Cuba has been straightforward: pressure Havana to adopt democratic reforms through a combination of economic sanctions and diplomatic isolation.

But when specific options are discussed, Cuba has often turned out to be divisive.

DOJ_NMG_0062316

The Department of Defense, for instance, has balked at acting too aggressively for fear of igniting a crisis in the U.S. back yard at a time when U.S. forces already are stretched thin by the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Mauricio Claver-Carone, who heads the U.S.-Cuba Democracy Political Action Committee in Washington, which lobbies Congress for tougher sanctions on the island, says democratic change in Cuba should "supersede perceived instability" concerns.

He said that the State Department and the White House are committed to "democracy above all options," while Homeland Security and the Pentagon are ``ambivalent to drastic change in Cuba."

MARTI BROADCASTS

Another example is an effort to ease the restriction requiring the U.S. airplanes that broadcast Radio and TV Martí to Cuba to remain within U.S. territorial airspace -- a measure that limits its ability to get around Cuban jamming.

Some Cuban-American activists have long advocated allowing the aircraft to wander into international airspace despite concerns about violating international broadcasting regulations. But the Cuban government considers all Martí broadcasts provocations that violate international law.

Miami Republican Rep. Lincoln Díaz-Balart told The Miami Herald in an interview earlier this year that the aircraft ``should be able to fly from wherever it has to fly so that the signal can't be jammed."

Dance Of Diplomacy Is Grist For The Gossip Mill (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

STELLARTON, Nova Scotia, Sept. 12 — There are perils to being unattached in the stodgy world of diplomacy. Sometimes it has seemed that all Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice needs to do is show up in public with a man, and people start talking.

The single, sophisticated American secretary of state once drew notice for wearing black stiletto knee-high boots with an above-the-knee black skirt while reviewing American troops in Germany, so she is bound to attract gossip. That is particularly true on the dry, acronym-ridden diplomatic circuit of NATO meetings, APEC forums and Asean conclaves, where much imagination has focused on possible romantic links between Ms. Rice and her counterparts.

Until now, Ms. Rice's rumored matches have been, shall we say, unlikely ever to appear on the cover of GQ magazine. In July, Italy's normally staid Corriere della Sera raised its eyebrows over a joint appearance in Rome between Italy's similarly staid foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, and Ms. Rice. In April, a headline in The Boston Globe promised a tale of "Jack and Condi: A Love Story," after Ms. Rice gave the pullout bed aboard her plane to the former British foreign minister, Jack Straw, during a surprise trip to Baghdad from Blackpool, England, where she was visiting Mr. Straw's hometown.

But it took a two-hour flight to Halifax, Nova Scotia, this week, followed by a 90-minute motorcade north up Highway 102 to Pictou County, for Ms. Rice to find herself linked to someone with similar star appeal: Peter MacKay of Canada, the single, sophisticated foreign minister, routinely named Canada's sexiest M.P. by The Hill Times in Ottawa, and the closest thing to eye candy on the diplomatic circuit. Tall, athletic, young, blond and recently dumped by his girlfriend, a fellow member of Parliament, Belinda Stronach, who parted with him when she switched parties, Mr. MacKay does not look like your usual foreign minister.

He has a tan and the build of someone who spends his time on the rugby field, not holed up reading G-8 communiqués. Sure, at 40 years old, he is younger than Ms. Rice, who is 51, but that did not stop gossips from engaging in baseless speculating.

Even the protesters who routinely show up wherever Ms. Rice goes got in on the act. "Pete, Condi, Make Love Not War," read one sign, carried by a grinning demonstrator who had roused himself to take a position early Tuesday morning in front of the Museum of Industry here, where the two spoke to local leaders and the press.

O.K., there needs to be a disclaimer right here. Foreign ministers rarely have a lot of alone time together. There is no evidence whatsoever to suggest that Ms. Rice and Mr. MacKay are linked by anything more than their shared status as singletons.

DOJ_NMG_0062317

The State Department has been quick to dump cold water over MacKay-Rice innuendoes. "No, there were no candles," Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said in exasperation when reporters asked for further details about a working dinner on Monday when the two sat side by side at the Pictou Lodge Resort. Mr. McCormack pointed out that the dinner was not even intimate: 14 aides and six security guards were present.

"It was a well lighted dinner, with electricity-based lighting," Mr. McCormack said.

But reporters tend to get bored pretty fast — there is only so much ink anyone can devote to softwood lumber trade spats and overfishing in the North Atlantic. And a bored reporter is a gossipy reporter, as demonstrated by the chatter last year after Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld took a dinner cruise up a Norwegian fjord and sipped wine with his counterpart, the Norwegian defense minister, Kristin Krohn Devold. (She gave him a sweater; he gave her a designer bag.)

If you believe the blogs, Mr. MacKay has been sweet on Ms. Rice since their first meeting in Washington last year. "Peter McKay has a crush... " said a headline on the Web site NowPublic, atop a giant photo of Ms. Rice, "...on Condoleezza Rice." The subhead continued: "Well, they are both single after all.''

Ms. Rice and Mr. MacKay even made the "Hot and Not" list in a column in the Toronto newspaper The Globe and Mail on Saturday. "Hot: Peter MacKay and Condoleezza Rice," the column, Ottawa Notebook, read.

The two do keep offering up tantalizing tidbits and comments to take out of context and misconstrue. For instance, after the Rome meeting in July, Ms. Rice gave Mr. McKay a ride aboard her plane to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, for a conference with Southeast Asian countries. O.K., the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, got a lift, too, but he looks like, well, a diplomat.

On Tuesday morning, Ms. Rice and Mr. MacKay strolled up to their side-by-side daises to talk to the folks here. "I am just delighted to have Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, here in my hometown," gushed a beaming Mr. MacKay, wearing a pearl gray suit, pink and blue striped tie.

He switched to bad French, even to some American ears, and said something about Longfellow's poem "Evangeline." He mentioned Nova Scotia's rich black history, citing the "black loyalist community, Canada's oldest community of African heritage."

Then, he said, "Something else I've learned about Secretary Rice is she loves the cool Atlantic breezes here in Nova Scotia, and she left the window open last night." The audience tittered.

At the end of his speech, he took off his glasses, turned to Ms. Rice and said, "Please come back again."

Ms. Rice, clad in a yellow jacket, black pencil skirt and black heels, also offered plenty of fodder. She repeatedly called Mr. MacKay "Peter" (he called her "Secretary Rice" or "Miss Rice"), confirmed the sleeping-with-the-window-open bit, and told the assembled local leaders that Mr. MacKay had introduced her to his family, including his father and stepmother, the night before.

Family is important, she said, with a sly smile, because "they remind you of the things you did when you were 5 years old." Beside her, Mr. MacKay grinned and blushed.

North Korea Rift Hangs Over Bush-Roh Summit (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea -- South Korea and the U.S. are strengthening their economic and military relationships, but their divergent views on how to deal with North Korea will provide an uncomfortable backdrop on a meeting in Washington tomorrow between the countries' presidents.

The missile tests North Korea conducted in July laid bare major strategic differences between Washington and Seoul that could widen if Pyongyang goes through with an underground nuclear-bomb test that U.S. intelligence sources say it is preparing.

President Bush pushed for United Nations sanctions against North Korea after the missile tests. South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun only mildly criticized Pyongyang and tried to dissuade allies such as the U.S. and Japan from reacting too strongly.

Both the U.S. and South Korea want to stop Pyongyang's nuclear-weapons program. But Washington also would like to see leader Kim Jong Il's regime collapse, in the hope of removing a threat to regional stability and ending decades of repression that have left North Korea one of the world's poorest countries.

DOJ_NMG_0062318

Mr. Roh and many South Koreans worry that a North Korean collapse would leave them with an enormous mess to clean up -- one that would cost tens of billions of dollars, slow the South's growth and pit Seoul against China in a race for control of the North. In addition, with the U.S. military and budget stretched by the Iraq war, one South Korean official says, "we don't envision U.S. taxpayers putting up billions to help us in this."

For the past five years, South Korea's government has made economic investments in the North and provided food aid to promote slow change in Pyongyang and eventual unification with it.

Under Mr. Roh, the fear of destabilizing the North has become so intense that South Korean government officials tamp many actions they think the Kim regime might view as provocative. Two weeks ago, Seoul asked a church group to stop sending missionary leaflets northward via balloons, citing an agreement made with the North in 2004 to halt propaganda.

Mr. Roh earlier this year offered to meet Mr. Kim anytime and anywhere, in hopes of broadening economic ties. The U.S. refuses to meet North Korea's leadership outside a broader arena such as the U.N. or the deadlocked six-nation talks, which, in addition to the U.S. and the two Koreas, involve China, Japan and Russia.

The danger in the U.S.-South Korea division over how to cope with the North is that the partners aren't preparing for the long-term problem of what to do when the Kim regime ends, says Michael Auslin, a professor of East Asian history at Yale University.

"The nuclear crisis is a symptom of a disease. The disease is Kim himself," Mr. Auslin says. Given that other countries have watched the situation for 50 years, he adds, it would show "gross negligence" on their part if Mr. Kim's regime collapsed tomorrow and they didn't have a strategy in place to deal with it.

At their Washington summit, however, Messrs. Bush and Roh are expected to focus mainly on matters on which the U.S. and South Korea are aligned, including the development of a free-trade agreement and plans to shift wartime control of their joint military command to a Korean general from a U.S. one, for the first time in half a century. That shift is likely to occur between 2009 and 2012.

Both issues are controversial in South Korea. Support for free trade divides along political lines, but opposition to Korean control of its military in wartime is broader, arousing fears that it is a step toward the withdrawal of U.S. troops.

U.S. military officials have tried to assure South Koreans that they stand by the country and its military. "There will be no change in the security of this peninsula caused by the transfer of that control," says Stephen Sargeant, a U.S. Air Force general who is deputy chief of staff of the combined forces in Korea.

S. Korea, U.S. To Revisit Alliance (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

Two allies who frequently talk past each other will talk directly this week when South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun meets with President Bush for a White House working visit tomorrow.

The summit comes amid delicate talks over the command of South Korean troops in wartime and a larger debate on both sides about the purpose and future of an alliance forged in a Cold War conflict that ended more than a half century ago.

"I still believe the fundamentals of the strategic alliance are strong, but there is an awful lot of bad noise surrounding our relationship with South Korea," said Michael Green, point man for Asian affairs at the National Security Council in Mr. Bush's first term who is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"It will take a good bit of management on our side to keep the relationship healthy," he said.

But the Roh government's policy of engaging North Korea contrasts with Washington's hardening line against Pyongyang over its nuclear programs. The North Korea issue -- and growing fears in Seoul that the U.S. wants to use South Korea to promote its own interests across the region -- have strained the alliance, said Adam Ward, executive director of the U.S. arm of the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS).

"There's no common understanding now of what the alliance is for," Mr. Ward said. "Washington and Seoul have very different assessments of what the major threats are in the region."

DOJ_NMG_0062319

The IISS global strategic survey, released last week, noted, "Where Americans see an increasingly dangerous and repressive evil regime [in North Korea], South Koreans see a pitiable renegade brother, estranged by an accident of history in which America was culpable."

Mr. Roh, a former labor organizer elected on a center-left platform in 2002, demonstrated the perception gap again last week, telling reporters on a European tour that Pyongyang's July 4 missile test -- condemned by the United States and Japan -- was more political theater than military threat.

"The missiles were too shabby to go to the U.S. and too big to go to South Korea," he said, according to a statement released by his office. "I believe the missiles were not for actual military attack but were launched for political purposes."

Mr. Roh's government has steadily increased aid to the North and has complained about U.S. criticisms of the North's human rights record.

Mr. Roh in January warned of potential bilateral friction with the United States over the North.

"The South Korean government does not agree with some forces in the United States that raise issues about North Korea's regime, put pressure on it and apparently desire to see its collapse," he said.

U.S. officials, in turn, have expressed frustration privately about the South's rapprochement with the North, which has continued even as the North boycotts multilateral talks organized by China about its nuclear missile programs.

Thomas Hubbard, ambassador to South Korea from 2001 to 2004, said he expected a "productive meeting" between Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh, but acknowledged, "We could do a better job managing the relationship."

"The central problem is that, just as Americans are coming to see North Korea as a greater threat, ... South Koreans, especially the younger generation, have come to see North Korea as less of a threat," he said.

Mr. Green said that despite often-noisy anti-American sentiment in the South, Seoul and Washington remain united on the need for the alliance to deter North Korea, to preserve the South's autonomy and to work for stability in northeastern Asia.

South Korea under Mr. Roh, he noted, has dispatched troops to Iraq, begun a politically sensitive reorganization of U.S. military bases and started negotiations -- ahead of Japan and China -- on a major free-trade agreement with the United States. Popular resentment of the United States has even fallen in recent polls, he said.

"The problem is that the Roh government is so invested in the policy of engaging with the North -- even when it plainly hasn't produced results -- that it can create a lot of sparks and disharmony," Mr. Green said.

But Mr. Ward said the South Korean mission in Iraq only underscored the growing strategic disconnect in the two capitals.

"The Americans see the South Korean deployment as the kind of role they think Seoul can play to help U.S. interests," he said. "The South Koreans see the mission as the price they have to pay to keep the U.S. side tied to the military alliance at home."

Many in South Korea, he added, are wary that the United States hopes to enlist Seoul in a long-term campaign to contain the growing economic and military clout of China. China recently surpassed the United States as Seoul's largest trading partner.

Although Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh lack the personal chemistry that Mr. Bush has had with Japanese leader Junichiro Koizumi, Mr. Green said the two leaders are "straight talkers" and have generally worked well together in past meetings.

South Korean officials said last week that the two leaders may discuss but are unlikely to resolve one of the more ticklish bilateral issues -- a push by Seoul to reclaim operational control in wartime of its own forces. Under agreements dating back to the Korean War, U.S. generals have been charged with the command of both U.S. and South Korean forces should hostilities break out.

Mr. Roh has strongly supported the command transfer as a way to bolster the South's sovereignty and control of its national defense. About 29,500 U.S. troops are stationed in the South.

South Korean and U.S. military officials are still negotiating a date for the transfer. Gen. B.B. Bell, the top U.S. military commander in South Korea, told reporters last week that he supported the transfer and said the U.S. commitment to the South's security would not be diminished by the shift.

But South Korean conservatives and former military and diplomatic officials have criticized the idea, saying it would send the wrong signal to Pyongyang and weaken the alliance.

IMF Warns Lingering Imbalances May Spur Volatile Fall In Dollar (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0062320

By Iain McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

SINGAPORE -- The risk of a disorderly decline in the U.S. dollar could increase unless policies are put in place to address global savings-and-investment imbalances, the International Monetary Fund said.

In its latest assessment of the global financial system, the IMF said financial-market corrections in May and June are a reminder for policy makers to strengthen economic policy and pursue needed structural changes.

Starting in May, and since the IMF's previous financial-stability report, prices of risky assets fell as investors turned risk averse amid concerns that rising oil and commodity prices would increase inflation and interest rates.

The IMF said emerging Asian countries should be more ambitious in increasing exchange-rate flexibility, the U.S. should consolidate its fiscal position and Europe and Japan should speed up structural changes.

Market consensus is for Asian currencies to appreciate in the medium term while non-Asian currencies weaken, the IMF said.

"The risk of a disorderly dollar adjustment could well increase without policies being put into place to foster the needed adjustments in saving and investment imbalances," it said.

The IMF's warning is the latest in a string of cautions by policy makers around the globe of the potential for significant financial-market volatility and asset-price slumps should the unwinding of global imbalances turn messy.

It noted that foreign holdings of U.S. assets continue to climb, rising to $6.3 trillion by June 2005 from $1.2 trillion in 1994.

The IMF's report comes ahead of annual meetings that it and the World Bank will hold in Singapore, starting Sunday. Ahead of those meetings, finance ministers and central bankers from the Group of Seven leading industrial countries will meet Saturday in Singapore.

Financial markets are particularly vulnerable to instability because many asset prices don't include any significant premium to reflect risks of a weaker global economic outlook and possible sharp moves in financial markets, it said.

Some emerging-market countries with large current-account deficits that rely heavily on foreign-capital inflows would be vulnerable to volatile market moves, it said.

In its report, the IMF found that contrary to popular belief, the scale of yen-carry trade -- a strategy to exploit low Japanese interest rates to earn higher returns elsewhere -- has been "moderate."

Many financial traders think that the trading strategy, in which people borrow yen cheaply and exchange it for other currencies to invest in more attractive assets overseas, has been very popular.

The IMF said "by most indications, the scale of the trade and subsequent unwinding has been moderate."

China-Tariff Discord Escalates (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

BRUSSELS -- The U.S., the European Union and Canada are set to file a joint complaint with the World Trade Organization against China's import tariffs on auto parts, said people familiar with the matter.

The complaint, which could be filed as soon as this week, marks the first time the Western allies have teamed up to seek a formal investigation by the global trade body in a dispute with the Asian giant.

In March the three governments filed a preliminary complaint against Chinese protection of its auto-parts manufacturers. In negotiations with the governments, China has refused to change its protectionist policy, which charges an average 25% levy on imported auto parts. That leaves formal complaint as a last recourse at the WTO for Washington, Brussels and Ottawa.

"We have long voiced our concern and disquiet with the Chinese on this issue," said European Commission spokesman Peter Power. The U.S. exported only about $540 million of auto parts to China last year, a market estimated at $19 billion. The EU says its auto-parts exports to China are valued at about €3 billion, or roughly $4 billion.

The complaint could result in punitive special tariffs being imposed on Beijing.

The Chinese delegation to the WTO in Geneva didn't immediately return calls seeking comment.

DOJ_NMG_0062321

The issue will likely be discussed at a regular WTO meeting on trade disputes scheduled for Sept. 28, the people familiar with the matter said. Complaints from WTO members need to be filed two weeks before the monthly gatherings.

China exempts companies with factories in China -- such as General Motors Corp., Volkswagen AG and DaimlerChrysler AG -- from paying the tariff only if they buy at least 40% of their parts from local producers.

In trade terms, such "local content" requirements violate free-trade rules China pledged to meet when it joined the WTO in 2001. The rule handicaps foreign auto-parts suppliers competing for a share of the four million autos made every year in China.

Auto makers say they have difficulty finding enough local providers who can meet their standards.

DaimlerChrysler, for instance, began making the Mercedes E-Class in Beijing in December. The auto maker says it would like to avoid the tariffs by using local suppliers. "We're still looking for local providers who meet our standards so we can get to 40%," said Trevor Hale, a spokesman for DaimlerChrysler in China.

General Motors said recently that it would stop production of its Buick Royaum model in China partly because importing parts had become too expensive.

Others worry that setting up in China to meet local-content requirements ultimately invites piracy. Finland's prime minister said at a EU-China business summit in Helsinki yesterday that European companies were afraid of investing in China for fear their "expensive and hard-won technology" would be copied.

The joint move follows the EU's adoption of a tougher line on Chinese imports. Last month, the European Commission asked EU members to approve tariffs of 16.5% on imports of certain types of leather shoes from China.

EU members are divided on that issue. Shoe-producing countries like Italy want the tariffs. They are opposed by governments like the U.K. and Ireland that are standing up for European retailers who book healthy profits on selling inexpensive Chinese goods.

Chinese exports to the EU had risen to €158 billion in 2005 from €74 billion in 2000, according to statistics agency Eurostat. Imports into China from the EU increased to €52 billion from €26 billion over the same period.

SHANGHAI -- Hunched over clattering machinery, the 170 workers at a factory here churn out gleaming pistons for auto engines by the crateful, driven by surging demand from abroad. To hear managers at Shanghai Datong Automotive Industrial Co. tell it, their success overseas is due to efficiency and rock-bottom costs. "Our technology is good, our wages are low and materials are abundant," said Jin Zhangfu, the plant's manufacturing supervisor.

But in the American heartland towns where auto parts makers are struggling to survive, an entirely different explanation -- China's cheap currency -- is proffered for the competitiveness of companies such as Shanghai Datong. Such complaints are expected to get high-level attention in coming days as the Bush administration's new Treasury secretary visits Asia.

Wes Smith, president of E&E Manufacturing Co. of Plymouth, Mich., a maker of fasteners and other auto components, blamed much of "the world of hurt" his company is suffering on Beijing's policy of keeping the value of the yuan tightly controlled at a level that, he said, gives Chinese manufacturers an unfair advantage.

"It's not that we're competing against the so-called dollar-a-day wage," Smith said. "It's that they subsidize their production with currency manipulation."

Criticism over China's currency policy has alternately flared and subsided for several years, but the problem is reaching a new and potentially explosive stage as the Chinese export juggernaut moves up the ladder from clothes, toys and televisions to goods such as auto parts.

The issue is to be debated this weekend at annual meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in Singapore, and again during Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.'s visit to China next week. Although some economists view the matter as overblown, others say the yuan's exchange rate is so far out of line as to constitute a dangerous distortion in global trade.

DOJ_NMG_0062322

At a hearing last month of a body created by Congress to study U.S.-Chinese issues, Brad Setser, director of global research at Roubini Global Economics LLC, said that China's exports, which were about $325 billion in 2002, are on pace to reach $950 billion this year, "an extraordinary increase" in a brief period. During that time, he added, the Chinese current account surplus, the broadest measure of the gap between exports and imports, has risen six-fold, to an estimated $220 billion in 2006, an amount equal to about 8 percent of China's total economic output.

That is simple but powerful substantiation that the yuan is grossly undervalued, in the view of Setser and other economists.

In 2002, the U.S. dollar began declining sharply against other major currencies including the euro, British pound, Japanese yen and Canadian and Australian dollars, but not the yuan, which the Chinese government kept rigidly pegged at 8.28 per dollar. Under pressure from the United States, China announced in July 2005 that it would raise the value of the yuan by about 2 percent and allow it to move more according to supply and demand. But Beijing's restrictions over money flowing in and out of the country have helped keep further appreciation to a minimum -- about another 2 percent, far less than the 20 to 40 percent that some analysts estimate is warranted.

Auto parts illustrate the phenomenon clearly.

China's rapidly growing auto industry used to depend heavily on imported components, but last year for the first time the country exported more auto parts than it bought from abroad. Sales to the U.S. market have leapt 39 percent, to $5.4 billion in 2005. Worldwide, China has set a goal of exporting $70 billion worth of parts by 2010--a seven-fold increase from last year's level. That is exacerbating the woes of a U.S. industry that is already struggling, as witnessed by Delphi Corp.'s Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing. And while labor costs explain much about why Chinese firms have penetrated such sectors as furniture, auto parts makers blame the currency as a decisive factor.

For example, Dura Automotive Systems Inc. of Rochester Hills, Mich., has manufacturing plants in 14 countries, including China. It sells parking-brake cables made in the United States for $4.50, on which it earns a profit of 35 cents. The sales price in the United States of comparable Chinese cables is $3.70, effectively less than the U.S. cost of production, said Larry Denton, Dura's chairman and chief executive.

"If I were to balance the currency at the appropriate level," Denton said, that is, by raising the yuan as much as the Australian dollar, British pound or euro have risen against the U.S. dollar in the past several years, "the Chinese sell price and the U.S. sell price would be nearly identical, at $4.50. We would compete in a level marketplace."

In a world where nearly all major countries have moved in recent decades to currencies that float from fixed exchange rates, China has kept a different system. Limiting capital inflows and outflows enabled China to keep the yuan steady and avoid the financial crises that struck its Asian neighbors in the late 1990s, a feat for which it earned international praise. The fixed-rate policy also helped tame inflation during the 1990s.

Now, however, a major factor behind Chinese policy is the fear that a rapid appreciation of the yuan would make exports less competitive, threatening jobs.

"Traditionally, China relies on exports for growth, and the government is very nervous about harming this," said He Fan, an economist at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences in Beijing. "There would be huge unemployment."

Those worries may be understandable, given that a big rise in joblessness could threaten China's stability, but they show that Beijing's currency regime amounts to a beggar-thy-neighbor policy, some economists assert.

By allowing China to underprice its goods, the situation "enables them to export some of their unemployment to the rest of the world and take huge advantage of the currency misalignment," said C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Institute for International Economics in Washington.

The result, aside from the impact on companies and jobs in the United States, is a widening of the vast trade imbalances that could eventually lead to turmoil in the global economy, according to Bergsten and other economists.

The U.S. deficit with China accounted for more than a quarter of the $716 billion U.S. trade gap last year. That is why China's currency policy will be on the agenda at the IMF-World Bank meeting in Singapore. Top policymakers will discuss ways to shrink such imbalances for fear that foreign investors may become spooked by the burgeoning U.S. deficit and dump their holdings of U.S. stocks and bonds. The issue will also be center stage when Paulson meets with Chinese leaders in his first trip to Beijing as Treasury chief.

"We're going to ramp up and intensify our interaction with them," said Timothy D. Adams, the Treasury undersecretary for international affairs, citing Paulson's extensive experience in China when he headed the investment banking firm Goldman Sachs.

China needs to do a lot more than just allow the yuan to appreciate, Adams emphasized. Paulson's trip will also stress the need for Beijing to shift away from exports toward greater consumer spending. But Congress is pressing for action on the currency, with lawmakers threatening punitive tariffs on Chinese goods.

Some economists consider such demands misplaced. Ronald I. McKinnon, a professor of international economics at Stanford University, said that most Chinese products sold abroad are consumer goods assembled in China using components from Japan, South Korea, Taiwan and Thailand, among other places.

"China is merely the face of a worldwide export surge into American consumer markets," McKinnon argued in a paper published in July with a colleague, noting that at Christmas, when "American families open their presents, they see mainly made-in-China labels!"

According to McKinnon, a substantial rise in the yuan would lead to a fall in China's exports but would damage the Chinese economy so severely that the nation's demand for foreign goods would plunge as well, the result being no net shrinkage in the trade imbalance. That, McKinnon points out, is what happened with Japan in the last decade when it bowed to U.S. insistence on a rise in the value of the Japanese yen.

In recent months, a new issue has dominated the debate -- the risk that China's economy has overheated. Policymakers in Beijing are concerned that a boom in such fast-growing sectors as autos and real estate is leading to construction of more factories and office parks than China can use. The upshot could be a bust that would wreck the banking system.

Some economists assert that a higher yuan is precisely the right medicine. According to this theory, that would slow exports, limiting the buildup of China's foreign reserves and slowing the flow of funds into banks whose lending is fueling investment.

The Beijing government remains divided over how quickly to move, with the central bank urging a faster appreciation to prevent overheating and other ministries lobbying for little change.

Chinese exporters are vocal in opposing a rise in the currency. At the Shanghai Datong plant, Jin, the manufacturing supervisor, was asked recently what would happen if the yuan were to rise by 10 percent or so. He looked pained. "We couldn't afford that," he said.

Analysts say China's powerful State Council is striving to maintain a middle position, the most likely outcome being a rise in the yuan of perhaps 3 to 5 percent a year over the next two years.

"The consequences are so great that ultimately nobody can make a decision," said Mao Yushi, chairman of the Unirule Institute of Economics in Beijing. "Everyone knows the [yuan] must appreciate now, but no one has the courage to make it happen."

China's Echo Chamber (NYT)

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

China has long prided itself on its ability to master capitalism without indulging in the messy business of democracy. So Beijing got a twofer this week when it gave the state-run Xinhua news agency monopoly control over the lucrative financial news business and the power to administer broad censorship rules for all foreign news entering China.

Xinhua even got to announce the news of the new regulations. Not surprisingly, it didn't quote any critics.

Foreign agencies have long been barred from selling general news directly to the Chinese media. Some foreign companies have been quietly testing the limits as the number of Chinese media outlets has grown and Chinese editors have become more daring. Xinhua sent a clear warning to all sides, listing 10 categories of news covering politics, religion and national unity — code for Taiwan —that could not be released into China.

For the last decade financial news providers received better treatment and were allowed to sell their less politically sensitive information directly to banks and brokers. Now, under the new rules, they will have to distribute their wares through a designated agent of Xinhua — a fine way to get Xinhua, which is eager to sell its own financial news, a guaranteed cut of that multimillion-dollar action.

All of this comes at a time when honest journalism is increasingly under attack. Last month, a Chinese court sentenced Zhao Yan, a New York Times researcher and journalist, to three years in prison on a specious fraud charge. Soon after, another court sentenced Ching Cheong, a reporter for The Straits Times newspaper of Singapore, to five years in prison on trumped-up espionage charges.

Media organizations and governments, including the Bush administration, are right to protest these abuses as loudly and as often as they can. But the painful reality is that China's autocrats aren't usually moved by appeals to their better nature — or for that matter warnings that keeping such a tight lid on a society undergoing rapid changes could eventually explode in their faces.

What they do understand is how rich they've gotten since joining the World Trade Organization. These new rules appear, at a minimum, to violate their W.T.O. pledges to liberalize access to financial information. Trade officials and foreign business leaders need to remind Beijing's leaders of those promises. And they need to warn them that a country that keeps a stranglehold on information is not a great place to invest.

Blind Injustice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

BEIJING -- Chen Guangcheng, a blind advocate for the rights of Chinese villagers, recently made headlines around the world when he was sentenced to four years and three months in prison. But, as his chosen lawyers, we were prevented from presenting a fair defense by obstacles erected by Chinese authorities. A local court imposed unacceptable terms on us defending our client at his Aug. 18 trial. Before the trial, we had been detained by police, intimidated, and one lawyer was not freed until the trial was over. Except for Mr. Chen's three brothers, no other members of the public -- not even his wife and mother -- were allowed to attend the two-hour hearing.

That's why we are using these columns to outline the defense that was never presented in court, and explain how our client was convicted of crimes he did not commit. In those closed-door proceedings, Chinese officials punished Mr. Chen for exposing their own criminal activities -- forcing villagers to undergo sterilizations and forced abortions, even though these are officially illegal under Chinese law.

Had we not been barred from the courtroom, we would have argued that the trial was unlawful. The two government-appointed lawyers, whom Mr. Chen refused to accept, had never met him before the trial nor read any of the files on his case. They did not offer any defense during the hearing, but merely repeated everything the prosecutors said.

The pretrial process also violated Chinese law and infringed basic human-rights principles. A self-taught lawyer, Mr. Chen has long helped the disabled and peasants fight illegal taxes and environmental pollution. In June 2005, he filed a class-action lawsuit accusing local officials in Yinan County, in northeastern Shandong province, of forcing peasants to undergo abortions or sterilizations in order to meet birth-control quotas. Two months later, Yinan officials placed Mr. Chen under house arrest. Then in March this year he was taken away by police. When we were finally allowed to meet Mr. Chen in June, he told us that police had verbally abused him, threatened his life, and once deprived him of sleep for three days.

Ever since the first of us took on Mr. Chen's case in September last year, we have been pressured by local authorities to drop it. When we refused to do so, we were beaten and intercepted by government officials as we tried to carry out investigations and collect evidence.

Both of the charges on which Mr. Chen was convicted are groundless. The first, "intentional destruction of property," is based on a clash on Feb. 15 this year between villagers and police, who had beaten another villager protesting Mr. Chen's illegal house arrest. But it was local officials, rather than Mr. Chen, who were responsible for inciting this incident by carrying out that beating. People we interviewed said the villagers did no more than push police vehicles into a roadside ditch, and that they only acted in this way because police refused to take the victim's grandmother to hospital after she passed out upon hearing of the beating.

As for the second charge of "gathering crowds to obstruct traffic," once again it was the police, not Mr. Chen, who were responsible for this. On March 11, guards used by the local authorities to enforce the house arrest beat up another villager trying to meet Mr. Chen. Angry villagers then clashed with the guards and succeeded in getting Mr. Chen out of his house so that he could accompany them to the local government offices to protest. As they tried to get rides into town, police and guards surrounded them and temporarily stopped traffic until they could wrestle Mr. Chen and two other villagers into police cars and take them into custody.

The prosecutors introduced testimony from other detained villagers, accusing Mr. Chen of inciting property destruction. But lawyers representing these villagers were similarly never allowed to meet with them. Nor were they allowed to cross-examine these "witnesses." Family members of these villagers, who were detained for supporting Mr. Chen, said that they were mistreated in jail and forced to testify against Mr. Chen.

The real criminal suspects in this case are the officials responsible for obstructing justice and undermining the country's legal reform. These local officials could hardly have acted with such contempt and disregard for the law unless they had been given the green light by authorities higher up in the government. Nonetheless, in appealing Mr. Chen's case to a higher court, we will act on the assumption that the country's legal system can, without official interference, deliver a fair verdict and remedy wrongs. This may prove to be too optimistic. But we can only find out by fighting for justice, case by case, one client at a time.

Blair Gets Hostile Goodbye From Unions (AP)

By Beth Gardiner

AP, September 12, 2006

Tony Blair received a tense farewell Tuesday in his last address as prime minister to the annual gathering of Britain's labor unions, with more than a dozen activists walking out as he began speaking to protest his pro-business stance and aggressive foreign policy.

Many others booed and hissed as he mentioned controversial topics such as Iraq. Blair snapped back at some of the hecklers and joked with others, frequently referring to his fraught history with the unions, traditionally an important part of his governing Labour Party's base but now disgruntled by its centrism.

Blair, who gave in to a party revolt last week and announced he would resign within a year without setting a precise departure date, ended with a spirited defense of his accomplishments.

"For those of you who think you'll ever get a government where everything is fine, you won't," he said, after boasting of reduced unemployment, improved public services and greater aid to the poor and elderly. "But what does happen is progress if we have the courage and determination to remain in government."

He was heckled repeatedly during his 30-minute speech on economic globalization and grilled on employment issues during a combative question-and-answer session afterward.

"It was a very uncomfortable afternoon," said Val Hiscock, attending the conference as a representative of cleaning and catering companies. "I hoped he would go out with all guns blazing. ... What you felt most at the end was a sense of relief that he didn't have to do it again."

Blair acknowledged as much when he said last week that this year's speech to the Trades Union Congress would be his last to the group, "probably to the relief of both of us."

His relationship with unions has been tense throughout his nine years in office. They vehemently oppose his efforts to bring the private sector into public services such as health care and education, and many left-leaning members are also furious over the Iraq war.

About 20 demonstrators stood at the start of the speech holding placards that said "Go Now!" Others booed as Blair was introduced and more than a dozen walked out — followed by TV cameras — as he began.

The prime minister jokingly thanked the delegates "for that fine introduction — more or less."

DOJ_NMG_0062326

Some of the roughly 1,000 who remained in the hall shouted and heckled when Blair mentioned Iraq, Afghanistan, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and his overhaul of Britain's public services, all issues on which he has angered many Labour Party stalwarts.

"You can hold up your posters about troops out, but the reason troops are in is because the democratic governments of Afghanistan and Iraq need our troops," he retorted. "You can disagree, but just listen to the argument."

Bob Crow, general secretary of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers and one of those who walked out of the speech, said Blair "has killed thousands of servicemen. ... As far as we are concerned we are not going to be party to something like that."

Blair's likely successor, Treasury chief Gordon Brown, praised the prime minister's speech and criticized the protesters. Seeking to demonstrate unity at the top of the Labour Party after last week's rebellion, which some accused him of fomenting, he made clear he supported the part-privatizations.

"I urge all trade unionists to support the reform agenda set out by Tony Blair," he said ahead of a private speech to union officials scheduled for later Tuesday.

Some union activists could flee to the third-largest party, the Liberal Democrats. They are unlikely to support the resurgent Tories, which despite their recent move to the revamp the party's policies, are still considered too pro-business for most left-leaning union members.

On Monday, Blair returned from Lebanon, where a protester briefly interrupted a briefing he was giving and accused him of complicity in the recent Israeli bombardment of the country.

Blair Gets Rough Ride In Farewell To TUC (FT)

By Christopher Adams And Andrew Taylor

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Tony Blair failed on Tuesday to win over his critics in the trade union movement, some of whom accused him of lacking a strategic vision and urged him to quit immediately.

As Gordon Brown was preparing to address union bosses in a private dinner in Brighton, Mr Blair was being jeered at times during his final Trades Union Congress.

Mr Brown was expected to stand with Mr Blair over health service reforms.

A walkout by the RMT transport union, and conference floor protests over the Iraq war and public services reforms peppered what Mr Blair had hoped would be a valedictory performance.

In a speech, the prime minister warned of the need to meet the challenges posed by globalisation, terrorism and migration. He defended Britain's involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He also hinted at a tougher policy on labour market access for workers from Romania and Bulgaria, which are due to join the European Union next year.

Mr Brown was expected to reinforce Mr Blair's message on globalisation and stress his goal of making Britain's the world's most skilled and educated workforce.

The chancellor is expected on Wednesay to launch a scheme providing on-the-job training for low-skilled employees in return for employers granting them time off.

Amid barracking from sections of the audience, some of whom stood up and waved banners saying "Blair Out", "Go Now" and "Troops Out", Mr Blair came close to losing his cool.

He said angrily: "We should be proud of what we are doing to support democrats in Iraq and are proud of it." The "brutal truth" was that government was a "hard and difficult business" but that it was also better than being in opposition.

Tony Woodley, general secretary of the Transport and General Workers Union, said it had been a sad performance from a leader who lacked a strategic vision.

Dave Prentis, Unison leader, said Mr Blair's foreign policy and public sector reforms had tarnished his record.

Paul Kenny, GMB general secretary, said: "He was a great showman but left the TUC without any nominations for the Oscars."

DOJ_NMG_0062327

However, other union bosses were supportive. The prime minister has angered some in the union movement over reforms that have made more use of private companies in public services and the National Health Service in particular. The unions believe the changes amount to “creeping privatisation” and say they will lead to job losses and hospital closures.

The chancellor was expected to back Mr Blair on the NHS. “I urge all to support Tony Blair in what he said about our reforms in health,” he was due to say. The chancellor condemned those who walked out.

What Really Happened In Britain Last Week? (WSJ)

By Peter Stothard

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

LONDON -- American friends of Tony Blair -- those many millions of them -- may be surprised to learn that their best foreign ally is being poked and prodded from office like an unwanted dog. Margaret Thatcher's friends in Washington were no less shocked 16 years ago when she too was kicked unkindly from her Downing Street kennel. This is not necessarily cause for pity or alarm. It's just the way we do things here.

Who will succeed President Bush's eloquent and loyal Mr. Blair? The champion of the prodders and pokers and chief premier-in-waiting is the man who has been in charge of the British economy for the past 10 years, Gordon Brown. He also has many American admirers. They may not sit so thickly in the nation's living rooms but in business places he has long been the only bet. The dark-browed economic intellectual, the man who takes the Federalist Papers on his Cape Cod summers, has long been destined as next British prime minister. Whether in New Labour's popularity years as the New Jerusalem, or in its unpopularity years as a Bushville suburb, no other candidate needed to apply. The few who did feel the need felt a spiked collar around their presumptuous necks.

Even after a week in a London of where's-the-blood-bank brutality -- crude and public even by British transition standards -- the Brown succession is still the best wisdom on offer. A biting fight between the chancellor of the exchequer and his "Blairite" rivals, one which the top dog might perhaps even lose, is a fine prospect for those in politics and journalism who are bored with "on-message" discipline. Seven days of "blackmail," "autistic character" and "stupidity" charges against Mr. Brown have been a treat. "Mendacious," "legacy-obsessed" and "monomaniac" are words which many have long wanted to shout at Mr. Blair. The outcome of the coming contest is only, however, a very little less certain than it was before. For reasons of party rules and loyalties purchased and paid for long ago, Mr. Brown is still the firmest favorite. The dogs of Westminster scrap because they enjoy scrapping and too rarely get the chance, not just because they might genuinely change the neighborhood.

When will George Bush be dealing with his second British prime minister? The answer is within 12 months at the most, well before the end of the full third term that Labour promised the voters last year. Yesterday, Mr. Blair gave his last leader's speech to Britain's annual Trades Union Congress. That "last TUC" commitment was the one that the prime minister gave outside a London school last week, against his will, through gritted teeth and with the chancellor's scrappers waiting behind the trashcans in case he bottled out. But he gave it. And the deadline might yet be sooner, 12 weeks or even, as it seemed to the feverish last week, 12 days -- before the president's trusted friend falls victim to time and Iraq?

President Bush could be forgiven for wanting those fullest 12 months from Prime Minister Blair. Such loyalty will not come again. The White House has had much to be thankful for in the unprecedented TB-GB power-sharing deal, agreed back in 1994 when Mr. Brown, to his eternal regret, was persuaded not to stand for the leadership against his junior but more electorally attractive colleague. Because the chancellor then demanded and won such total ascendancy over the British domestic agenda, Tony Blair was lured (forced, even) ever more to the challenges of foreign affairs. Mr. Blair, a natural idealist, as rhetorical and risk-taking as the chancellor is pragmatic, laconic and cautious, was allowed an unusual freedom to follow those fundamental instincts, which he shared with the president, towards terrorism and Iraq.

Gordon Brown's speeches, had he held the top job in 2003 as he once thought he had been promised, would never have expressed the Bush doctrine with the passion that Mr. Blair deployed. Nor would Mr. Blair have dared so much without Gordon Brown. A future Prime Minister Brown would be no less supportive of basic American values than Mr. Blair. But he would run the government in a more traditional way, more trammeled by the political and administrative machine around him. He has his own passions: economic stability, the practical lessons of history and finding the means to relieve poverty in Britain and in Africa. He is as confident as Mr. Blair about what the levers of power can achieve but less trusting in the force of ideas.

Labour's leadership election will be an opportunity for every form of anti-American abuse. Yesterday, the new Conservative leader, David Cameron, called the administration "unrealistic and simplistic" and attacked the "slavish" bond between Messrs. Bush and Blair. The Labour leadership electorate will never be outdone by the Tories in a college formed of parliamentarians, trade unionists and local members, where hostility to Mr. Bush, the Iraq war and the Israeli action in Lebanon are the most powerful forces. The extreme left will mount a challenge. So will Mr. Blair's other would-be heirs, those who have always disliked the chancellor's character, those who have felt excluded by the clannishness of a Scot, those who think the English electorate may agree with them, those who distrust Mr. Brown's more redistributive Old Labour economic instincts and others who just want a scrap.

There is no chance now of the "orderly transition" that was the official hope for so long. If Mr. Blair is bundled out fast, his allies, who had been planning a nationwide Farewell-to-Tony triumph, will be as bitter against Mr. Brown as Margaret Thatcher and her friends once were against Prime Minister John Major. If there is a long goodbye, the Blairites might be happier. But many long suppressed Labour poisons will still come to the surface during the campaign.

Those who like to see rationalism in politics -- and that includes most of the thinkers who support Labour -- are amazed that this has been allowed to happen. Fights on policy between prime ministers and chancellors are nothing new: one such brought down Lady Thatcher. But this fight seemed to be about a mere few months on the Downing Street calendar, spurred suddenly by an ill-judged refusal by Tony Blair in a newspaper interview to set any fixed point for his departure. That failure to sense the mood on his street (a common failing of a top dog isolated too long) turned quickly into meetings at which Gordon Brown demanded ("blackmailed" as Mr. Blair's representative was authorized to put it) that the prime minister set a date by which he would be gone. Resignation letters from Mr. Brown's junior allies, with the threat of more to follow, forced Mr. Blair to the 12 months promise. Mr. Brown also wanted Mr. Blair to back his candidacy and to call off his own attack hounds, both demands which Mr. Blair has so far withstood.

Was this all as irrational as it looked? What really happened in Britain last week? Did Mr. Brown lose control of his allies? Did he get suddenly more frightened of Mr. Cameron, who is reciting directly and successfully from the New Labour playbook of the 1990s? The answer is simpler. This change at the top could never be smooth. There was always going to be a big fight in this back alley. The TB-GB traumas are too old and deep. It may surprise Mr. Blair's American admirers to know that their man is not seen as honest and true to his neighbors as he is to his faraway friends. Mr. Brown's admirers have also got a good deal more to learn.

Mr. Stothard is editor of the Times Literary Supplement.

Britain Without Blair (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

Tony Blair remains the Prime Minister of Britain. But last week's Labour Party rebellion that forced him to promise, against his will, to leave by next summer has turned the party's most successful postwar leader into a very lame duck. A remarkable era in European politics and British-U.S. relations is coming to a close.

Mr. Blair's old-style socialist party was supposed to have been remade during his near decade in power. Like the Tories under Margaret Thatcher in the 1980s, Labour put up with a self-declared outsider and his reform agenda so long as the leader delivered at the ballot box. Three times in a row, Mr. Blair did. But Old Labour remained ill at ease with Mr. Blair, and especially with his assertive foreign policy and alliance with Washington. With his poll numbers down, Mr. Blair's party has turned on him.

The presumptive heir, Gordon Brown, is Mr. Blair's partner in the "New Labour" project, suggesting some continuity until next elections are due by 2010. For the past nine years, the sourish Scot has capably steered the economy while waiting his turn with evident impatience. He is a hard man to read. At home, he tends to see a larger role for the state and sounds less messianic about overhauling the public health and pension systems. Yet he's also staunchly pro-business and admiring of America.

A bigger break with Blairism may be felt abroad. Though he has never outlined his views on Iraq or terrorism, Mr. Brown will not bring the same passion and moral suasion as Mr. Blair did to his foreign policy. The Prime Minister sent British troops to end civil wars in Sierra Leone and Kosovo and tried to hold Saddam Hussein to his U.N. commitments. And that was all when Bill Clinton lived in the White House.

Since September 11, Mr. Blair has recognized and eloquently explained that Islamic terrorism posed the gravest threat to free society today. He joined forces with a U.S. leader who shared his view of the threat, and stuck by his decisions despite the opinion polls. The easy, "poodlish" thing would have been to distance himself from Washington, but he has held to his admirable convictions.

The mood in the opposition Tory camp also tends toward disengagement from the war on terror and the transatlantic alliance. Exhibit A came this Monday when the recently elected, young leader of the Conservative Party used the fifth anniversary of 9/11 to make his first major address on foreign policy.

We won't soon forget David Cameron's debutante performance. The 39-year-old Tory leader claimed Britain and the U.S. had become "uncritical allies" and needed "a rebalanced special relationship." In a line that must play well with London focus groups, he said: "We should be solid but not slavish in our friendship with America." Though his party backed the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, Mr. Cameron vouchsafed that they now show that democracy "cannot quickly [be] imposed from the outside." Thanks for the Monday-morning generalship.

On the day marking the worst terrorist atrocity in history, he even chided the U.S. for "stoop[ing] to illiberalism" by running a prison in Guantanamo, where the men who planned 9/11 were just transferred and where no human rights abuses have been found. This Tory wants a "a new emphasis on multilateralism" where the U.N. "confers the ultimate legitimacy." If these are the new Tories, we'll take the French. (As it happens, French presidential candidate Nicolas Sarkozy marked 9/11 in New York by saying, "Yes, I love the Americans.")

Under Mr. Cameron, a former PR executive, the Tories are back in the game and atop polls in Britain. Yet he is offering distinctly un-Tory ideas such as environmentalism. The suspicion in many quarters is that he lacks any conviction beyond electoral success -- an impression brought home by the contrast with Lady Thatcher who, ailing and 80 years old, made a rare public appearance in Washington for Monday's commemorations.

In a statement, she urged Britain and the U.S. to stand firm against "Islamist fanatics who hate our beliefs, our liberties and our citizens. We must not falter. We must not fail. . . . We also need to renew our resolve that, however bitter or lengthy the struggle, this evil shall not prevail."

Though she spoke earlier in the day than Mr. Cameron, Lady Thatcher's remarks were interpreted as a rebuke to the new Tories. So much the better if they were. It is equally remarkable that her comments echoed so well Mr. Blair's views. For in reality, this Prime Minister is her worthy heir. His Labour party could never forgive him for that. History will be kinder.

Gates, Rockefeller Charities Join To Fight African Hunger (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

The Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the world's richest charity, joined with the Rockefeller Foundation yesterday to launch a new development initiative for sub-Saharan Africa that they said would revolutionize food production and reduce hunger and poverty for tens of millions of people.

Modeled on the Rockefeller-pioneered "green revolution" that transformed farming methods and staved off widespread famine in much of the developing world nearly a half-century ago, the initiative coincides with a new round of Western concern about the long-intractable problems of the poorest continent.

Home to 16 of the 18 most undernourished countries, Africa is the only part of the world where food production has decreased in recent years. At the same time, political upheaval and conflict there are seen as providing fertile ground for extremists. Widespread famine in Africa has spurred high-profile relief efforts over the years, from United Nations programs to celebrity fundraising concerts such as Live Aid in the 1980s and Live 8 last year.

Sponsors of the new "Alliance for a Green Revolution" said yesterday they are looking for a more systematic, long-term solution to African hunger.

The alliance is the first Gates venture into poverty and development after years of focusing largely on global health and education. The effort follows a doubling of the foundation's $30 billion endowment, drawn largely from Bill Gates's Microsoft Corp. fortune, with investment guru Warren Buffett donating an additional $31 billion earlier this year. Gates has said he will step down from direct management of Microsoft in 2008 to work full time on foundation activities.

"We've been looking into the causes of extreme poverty and how we might make a contribution to reducing that," Gates said during a conference call with journalists yesterday. "If we can work on health and poverty issues concurrently, there is a lot that can be done to improve the quality of life. . . . Today no country of any size has been able to sustain a transition out of poverty without substantially raising productivity in the agricultural sector. It can have a transformative impact."

Melinda Gates, who serves on the board of The Washington Post Co. along with Buffett, said she and her husband studied development problems over the past three years before deciding to move beyond their health initiatives.

The Africa program will begin with a relatively small Gates contribution of $100 million over five years, plus $50 million from Rockefeller, to fund development of more robust disease- and drought-resistant seeds for primary African foodstuffs, enhanced distribution networks for seed and fertilizer, and university-level training for African crop scientists.

The new partners are still exploring how to make sure their initial steps do not overwhelm the continent's capacity to absorb assistance, Rockefeller President Judith Rodin said. Although future investments are likely to "scale up significantly," she said, "all of us intend to be mindful of really measuring outcomes and learning as we go and then providing the necessary resources."

Nancy Birdsall, president of the Washington-based Center for Global Development, said the mere fact that the world's biggest philanthropist is joining with the preeminent foundation working in agricultural development is "going to make a difference," adding: "It's a real shot in the arm."

Bill Gates agreed that the initial investment pales when compared with his contributions to the development of an AIDS vaccine. But he said that he expects the program to continue for decades.

"The first green revolution took a long time," said Gates program manager Roy Steiner. "It started in the 1940s with investment and made an impact in the 1960s. That takes committed partners that are going to be there for the long term and are willing to focus on what's going to help small-scale farmers" who produce most of Africa's food.

Program planners readily acknowledged that Africa's problems today far outstrip even those confronting Asia in the 1960s, including a lack of roads and irrigation, primary food crops that vary widely from region to region, degraded soil, unstable governments and tenuous security. The Rockefeller Foundation, which started shifting the bulk of its development funding from Asia and Latin America to Africa several years ago, recently shut down its program in Zimbabwe because of political strife there.

Although the Gates/Rockefeller program will be available throughout Africa, Rodin said, the partners are still studying which 10 to 20 countries to select for initial funding.

Following the pattern of its health initiatives, Gates will provide money and results-based expertise, building on existing seed development programs begun by Rockefeller and African agencies, such as a new strain of rice produced in West Africa that promises to increase yields fivefold. A concurrent goal is the expansion of seed and fertilizer distribution networks through small entrepreneurs in rural areas. Both partners hope to prime the pump for participation by both African and donor governments.

The Bush administration has increased U.S. aid to Africa significantly over the past five years, though much of it consists of food shipments and military assistance. This year's G-8 conference of the world's wealthiest nations brought agreement to cancel much of Africa's debt, but pledges to double development aid were acknowledged to be largely symbolic.

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Pressures GOP On Detainees (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

The Associated Press, September 12, 2006

President Bush dispatched the vice president and top aides to the Capitol on Tuesday to try to break an election-season deadlock with Republicans over the surveillance and prosecution of terrorism suspects.

But officials met stiff resistance from senators and House leaders who say they refuse to give the White House a blank check over the war on terror. The standoff raised questions about whether the president could unite Republicans on his anti-terror agenda before November's midterm elections.

Vice President Dick Cheney and White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten appealed to Senate Republicans during their weekly policy lunch to pass legislation that would let Bush begin prosecuting terror suspects. The legislation also would limit the circumstances under which a government interrogator could be prosecuted for mistreating a detainee.

Also meeting with lawmakers this week on detainee treatment was CIA Director Michael Hayden.

The administration is also pressing separate legislation that would let it track terrorists by electronic surveillance.

Several versions of that legislation are expected to advance through the Senate and House Judiciary Committees this week. They would give legal status to the controversial surveillance program, as well as impose new rules and congressional oversight.

Bush's surveillance plan faces a difficult fight in Congress, especially in the House, where GOP leaders favor a different approach.

That measure, sponsored by Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., and endorsed by the GOP chairmen of the Judiciary and Intelligence committees, would require the administration to wait until a terrorist attack to open an electronic surveillance program.

The White House has conditionally endorsed one bill, by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., as long as it's passed unchanged — not a sure thing given amendments that await it on the floor as soon as next week.

Specter's bill would submit the existing electronic surveillance program to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court for a one-time constitutional review and expand the time for emergency warrants from three to seven days.

On the effort to craft a new way for military trials of terror detainees, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he supports the administration's efforts and could call for a vote on it — or a competing bill favored by some GOP senators — at any time.

The alternative bill was drafted by Sens. John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham, members of the Armed Services Committee. They say their measure would improve the credibility of a court system to prosecute detainees and prevent abusive treatment that would violate the Geneva Conventions.

Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said Tuesday the group remains locked in negotiations with other Republicans.

Graham said he expects the final legislation will allow a defendant to access all evidence used against them — a provision staunchly opposed by the White House and House and Senate leadership because it could reveal classified information.

DOJ_NMG_0062335

Graham said steps can be taken to prevent unnecessary exposure of protected information, but ultimately a fair trial must allow defendants the ability to confront evidence used against them.

"I think we've made a pretty good case that giving something to a jury to convict a defendant (with hidden evidence) is a nonstarter," Graham added.

Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said they agree all evidence should be shared with a defendant.

Graham and others said the biggest sticking points left on the bill were on the circumstances under which an interrogator could be prosecuted for mistreating detainees.

The administration would forbid what critics call a bare bones list of violations — such as torture, murder and rape — under the 1996 War Crimes Act that potentially leaves open the door for harsher interrogation methods. Warner, Graham and McCain are pushing more precise definitions, as well as a ban on coerced testimony, to ensure tough interrogations do not lead to abuse or violate the Geneva Conventions.

These definitions of war crimes have "shown to be the toughest part" of negotiations with the White House because it must be done "in a way that would adhere to your values but would not put your troops at risk for trivial violations," Graham said.

Cheney, Senators Discuss Detainees (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Vice President Cheney urged Republican senators yesterday not to be too restrictive in setting legal limits on CIA interrogations of enemy combatants, the largest remaining barrier to an agreement between Congress and the White House on legislation that would also set new rules for special military trials for terrorist suspects.

Cheney and White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten met for an hour with GOP senators in hopes of narrowing their differences over proposed legislation governing the treatment, questioning and prosecution of suspected terrorists and enemy combatants, such as those held at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Afterward, key senators said they had made progress on several fronts, including the use of secret information against defendants and guidelines for handling allegedly coerced statements. The biggest sticking point, they said, was how narrowly to define practices that might subject CIA interrogators or others to charges of committing war crimes.

That "is still the area we are farthest apart on," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told reporters.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) said he and others are pressing the administration to accept a list of practices that would be considered illegal, bringing greater specificity to current language that bars "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions, the treaties that govern the treatment of prisoners of war.

"We are going to define, in the war crimes section [of the U.S. Code], what a grave breach would be, just like any other criminal statute," said Graham, a former military lawyer.

He declined to detail the proposals but said he is "optimistic" an agreement can be reached.

Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions prohibits "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment" of detainees. The Bush administration had maintained that those protections did not apply to prisoners captured in the U.S. counterterrorism campaign, but allies and human rights groups had criticized some U.S. interrogation practices, including simulated drowning.

In June, the Supreme Court ruled that the administration must abide by the Geneva Conventions in treatment of those prisoners and declared illegal its plan to try them before military "commissions." The White House responded by submitting new proposals to Congress that are now being negotiated with key Republicans.

The talks concern both the rules for trials of the detainees and language submitted by the administration that would, in effect, set the rules for CIA interrogations of future detainees.

President Bush has urged lawmakers to give the executive branch substantial leeway in interrogating and trying detainees. But GOP senators including McCain, Graham and John W. Warner (Va.) have resisted on several fronts. They balked, for instance, at a White House bid to allow the use of classified information that is not shared with defendants.

Graham said yesterday that negotiators are nearing an agreement that would allow the defendant to know the essence of the allegations against him, but not the person or techniques that produced them.

"I'm trying to protect the prosecution from having to disclose sources and methods that will come from defense requests that are basically overreaching," Graham told reporters.

Similarly, he said, senators and the White House may reach an agreement on how to handle allegedly coerced statements. The proposal would allow only those statements that a military judge decides were made voluntarily.

DOJ_NMG_0062336

Under U.S. law, war crimes include "a grave breach" of the Geneva Conventions. The conventions describe grave breaches as "willful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments, willfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health . . . or willfully depriving a prisoner of war of the rights of fair and regular trial prescribed in this Convention."

Administration officials and others have said the language is so vague that it could unfairly subject government interrogators to charges of criminality. Graham said he has proposed taking the Geneva Conventions' list of grave breaches, adding "a few more," and directing that interrogation programs be built around the guidelines. He declined to say what the additions might be.

Congress should define the U.S. War Crimes Act of 1996, Graham said, "in a way consistent with our treaty obligations, which would make 'grave breaches' a crime." Under this scenario, he said, interrogators would know they could not engage in "serious criminal physical misconduct, inhumane treatment of a serious nature."

White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said: "We're having an ongoing conversation with the Congress on all of the issues, and we're committed to reaching a resolution so that they can take the next legislative step."

Deal Reported Near On Rights Of Suspects In Terror Cases (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — The leading Senate Republicans negotiating over proposed legislation to bring terror suspects to trial said Tuesday that they were close to a compromise on a main dispute with the White House: whether suspects had the right to see all the evidence used against them.

But the Senate Republicans warned that they would not go along with a White House proposal to redefine the provision of the Geneva Conventions that broadly guarantees humane treatment of detainees.

That provision, known as Common Article 3, prohibits “violence to life and person” and “outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment.”

The Supreme Court, in striking down military tribunals that the White House established after the Sept. 11 attacks, said the guarantee had to apply to terror suspects.

The administration has proposed narrowing the provision, arguing that it is too vague and does not give interrogators enough guidance in how to treat detainees. Under the War Crimes Act, interrogators who violate the article can face the death penalty.

Senator John McCain of Arizona said he and two other Republican senators crucial to the discussions, John W. Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, would not agree to any narrowing of the provision.

Mr. McCain said such a move could send a message about the nation’s support for human rights and the precedent it might set for special forces captured by other countries.

“On the detainee-treatment issue,” he said, “Senator Warner and I and Senator Graham and others are not going to agree to changes in the definitions in Common Article 3, because that then sends the message to the world that we are not going to adhere fully to the Geneva Conventions. And we worry about, in the future, other nations maybe deciding to interpret Common Article 3 to their own purposes.”

Mr. McCain is influential on detainee questions because of his years as a Vietnam prisoner of war. The three senators made their appeal for their approach at the weekly Republican Party lunch after a presentation by Vice President Dick Cheney.

In addition to talking with Mr. Cheney, the senators have extensively negotiated with Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, also discussed the topic on Tuesday with lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

The compromise on classified evidence would have a judge review the evidence and give a summary to be presented to the jury and the accused. Anything less, the senators have said, would constitute a secret trial.

The White House bill proposed last week would deny a suspect the right to see classified evidence that the jury might use to convict him.

Mr. Graham said the White House was “O.K.” with the compromise.

To address the White House concerns over Common Article 3, Mr. Graham said, the Senate would agree to redefine the War Crimes Act and make more specific the provision in it that says a violation of Common Article 3 is punishable by death.

“The administration is concerned that Common Article 3 can be used to sue our guys, to put our guys in jail, that they’re in an unfair position, and I would agree,” Mr. Graham said.

The changes, he added, said, would define the cases in which “grave breaches” of Common Article 3 constitute a war crime and would bar “serious criminal physical misconduct and inhumane treatment of a serious nature.”

Secrecy Dispute Snarls Nomination (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Wainstein in Limbo Over FBI Memos

Six months after President Bush chose him to lead a new anti-terrorism arm of the Justice Department, Kenneth L. Wainstein is still U.S. attorney for the District -- his nomination stalled by squabbling in the Senate.

Wainstein, a longtime prosecutor and former FBI official, had seemed on track to become the assistant attorney general for national security. Two Senate committees -- Judiciary and Intelligence -- endorsed his nomination. But for more than two months, he has awaited a vote by the full Senate.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) has blocked a vote because the Justice Department has not turned over to him several FBI documents that are connected to the abuse of detainees at the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba -- papers that would have passed through Wainstein's office when he was at the FBI.

The delay creates uncertainty not only at the Justice Department but also at the U.S. attorney's office, which Wainstein has led since May 2004. The office, which handles federal and local cases, is the largest U.S. attorney's office in the nation.

The national security division, created this year as part of the revision of the Patriot Act, will consolidate into one operation three branches of the Justice Department: counterterrorism, counterespionage and the office that oversees applications to the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act Court.

Wainstein was a top aide to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III from 2002 to 2004, serving first as general counsel and then as the agency's chief of staff. In each job, he played a key role in the bureau's restructuring to focus more heavily on terrorism cases.

Now Wainstein's work at the FBI is the subject of scrutiny by Levin, a member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence who has focused considerable attention on the detention practices at Guantanamo.

The senator's stance has drawn criticism from the Bush administration.

"As we mark the fifth anniversary of September 11th, it is beyond belief that Senator Levin would single-handedly obstruct the Department of Justice's efforts to stand up a new national security division," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

Levin's position has frustrated even some allies, who have urged the Senate to move forward with a vote. Thomas H. Kean and Lee H. Hamilton, the chairman and vice chairman of the 9/11 commission, have written in support of Wainstein. Charles S. Robb, a Democrat and former senator from Virginia whose commission on weapons of mass destruction recommended the restructuring of national security operations, wrote as well in support of Wainstein.

At issue are several documents that were sent to or from Wainstein or his deputy after FBI agents at Guantanamo reported witnessing sometimes abusive interrogations of detainees. The documents came to light after the American Civil Liberties Union filed a request under the Freedom of Information Act, but only in redacted form to the ACLU. Levin wants to see the original documents without redactions. Only one has been turned over, and that led to the stalemate.

Roehrkasse said the documents that Levin is seeking have nothing to do with Wainstein's qualifications for the assistant attorney general job.

Wainstein, 44, was easily confirmed by the Senate to take the U.S. attorney's job. But this nomination has been complicated.

"He's an innocent hostage in what is a pretty typical congressional response," said Norman J. Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute.

Such tactics are not new, Ornstein said, but the secrecy of the Bush administration has made them more likely to be used. The White House has advocated a more expansive doctrine of executive authority, and critics have complained that Congress has failed to exercise meaningful oversight over the administration's military and intelligence actions.

Levin, a lawyer, has been pressing hard for answers about Guantanamo, and Wainstein's nomination offered the senator perhaps his best opportunity to pressure the administration. Because it is a newly created position, the national security job cannot be filled by a recess appointment, as the president has done in other instances in which a nominee has been blocked.

If the Senate does not act on Wainstein's nomination before it adjourns at the end of the year, Wainstein would have to be nominated once again.

Wainstein declined to comment on his fate. A leading candidate to replace him as U.S. attorney, Jeff Taylor, is also in a holding pattern. Taylor is a legal adviser to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and a former assistant U.S. attorney in San Diego.

Tortured Negotiations (TIME)

White House officials, potentially vulnerable to prosecution in the wake of the Supreme Court's Hamdan decision, break out the big guns in a battle over detainees

When the Capitol police start politely clearing the hallways outside the Senate floor on a Tuesday afternoon it usually signals that Vice President Dick Cheney has decided to attend the Republicans' weekly policy lunch. But the gentility went out the window around noon today as the cops grabbed bystanders and pulled them out of the way as they rushed to empty the area not just for Cheney and White House chief of staff Josh Bolten, but for a special guest: Lady Margaret Thatcher.

The Senate Republican leaders weren't breaking out the top tier invitations for nothing. Three moderate GOP Senators have split with them and the White House over how to treat detainees at Guantanamo Bay and around the world. At the lunch, Senators John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham were scheduled to present their case for a detainee bill that conforms to the Geneva Conventions. The White House and Senate leaders are pushing one that would allow interrogations using methods that strain — or break, depending on whom you ask — the Conventions' rules against abuse.

Rolling out former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, who famously urged George H. W. Bush not to "go wobbly" ahead of the first Gulf War, was a particular bit of political hardball by the President's Hill allies as they try to stiffen spines in their caucus. And the stakes are high. The November mid-term elections may hinge on national security, and McCain and company are depriving their party of its best weapon — a vote that makes Democrats look weak. More important, the White House claims, is that McCain and company could outlaw methods of gaining intelligence that have been effective in preventing attacks against the U.S.

But some Senators and legal experts see another reason for the heightened concern at the White House. On paper, at least, White House officials and CIA officers could be vulnerable to prosecution for past or future use of illegal methods of interrogation — unless Congress changes the law.

The threat of prosecution comes not from some left-wing activists or even the House Democrats, but from the highest court in the country. In his concurring opinion in the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case last summer, Justice Anthony Kennedy said that the administration had to live within the Geneva Conventions. "Violations [of the Geneva Conventions] are considered 'war crimes,' punishable as federal offenses, when committed by or against United States nationals and military personnel," he wrote. And for emphasis, Kennedy pointed to paragraph 2441 of the U.S. code, which lays out the penalties for those violations, including life imprisonment and the death penalty.

It's hard to see how the methods the administration authorized for use against some of their detainees could not have violated the Geneva conventions. Common article 3 of the conventions prevents any "outrages on the personal dignity" of detainees. Among the highlights of the administration's approved techniques — waterboarding, wherein a prisoner is made to believe he is drowning; intimidation using dogs; stripping of prisoners; and so on.

When the key swing vote on the Supreme Court goes out of his way to say you are breaking the law, and enumerates the penalties you face, you pay attention. Says Tom Malinowski, of Human Rights Watch, who has advised Senators and their staffs on the matter, "The White House now knows they were operating under pretty bad legal advice from the Justice Department," which told them Bush had near-limitless authority when acting as commander-in-chief during times of war. "They're worried about some rogue prosecutor in the future who might hold specific individuals responsible," Malinowski says. Privately, some senior GOP senators say they believe that is what is motivating the White House resistance to the McCain/Warner/Graham bill.

Maybe. But just how much danger is the White House really in? It is rare for political leaders to be prosecuted for genuine attempts to protect the public, and few question the motives behind the extreme interrogation methods, even if they strongly disagree with them. More to the point, Graham, Warner and McCain have larded their bill with protections from prosecution for anything but "grave breaches" of the conventions, which they believe should be adequate to protect the White House and CIA.

But just because the administration's extreme interrogation techniques wouldn't be punishable as crimes, doesn't mean they would be authorized to use them either. And that, say several people involved in the debate, is what the administration is really after. In his speech announcing the closure of the program that used most of the controversial methods last week, Bush said he wanted to keep open the possibility of reopening it in the future. "They want the authority to continue the program if they capture other guys," says Malinowski.

As he went into the policy lunch today, McCain, who was tortured in Vietnam, said "my position will not change," on the extreme methods. And Graham is adamant that the interrogation program is "a thing of the past." One or both of the competing bills may come to the floor of the Senate as early as the end of this week. For now, at least, it appears it will take more than the Iron Lady to compel the administration opponents to back down.

Tortured Logic (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

'THE UNITED STATES DOES NOT TORTURE," President Bush said last week. It can, however, make use of what he euphemistically called "an alternative set of procedures" for eliciting information from prisoners suspected of being terrorists.

The difference between torture and these "alternative procedures" seems to be who's conducting the interrogation and where it takes place. If it's the CIA and it's overseas, they're permissible alternative procedures. Anywhere else, they're not allowed. This kind of legalistic legerdemain doesn't just expose the weakness of the administration's argument, it does a real disservice to U.S. foreign policy and all those serving overseas.

The administration characteristically refused to provide details about its methods. But experts on interrogation suspect that these alternative procedures could include subjecting prisoners to extreme temperatures and "waterboarding," in which a prisoner is strapped to a board and put in fear of drowning if he doesn't confess.

Such techniques seem to qualify as "humiliating and degrading treatment" prohibited by Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention, which protects so-called enemy combatants, at least according to the Supreme Court. That's also the military's view. The new Army field manual, rooted in Article 3, prohibits extreme interrogation tactics such as waterboarding and conducting mock executions.

The administration, apparently untroubled by this disagreement, is now asking Congress to declare that detainees who claim violations of the Geneva Convention may not have their day in court. The administration also wants to amend the 1996 War Crimes Act, which makes violation of the Geneva Convention illegal under U.S. law. New language would allow for prosecution only for "torture" and "cruel and inhumane treatment," not for "humiliating and degrading treatment." A 2005 law already allows interrogators accused of abuse to offer the defense that they "did not know that the practices were unlawful and [that] a person of ordinary sense and understanding would not know the practices were unlawful." That's protection enough.

Even the clearest legal language is subject to differing interpretations. But the Bush administration has a record of taking the narrowest possible view of protections for detainees under U.S. and international law. Indeed, until the Supreme Court forced it to change course, the administration argued that unlawful enemy combatants in the war on terror weren't covered by the Geneva Convention at all.

Given an inch by the law, this administration too often has taken a mile — creating a climate in which lower-level service members could feel that they were justified in the sort of abuse that took place at Abu Ghraib. As Congress moves to write legislation governing the treatment of present and future detainees, it needs to keep that history in mind and force the president to spell out what he means by alternative methods. And Congress should allow detainees who claim those methods violate their rights under the Geneva Convention to have their day in court.

House GOP Leaders Fight Wiretapping Limits (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

House leaders moved yesterday to temper many of the controls that a bill headed toward rapid passage would have imposed on the Bush administration's program for wiretapping terrorism suspects without court approval.

The bill, set for Judiciary Committee consideration today, would have forced the administration to seek a warrant for surveillance within 60 days and bolstered consultations with Congress on the program. But last-minute changes pushed by senior Republicans may allow warrantless surveillance to largely continue without those controls. Instead, House Republican leaders brought their bill in line with legislation agreed to by the White House and the Senate, which would allow but not require the administration to submit the program to a secret court for a constitutional review.

Republican leaders, in the midst of an increasingly angry attack on Democrats over defense matters, made it clear that they will not challenge President Bush's authority in matters of national security as they challenge their opponents' commitment to fighting terrorism.

"I do not think it is our intent to . . . 'rein in' the NSA," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

The move put House GOP leaders at odds with some Republican moderates and civil libertarians in the House and the Senate, who have pledged to assert Congress's authority over the wiretapping program. The legislation's chief author, Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), made it clear that she will stand by the original bill's system of checks when the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence takes it up tomorrow.

Wilson's bill would extend from the current three days to five days the time allowed for emergency surveillance before a warrant has to be submitted and approved by the secret federal court established under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (FISA). Warrantless surveillance would have to halt after 60 days unless the president came to Congress to justify further eavesdropping. And members of Congress would have to be briefed on the groups under surveillance.

"We need to use our intelligence tools to listen to our enemies," she said. "We also need to make sure checks are in place to prevent those tools from being used inappropriately against Americans. The best way to do that is to make sure we have divided government."

Divisions have also surfaced in the Senate, where half a dozen Republicans have publicly questioned the agreement between Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and the White House that House leaders pushed yesterday.

Democrats and civil liberties groups say neither the Wilson nor the Specter bill effectively limits the reach of the NSA's wiretapping program. Under the Wilson bill, a terrorist attack anywhere in the world would suspend for 45 days many of the controls on the program, and surveillance of international calls could continue without a warrant, as long as an American is not the target, Democrats say. Even before the leadership's changes, House Judiciary Committee aides had expected a bipartisan challenge to Wilson's bill today.

"There are some us who are uncomfortable here, some Republicans," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a Judiciary Committee member.

A competing measure, written by Flake and Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.), another committee member, would effectively end warrantless surveillance by insisting that a FISA court warrant remain the exclusive means to conduct domestic surveillance. It would also clarify that Congress's authorization of the use of force after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks was in no way meant to authorize warrantless wiretapping, and it would require disclosure to Congress of information on all Americans subjected to the surveillance.

Nevertheless, administration officials have criticized aspects of Wilson's House bill, especially the provision that would suspend controls only in the aftermath of a terrorist attack.

"The president cannot and should not wait for thousands of Americans to die before initiating vital intelligence collection," acting Assistant Attorney General Steven G. Bradbury told the House Judiciary Committee last week.

Wilson was incredulous. "It is surprising to me that, five years after 9/11, the administration comes to Capitol Hill to say they have insufficient legal authorities necessary to keep this country safe," she said.

But House GOP leaders pushed the committee to fall in line.

"Mr. Boehner's purpose right now is to hold on to GOP seats," Schiff said yesterday, after the Judiciary Committee's first classified briefing on the NSA program since it was revealed in December. "It's the security of Republican seats, not the security of the country, that's driving the majority leader.

The heated words came from both sides.

Boehner used a meeting with reporters yesterday to push his attacks on Democrats over the wiretapping issue and the president's efforts to receive congressional approval for his military tribunals.

"I listen to my Democrat friends, and I wonder if they're more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting the American people," Boehner said.

Democrats Call NSA's Input To Senate Panel Inappropriate (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Democrats on the Senate intelligence committee are complaining that the National Security Agency has played politics in support of the secret program to intercept phone calls between alleged terrorists in the United States and abroad.

On July 27, shortly after most members of the committee were briefed on the controversial surveillance program, the NSA supplied the panel's chairman, Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), with "a set of administration approved, unclassified talking points for the members to use," as described in the document.

Among the talking points were "subjective statements that appear intended to advance a particular policy view and present certain facts in the best possible light," Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said in a letter to the NSA director.

The cleared statements included "I can say the program must continue" and "There is strict oversight in place . . . now including the full congressional intelligence committees," as well as "Current law is not agile enough to handle the threat posed by sophisticated international terrorist organizations such as al-Qaeda" and "The FISA should be amended so that it is technologically neutral." FISA refers to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the current law.

Rockefeller and six Democrats on the panel wrote Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander, the NSA's director, on Aug. 29 that they believed those statements "appear intended to advocate particular policies rather than provide guidance on classification." The letter added: "We believe that it is inappropriate for the NSA to insert itself into this policy debate."

Alexander had earlier told Rockefeller that the talking points were in response to requests from more than one committee Democrat for guidance as to what could be said publicly as the policy debate began over what should be done with the program.

One element particularly troubling to the Democrats was the statement that there was "strict" congressional oversight of the program, because, as one senior Democrat said yesterday, committee members are still awaiting requested documents such as the original authorization by President Bush that initiated the program.

In a recent letter to Rockefeller, Alexander said he regretted that the NSA talking points were "misperceived as political." Rockefeller is planning to expand on the Democrats' concerns about their attempts to conduct oversight on the program in a speech today on the Senate floor.

Jury Seated For Trial Of Two Muslims On Charges They Supported Terrorism (NSDY/AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 13, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- The trial of two Muslims charged with supporting terrorism is to open Wednesday after potential jurors faced questions on their feelings about Islam, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the war in Iraq and whether they could deal fairly with the defendants.

A jury of six women and six men was chosen Tuesday to hear the case against the men arrested two years ago in an FBI sting. Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and mosque member, are accused of laundering money for an emigre businessman claiming to be a part-time arms dealer. They have pleaded not guilty, their attorneys arguing that full and accurate translations of the undercover tapes will show the men don't support terrorism.

"Right now Mr. Hossain and Mr. Aref are innocent," U.S. District Judge Thomas McAvoy said as jury selection began Tuesday. "All we can ask you to do is put aside any ideas you have ... and listen to what the witnesses say."

Some of the initial dozen members of the jury pool said they had relatives in the military, disagreements with Islam or strong feelings about the 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center in Manhattan.

"I personally believe that the government probably didn't bring these charges for nothing," one potential juror said, later likening prosecutors to the U.S. Marines at Fallujah. "Walking into this courtroom I feel like there's the enemy, here's the Marines," he said. "I may not be able to fairly judge this case."

He was excused from the jury pool.

McAvoy said it will be up to jurors to decide who's telling the truth and whether the two men broke any laws. They face more than two dozen charges that they conspired and then went ahead to launder and conceal money from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile to a Pakistan-based Islamic terrorist group.

Prosecutors say the Albany men willingly agreed to join the conspiracy, and their taped statements, as well as past statements, show their sympathy for Islamic terrorism.

Defense attorneys say Hossain, 51, simply sought a loan from the Pakistani businessman, Aref as a cleric was asked to witness the financial transaction, and the businessman/FBI informant was trying hard to implicate them to avoid a stiff sentence from an unrelated conviction.

"There is absolutely no evidence of the instant defendants' intent to commit any attacks on the United States, imminent or otherwise _ there is only a fake and completely incredible 'plot' on the part of a paid informant who tried his best, unsuccessfully, to enlist the support of the defendants," attorney Terence Kindlon wrote.

In court papers, Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek said he planned to introduce terrorism expert Dr. Rohan Gunaratna as a witness to rebut the "preposterous position" raised in a bail application that Aref's writings before he came to the U.S. in 1999 show he opposes terrorists and their philosophy. Instead, Gunaratna will offer the opinion that Aref, 36, is "a global jihadist."

McAvoy said the trial will probably last three weeks.

Jury Set In Albany Terror Sting Case (ALBANYTU)

Opening statements due today in trial of pizza shop owner, imam accused of taking part in missile launcher plot

ALBANY -- A phalanx of federal and city law enforcement officers blanketed the U.S. District Courthouse on Broadway as a jury of six women and six men were sworn in Tuesday in the trial of two Albany men facing terrorism-related charges.

But there were only a few public spectators and no security incidents as the federal jury was culled from a pool of 65 prospective panelists who reported for duty from as far away as the Poughkeepsie area. Opening statements in the case are scheduled to take place today.

Yassin M. Aref, 36, the jailed spiritual leader of a Central Avenue mosque, and Mohammed M. Hossain, 51, a city pizza shop owner, are accused of taking part in a plot to sell missile launchers to terrorists during an FBI sting that began in July 2003. The men face up to 400 years in prison if convicted.

Aref's co-counsel, Kent Sprotbery, and Hossain's attorney, Kevin Luibrand, spent much of Tuesday plying the minds of potential jurors about their religious beliefs and feelings toward Muslims in the wake of the 9/11 attacks.

"I'm scared to death of you," Luibrand told the group at one point, referring to his client's Muslim heritage, his appearance, and the mind-set of Americans at a time when the United States is at war in the Middle East. "Do you understand why I'm afraid? ... Can you look at him as Jimmy McDonald from North Albany instead of Mohammed Hossain from Bangladesh?"

"I do believe I can listen to the facts and sort it out," one juror later responded.

But several prospective jurors were dismissed after admitting that 9/11 and other terrorist-related events had skewed their ability to remain impartial.

More than a dozen FBI agents are expected to testify during the trial, which is the culmination of the most intensive counterterrorism sting in the history of the Albany field office, which covers about 32 counties in upstate New York as well as the state of Vermont.

Much of the defense's case is expected to center on government translations of dozens of tape-recorded conversations that took place between Hossain, Aref and an FBI informant. The informant, a Pakistani immigrant, agreed to take part in the sting to help settle his own, unrelated criminal charges of unlawful supplying driver's licenses to other immigrants.

"We're all affected by what happened five years ago," Sprotbery said to the panelists, noting that Aref "looks like" terrorist figures whose violence has played out on media outlets worldwide since 9/11 and especially during the war in Iraq.

Aref was not drawn into the sting until Hossain and the FBI informant had met 13 times over the course of five months in late 2003. Federal officials have acknowledged Aref was the "ultimate target" of the investigation.

In part, their interest in Aref was sparked about two months before the sting was launched when Aref's name, phone number and Albany address were found in a notebook recovered from a bombed-out Iraqi encampment that the government contends was occupied by terrorists, according to court records.

Prosecutors also have laid out detailed allegations tying Aref to high-ranking terrorist groups in the Middle East, and he is facing several immigration-related charges for allegedly lying about the connections, which his attorneys dispute. Aref has admitted he met people who the U.S. government has labeled terrorist figures, but he has denied being involved with their causes.

Authorities have not lodged any similar allegations against Hossain.

Aref and Hossain were arrested in August 2004 on a 19-count indictment charging them with money laundering in connection with a plot to sell grenade launchers to terrorists. The government subsequently added more charges, including allegations the men conspired to provide material support to a Pakistani terrorist group, although the support was in the form of taking part in the FBI sting. There was never any real terrorist plot.

Hossain, a Bangladeshi immigrant who has lived in Albany for more than two decades, claims he was drawn into the plot by an overzealous FBI informant.

But part of the FBI's strongest evidence in the case is an undercover surveillance videotape that shows the informant holding a surface-to-air missile launcher as the men chatted inside the informant's Central Avenue storefront. During the meeting, the informant told Hossain that they would earn money through the sale of the weapons.

Aref is an Iraqi-born religious scholar who was hired as imam at the Masjid As Salam mosque on Central Avenue soon after he arrived in the United States seven years ago. Aref and Hossain had been free on bond while their case is pending, but Aref's freedom was revoked by a federal judge last September when federal prosecutors filed a superseding indictment that contained allegations of Aref's past ties to terrorist organizations.

The trial is expected to take about a month.

The Case Of The Globe-trotting Grocer (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, September 13, 2006

By Ron Grossman

Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO - Sitting next to Muhammad Salah on a courtroom bench, it is hard to keep him in focus. The physical presence doesn't jibe with legal papers describing him as a terrorist kingpin with blood on his hands.

DOJ_NMG_0062343

The 53-year-old Palestinian-American from Bridgeview, Ill., seems remarkably calm for someone facing the possibility of spending the rest of his life behind bars. He projects the kind of inner peace ascribed to the great Christian mystics - or, perhaps more aptly in this instance, the Sufis of the Islamic world.

He is given to speaking in aphorisms.

"People are slaves to politics," he said during one of the pretrial skirmishes at the Dirksen Federal Building, where his criminal trial is scheduled to open in early October. He is accused of providing material support to a foreign terrorist group and lying under oath by denying that he was a member of Hamas, a group officially designated by the U.S. as a terrorist organization and now the majority party in the Palestinian legislature.

When Salah was charged two years ago, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft heralded it as a vindication of the USA Patriot Act, the controversial terrorism-fighting tool forged by the Bush administration in the wake of Sept. 11.

"Today, terrorists have lost yet another source of financing and support for their bombs and bloodshed," Ashcroft said in announcing the indictment by a federal grand jury of Salah and two co-defendants, including Mousa Mohammed Abu Marzook, a top leader of Hamas' political wing.

Given the White House's highly publicized strategy of maintaining a courtroom front in the war on terrorism, the government has bet a lot of chips on its prosecution of Salah and his alleged co-conspirators.

Yet there was a point in 2000 when the case appeared to have been dropped. The Justice Department shut down without fanfare its long-running investigation of Salah and Hamas.

The current reversal of that decision epitomizes the Salah case, which besides raising civil libertarians' hackles, is also a saga with more twists and turns than a John le Carre spy novel.

It includes enough bureaucratic infighting to send shivers up the spines of citizens who'd like to think of their government as a shield against a repeat of the World Trade Center tragedy. It even has a cameo appearance by Judith Miller, the former New York Times reporter, who went from hero to goat after refusing to testify in the White House leak investigation.

Submitted as a movie script, the story might elicit a Hollywood producer's critique: "Fascinating yarn, but needs simplifying."

Progress Cutting Off Terror Funds Cited (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, September 12, 2006

The United States has made progress in the last five years in trying to shut down avenues for terrorists to raise and move money but challenges remain, Bush administration officials told Congress Tuesday.

Testifying before the Senate Banking Committee, Treasury Department official Daniel Glaser underscored the importance of the United States working closely with international allies to share information. The goal, he said, is to thwart terrorist financiers and improve coordination of this information among agencies.

Glaser said authorities must stay ahead of terrorist financiers who not only try to use the traditional banking system to move money but also other methods, including cash couriers, trafficking of drugs, weapons and precious metals and jewels.

"We must adjust the development and application of our financial tools as terrorists and other threats adapt their financing methods and as we continue to learn how to improve our efforts," said Glaser, Treasury's deputy assistant secretary for terrorist financing and financial crimes.

The committee's chairman, Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., agreed, saying: "We must be mindful of our enemies' ability to adapt." Even though "memories fade," the country must remain vigilant, Shelby said.

The remarks came one day after observances for the 5th anniversary of the terror attacks on New York and Washington.

Since the attacks, the United States has designated a total of 460 people and entities as providing financial support for terrorists, Treasury officials said. Those actions mean that any bank accounts or financial assets found in the United States belonging to them are frozen and Americans are barred from doing business with them.

Glaser and other Treasury officials testifying at the hearing also told lawmakers about the government's efforts to financially clamp down on Iran and North Korea — two countries with nuclear ambitions. The United States says that Iran is a big source of funds for terrorist groups, including Hezbollah.

The international community needs to do more to put the financial squeeze on Hezbollah, Glaser said.

At times over the last five years, the Treasury Department had come under criticism for its efforts to combat terrorist financiers. The government, however, did get high marks for its efforts from the 9/11 commission.

More recently, some lawmakers expressed concerned that they weren't briefed early on about a secret program, started shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, which gives the government access to a massive international data base of financial information to track suspected terrorist financiers.

The existence of the program was revealed by news organizations in late June, a disclosure that the administration said could hobble future efforts to nab terrorist financiers.

The United States also is focusing more energy on the difficult job of trying to come up with ways to better pin down shell companies in the United States that are used to move money or hide money for terrorist financiers, drug lords and other criminals, Glaser said.

English Woods A Suspected Cover For Terror (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan And Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

LYNDHURST, England, Sept. 12 -- Jake, an arthritic Labrador retriever, slept beneath an ancient oak tree in a warm September breeze. Ponies roamed untethered, children kicked pine cones along gravel forest paths, and Edith Jones stood outside her camper wondering how such a tranquil spot had become, according to police, a training ground for terrorists.

Yassin Mutegombwa, 22, a London resident whose family is from Uganda, was charged in court Tuesday with receiving training for terrorism on British soil, the first person to be charged under a law enacted this year. According to a statement from Scotland Yard, he received weapons training in two rural English locations, including "at a woodland area" near Jones's campsite outside this village in southwestern England in late April and early June.

"This hits quite close to home," said Jones, 45, who has been coming to Matley Wood Campsite 80 miles southwest of London for more than 20 years. She said it was hard to believe that her idyllic camp, in the heart of national forest established as a hunting area by William the Conqueror in 1079, is suddenly caught up in the global struggle against Islamic extremism.

The charges against Mutegombwa illustrate increasing worry in Britain that violent extremists are not only being recruited from the country's large Muslim population but also are being trained here. Officials say some of the training may have taken place at popular paintball fields.

A Scotland Yard spokesman on Tuesday said that domestic terror training was "clearly recognized as a problem" and that the Terrorism Act of 2006 specifically included a new broad offense of receiving training that could be used for terrorism.

Police privately said that the camps were not formal military-style camps, but rather places in the countryside where would-be terrorists gathered to bond, plan and sometimes take part in weapons training. As part of the inquiry into the July 2005 suicide attacks on the London public transit system, police have investigated a rafting trip in north Wales by two of the four bombers shortly before the attacks.

British authorities have also said that they suspect some radicals are using the sport of paintball, in which players dressed in combat uniforms shoot one another with balls filled with colored liquid, as a method of learning military-style tactics. A property owner who spoke on condition of anonymity said he had been told that police were monitoring a wooded paintball site in the Lyndhurst area.

In Northern Virginia, 11 men were recently convicted in what prosecutors called a "jihad network" that among other things involved playing paintball in wooded areas of Virginia.

Ian Horton, who runs the Paintball Park in Landford, a few miles north of the Matley Wood camp, said he recalled no suspicious customers at his park and said police would be wasting their time by watching his business for potential extremist activity. "I don't see where a terrorist gets any benefit from paintball," he said.

Peter Neumann, director of the Center for Defense Studies at King's College in London, said "in one sense it's surprising" that young Muslims would engage in terror training in the English countryside. But with 60 million people on an island the size of Minnesota, he said, there are still places to go off and not be seen.

During the court case of radical cleric Abu Hamza Masri, who was convicted this year of inciting murder and racial hatred, Neumann said, evidence was presented that he would take followers out to the countryside for "camping trips" where they could "try out new weapons, engage in physical exercise and receive religious indoctrination." Neumann said those who excelled in British camps were then sent on to Afghanistan and Pakistan for "serious military training."

Mutegombwa was charged with three counts of receiving training that could be used for terrorism. His younger brother Hassan Mutegombwa was charged with procuring money for terrorism.

A third person, Musa Akmet, 47, was charged with illegal possession of a 16mm mini-flare launcher. Akmet and a fourth defendant, Mustafa Abdullah, were also accused of possessing "a record containing information of a kind likely to be useful to a person committing an act of terrorism."

In a central London court Tuesday, both Mutegombwa brothers, dressed in white sweat suits, waved to people in the public gallery, including women completely veiled except for their eyes, as they were led out of the courtroom.

At Matley Wood about 25 campers were parked at some of the 70 sites set in a forest of oaks and silver birches.

DOJ_NMG_0062345

Jones and her husband, Raymond, said anyone acting suspiciously would stand out in a place where many of the regulars have been coming for decades. But they said gunshots in the 220-square mile New Forest National Park are not unusual because park officials shoot deer to reduce the population and poachers sometimes hunt at night. They suggested the British easygoing manner might make it easier for potential terrorists to operate.

"We are a nation of trusting people," Edith Jones said.

Replied her husband: "Maybe we should start to not trust people so much."

4 Men Held In British Raids Are To Remain In Custody (NYT)

By Karla Adam And Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WHITE WALTHAM, England, Sept. 12 — Residents and employees at two recreation sites that have been cited in court documents as possible terrorist training camps expressed puzzlement on Tuesday, though one person said his resort had attracted police attention before.

"This place is not the least bit linked to terrorism," said Mick Holdaway, the owner of a leafy, 98-acre complex called Pondwood Farm near this town west of London that offers such pursuits as paintball shooting, bungee jumping and fishing.

On Tuesday, four men who were arrested in a series of police raids across London on Sept. 1 were ordered to be kept in custody, one day after they were charged with terrorism-related offenses.

One of the men, Ugandan-born Yassin Mutegombwa, 22, was charged on three counts of weapons training "for the purposes connected with the commission or preparation of acts of terrorism'' near Pondwood Farm on June 18 and near the Matley Wood Caravan and Camping site in Lyndhurst, on England's south coast, from April 28 to May 1 and June 2 to June 4.

As Mr. Holdaway, 56, strolled through Pondwood Farm's 14-acre paintball site, he said the area had been under surveillance by the police Special Branch since just after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and by the antiterrorism squad since 2004.

"The Special Branch came here just after 9/11,'' Mr. Holdaway said. "They asked, 'Do you get brothers over in your paintball area doing training?' Then two years ago the antiterrorism squad came and said, 'Is it O.K. that we do surveillance?' I said, 'Yes' to both, 'feel free.' I'm a family man and if anything like that is going on, I want to know about it.''

"If someone came here and played paintball but had an ulterior motive for weapons training, well, that's not at all my fault,'' he said. "Certainly no one I knew of received any training.''

The manager of the paintball facility is Shahid Chowdhary, a 42-year-old father of eight who leases the site from Mr. Holdaway and who described himself as a staunch Muslim.

"Every person who plays paintball signs a disclaimer, and not only don't I know Yassin, I have never seen his name,'' Mr. Chowdhary said in a telephone interview. The disclaimer, he said, includes personal details to identify those who play paintball.

"The only weapons we have are paintball guns,'' he said. "If I came across something suspicious, I would tell a policeman straightaway. I abhor terrorism, and it is not Islam.''

The forest floor where paintball is played was dotted with purple paint pellets on Tuesday. There was one area with rows of knee-high boards that had faces printed on them — including one of Saddam Hussein in military garb — that were splattered with purple paint. There were several wooden shacks and a cluster of log huts and fences that Mr. Holdaway called the Vietcong Village.

Mr. Mutegombwa was also charged with attending a site near Matley Wood Caravan and Camping for weapons training.

Christine Saunders, a 56-year-old retired florist, said she pitched her green mobile home there in March, a month before Mr. Mutegombwa is said to have first visited the area.

"There have been no suspicions or rumors here all summer,'' she said in an interview. "It's quiet here. That's why we like it.''

The four men who appeared at a magistrates' court in central London on Tuesday were among 14 arrested in the Sept. 1 police raids. The raids were part of a police hunt for terrorist recruiters and trainers and not related to the Aug. 10 security alert surrounding what police called a conspiracy by Islamic radicals to bomb trans-Atlantic airliners.

Mustafa Abdullah, 24, and Musa Akmet, 47, were charged with one count of possessing information likely to be useful to a terrorist. Mr. Akmet was also charged with illegal possession of a 16- millimeter mini-flare launcher. Hassan Mutegombwa, 20, Yassin's brother, was charged with one count of procuring financing for terrorism. The British Press Association said the charge was related to seeking money for a one-way airline ticket to Kenya.

Lawyers for all the men except Mr. Akmet said their clients would plead not guilty to the charges.

Even Safety Czar Thinks British Are Too Risk-Averse (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

DOJ_NMG_0062346

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 12 — One of the received wisdoms about British life is that it is full of picayune rules that are meant to prevent injuries and accidents but are in fact patently ridiculous. Antigovernment newspapers delight in promoting the notion of a country ruled by what they call "political correctness gone mad," describing how, for example, a fire department in Devon removed its traditional firemen's pole last year, apparently on the grounds that it is safer to use the stairs.

So it came as a surprise when Bill Callaghan, who as head of the country's Health and Safety Commission is supposedly responsible for such decisions, appeared on television last month to urge Britons to "get a life." Even more surprisingly, perhaps, he did so while engaging in a relatively high-risk activity: sailing (although he was wearing a life preserver).

But to Britons who have accepted the notion that no one is allowed to do anything fun anymore, and that it is the government's fault, Mr. Callaghan's message was met with some skepticism. Indeed, as he would be the first to admit, his agency has a major public-relations problem. "I was getting pretty angry with all the stories which mentioned Health and Safety — capital H, capital S — as stopping people from doing ordinary, worthwhile things," he said in a recent interview.

His irritation spurred him to action and to his new campaign to put a reasonable human face on the Health and Safety Commission, whose job is to recommend and oversee Britain's safety regulations.

"Our mission is to improve people's health and safety at work, and if people think it's all about petty bureaucratic rules, then we're not being successful," he said. "People say, 'We can't do this because Health and Safety won't let us.' "

Safety at work is no laughing matter, Mr. Callaghan, formerly the chief economist at the Trades Union Congress, said indignantly. Last year, he noted, 220 people were killed on the job. In the late 1960's — before the passage of the landmark Health and Safety at Work Act of 1974, which among other things established his agency and its sister, the Health and Safety Executive — the annual figure was about 1,200 deaths.

Britain has indeed become more risk-averse in recent years, largely because of a pervasive public fear of American-style litigation. But as Mr. Callaghan points out, payouts in liability cases in Britain are far lower than they are in the United States — about one-third as much per capita — and most lawsuits are dismissed before ever getting to trial.

By the same token, he said, he believes that many of the decisions made in the name of health and safety in Britain are indeed asinine. These include schools requiring children to wear protective goggles when playing with nuts that have fallen from trees; schools banning bandages because of fears of latex allergies; and village fairs forbidding people to sell homemade cakes in case they contain contaminated eggs.

But the commission is blamed for them anyway. It set up a myth-busting page on its Web site explaining, for instance, that it was not involved in the decision last April to cancel a St. George's Day breakfast in Wiltshire, after local officials ruled that the volunteer cooks were not formally trained in egg preparation.

Some of the examples are more ambiguous, though, illustrating how hard it can be to walk the line between traditional stiff-upper-lipness and modern caution. In another example on the Web site, the agency rebuts an article claiming that it has forbidden window washers to use ladders, lest they fall off. Ian Greenwood, who is identified as the head of the agency's "Falls From Height Program," is quoted as saying that ladders can indeed be used, as long as the "task is low-risk and of short duration," and all safer, non-ladder alternatives have been ruled out.

Mr. Greenwood notes that 14 people died, and more than 1,000 were injured, after falling from ladders in 2004. He directs interested parties to the agency's sensible-ladder-use campaign, which includes the publication, "Safe Use of Ladders and Stepladders."

Even if it is incorrect, the prevailing notion that every mishap ends with someone suing someone else has irrevocably changed Britons' mind-sets. Children who leave their coats and bags in special containers on field trips to the Science Museum in London, for example, are instructed by posted signs not to put anything on the lids, on account of Health and Safety rules. People buying cups of tea on British trains are ordered to carry them in paper bags for safety reasons — whether they want to or not.

Sailing down the placid Thames a year ago as part of the celebration marking the 200th anniversary of the Battle of Trafalgar, the actor playing Lord Nelson was required to accessorize his vintage admiral's outfit with a contemporary life preserver, which tended to spoil the effect.

Nor are the Health and Safety Commission offices, at the end of Southwark Bridge in East London, immune to dispensing their own cautionary advice. Along with security passes, visitors are issued photocopied pamphlets offering instructions on how to identify the sound of the fire alarm (a "continuous ringing of bells"); where to go if a fire does break out (convene at the location marked on the map on the back); and what to do if they feel sick or fall down (there is a first-aid room on the first floor; all injuries, "no matter how minor," must be reported).

The agency's new charm offensive has had mixed results. "Nanny-in-Chief Confesses," The Daily Mail wrote approvingly about Mr. Callaghan's campaign, as if he were a Mao-era Chinese official engaging in ritual self-criticism. But in The Sunday

Times of London, the columnist Roland White said, “For him to attack the nanny state is a bit like the chairman of the Football Association complaining that high wages are ruining the game.”

But Mr. Callaghan is on the skeptics’ side, he says, having experienced annoyingly overzealous regulations himself. After his 17-year-old son’s class traveled to upstate New York for a school ski trip, he said, students were forbidden to swim in the hotel pool with children from other schools, because their school’s risk assessors had determined that it was too dangerous.

Mr. Callaghan was just as exasperated as you would be, if it were your child’s school, and please don’t blame the Health and Safety Commission. “It’s not something we would get involved in,” he said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House, Dems Divided On Bush Speech (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, September 12, 2006

The White House quarreled with Democrats Tuesday over whether President Bush was trying to win political points by using a Sept. 11 anniversary speech to defend the war in Iraq and his war on terror.

Bush spokesman Tony Snow said although there were "three or four sentences" in the president's 17-minute address Monday night that could be considered controversial, Bush took pains not to be partisan. He said Bush had to discuss the dominant issue of Iraq, but he wasn't "picking fights" or making any demands of Congress.

"This was not a speech that was designed to single out anybody for partisan reasons, but gave the president's honest reflections and reactions to what has happened since September 11, 2001," Snow said. "The president decided that yesterday wasn't a day for partisanship."

Democrats, in a campaign to win control of Congress from the president's Republican Party, charged that Bush was using a national day of mourning for partisan gain. Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said Tuesday that Bush was "more consumed by staying the course in Iraq and playing election-year politics."

"The American people deserved better last night," Reid said in a statement. "They deserved a chance to reclaim that sense of unity, purpose and patriotism that swept through our country five years ago."

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, shot back at Democrats Tuesday: "I wonder if they're more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people," he said at a news conference. "They certainly don't want to take the terrorists on and defeat them."

In the speech broadcast in prime time on the fifth anniversary of the terror attacks, the president described a brutal enemy still determined to kill Americans, perhaps with weapons of mass destruction if they get the chance.

"If we do not defeat these enemies now, we will leave our children to face a Middle East overrun by terrorist states and radical dictators armed with nuclear weapons," Bush said. "We are in a war that will set the course for this new century and determine the destiny of millions across the world."

Bush began with a two-minute tribute to the nearly 3,000 victims of the Sept. 11 attacks, but most of his 17-minute speech was devoted to justifying his foreign policy since that day. With his party's control of Congress at stake in elections less than two months away, Bush suggested that political opponents who are calling for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq would be giving victory to the terrorists.

"Whatever mistakes have been made in Iraq, the worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone," Bush said from the Oval Office, with a photo of his twin daughters and the American flag behind him. "They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

While Democrats have been using public opposition to the Iraq war to argue for a change of leadership in Congress, Bush's prime-time address showed how he has been able to use the power of incumbency to command public attention and make his points. Democrats objected to the tone.

"The president should be ashamed of using a national day of mourning to commandeer the airwaves to give a speech that was designed not to unite the country and commemorate the fallen but to seek support for a war in Iraq that he has admitted had nothing to do with 9/11," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said in a statement. "There will be time to debate this president's policies in Iraq. September 11th is not that time."

On Monday, dozens of lawmakers from both parties put aside the campaigning and joined on the steps of the Capitol to remember the attacks. Together they sang "God Bless America" as they had five years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0062348

"Partisanship would have been the one casualty the American people would have accepted following 9/11, but it remains the one thing the president refuses to give up," Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic effort to win control of the House, said after the president's speech.

Snow noted that Emanuel, Kennedy and other Democrats attacked the speech shortly after the president was finished speaking, suggesting they were the ones who injected politics. "It appears that there had been a desire immediately after the speech to go ahead and make partisan points," he said.

Bush said Iraq is part of the United States' post-Sept. 11 approach to threats abroad. Going on offense against enemies before they could harm Americans meant removing the Taliban from power in Afghanistan, pursuing members of al-Qaida and seeking regime change in Iraq, Bush said. At least 2,670 U.S. servicemen and women have died in Iraq.

"I am often asked why we are in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," Bush said. "The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat.

"America did not ask for this war, and every American wishes it were over. So do I," Bush said. "But the war is not over, and it will not be over until either we or the extremists emerge victorious."

Although his administration has been criticized for trying to link Osama bin Laden to Baghdad, Bush made further comparisons between the al-Qaida leader and Iraq. The president quoted bin Laden as saying the battle in Iraq is the "Third World War" that could bring America's "defeat and disgrace forever."

"If we yield Iraq to men like bin Laden," Bush said, "our enemies will be emboldened, they will gain a new safe haven, and they will use Iraq's resources to fuel their extremist movement. We will not allow this to happen."

Bush delivered a message to bin Laden and other terrorists who are still on the run. "No matter how long it takes, America will find you, and we will bring you to justice," Bush said.

In The Debate On Security, Perhaps A Misstep Or Two (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Carl Hulse
The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Elapsed time between the conclusion of President Bush's speech Monday night on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the first Democratic charge that he had politicized the tragedy: 20 minutes.

White House reaction: an appearance of glee.

Next steps: to be determined by conditions on the ground.

With the White House having wrapped up the first phase of its all-out effort to gain control of this fall's political narrative by casting the Iraq war as part of an epochal struggle against tyranny, both parties are confronting questions about their tactics as they head into the homestretch of the campaign.

Did the Democrats play into Mr. Bush's hands when Senator Edward M. Kennedy said Monday night that the president should have been ashamed of his speech, giving the White House a chance to intensify the national security debate against just the kind of liberal opponent it relishes? Did Mr. Bush overplay his hand by turning what had been billed as a nonpartisan commemoration of the attacks into what his opponents called a political defense of the war?

Democrats said they had initially planned to avoid any sort of partisan response to Mr. Bush's address. But they said they changed their minds within minutes and followed up on Tuesday by attacking the administration over its record on port security and other efforts to protect Americans at home. Late Tuesday, they released a letter to the television networks asking for equal time to deliver responses to Mr. Bush's future national security addresses.

At the White House, Tony Snow, Mr. Bush's spokesman, could hardly disguise his eagerness to go before the cameras to engage the Democrats on turf that Republicans have come to consider their own. He invited reporters who posed questions to him in the morning about Democratic complaints about the speech to ask again at his regular televised briefing, where he said Democrats were politicizing the anniversary and reasserted the White House line that a withdrawal from Iraq would turn it into a terrorist base.

On Capitol Hill, Republicans took an even harder line, questioning Democrats' commitment to fighting terrorists. Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, the majority leader, said of the Democrats, "I wonder if they're more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the minority leader, responded, "Haven't we moved beyond the fact that Republicans are trying to save us from the terrorists and Democrats aren't?"

DOJ_NMG_0062349

But in a sign that there may be limits to how far each side is willing to go in the debate, Mr. Snow initially dodged questions about whether the president condoned Mr. Boehner's remarks. When Mr. Snow was directly asked whether he believed Democrats were more intent on protecting terrorists than Americans, he answered flatly, "No."

And a senior Republican official, who spoke candidly about political strategy only on the condition of anonymity, expressed some unease with Mr. Boehner's language.

But even some Democrats said they winced when Senator Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, was among the first to criticize the president, allowing the White House, for one news cycle at least, to frame the debate as one between the two men.

At the heart of both parties' calculations are competing visions of what will ultimately move people to the polls this fall. Democrats say they are convinced that with the continued violence in Iraq, a continued stream of threat videos produced by Al Qaeda, and a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, Republicans have handed their national security edge to the Democrats.

"Given the basic environment is in our direction, you have to stand up to them every time and show strength and that you are not afraid of them," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "That's what we have done over the past few weeks, and we are very happy with the results."

Democrats are taking their fight to the Congressional floor. On Tuesday, Mr. Reid sought to add a broad package of Democratic security proposals to a port security measure in the Senate, drawing complaints from Republicans that he was effectively blocking crucial legislation.

In the House, Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, plans to introduce a resolution of no confidence in Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. If the Republican leadership does not allow a vote, as is likely, Democrats will then begin a petition to force the resolution to the floor.

Acknowledging that Democrats have to be careful to look like more than complainers, Jim Jordan, a Democratic strategist, said, "Of course it's better for the party if we are defining ourselves as muscular and ready to defend the country."

But pointing to polls showing a smaller gap between the parties on national security, he said the Democrats had "fundamentally shifted public perceptions of which party is better able to defend the nation just in terms of domestic security."

Republicans disagree, pointing to successive Republican victories in the past two major elections, each of which was fought over national security policy. In both of those campaigns, critics said Republicans were overplaying their hands and predicted backlashes that did not come to pass. And Republicans have been quick to exploit continued divisions among Democrats over how to proceed in Iraq, often seeking to define the Democratic Party on the basis of positions taken by its more liberal members.

"When they make these outrageous statements on national security and try to politicize that issue, that plays to our advantage," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for the House speaker, Representative J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois. "We've chosen the grounds of national security; they're trying to play on our field."

With control of the White House and both chambers of Congress, Republicans say they plan to run the legislative show in the coming days with bills codifying the president's domestic spying program and the military tribunal system for detained terrorism suspects, though Republicans in the Senate, including John McCain of Arizona, oppose crucial parts of the tribunal legislation.

To goad the effort along, Mr. Bush plans to meet Thursday with Congressional Republicans on Capitol Hill for a closed-door session. And Tuesday, after he met with a group of conservative columnists, National Review Online quoted Mr. Bush as saying that he would have faced loud criticism had he not mentioned Iraq on Monday night, and that his goal was to highlight the stakes in this campaign.

Still, even some Republicans had doubts about how much the new national security campaign would help in a climate both sides see as tough.

"I don't think the inside-the-beltway discussion about political tit-for-tat makes any difference in the majority of races around the country," said Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire.

GOP Heightens Security Offensive (RC)

By Susan Davis And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

With cautious hopes that the political winds may be turning in their favor, Republicans in both chambers are accelerating their election-year offensive this week with fundraising pitches, heightened rhetorical attacks on Democrats and a rare Thursday visit from President Bush.

"Hopefully we're back on the offensive on the issues that have worked for us and that Democrats are traditionally weak on," said one senior GOP Senate aide. "We're going to focus on a couple key issues to get traction on and try to ratchet up the momentum."

DOJ_NMG_0062350

Echoing the style of his predecessor, former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) fired at Congressional Democrats on Tuesday during his weekly session with reporters, going so far as to suggest Democrats sympathize more with terrorists than their constituents.

"I listen to the questions today and I listen to my Democrat friends, and I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people," Boehner said.

When asked if he intended to imply that Democrats were treasonous, he responded. "No, I made it clear [that] sometimes I wonder — that is what I said — I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists. They certainly do not want to take the terrorists on and defeat them."

Earlier Tuesday, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), along with other senior House and Senate Democrats, had blasted Bush's Monday address to the nation for continuing to equate the Iraq War with a broader war on terrorism.

Pelosi fired back at Boehner, accusing him and other Republicans of resorting "to the desperation politics of fear." Added Pelosi, "It's time for real leadership against terrorism, not just Republicans' half-truths and scare tactics. The American people will see through the Republicans' cynical tactics and choose a new direction in the war against terror."

Yet Republicans are only heightening their offensive on Democrats, with GOP leadership aides coordinating message points and media releases with their rank-and-file members in order to define Pelosi specifically and Democrats in general on national security.

Bush's Thursday visit to the House Republican Conference will add momentum to their efforts as the administration works with Congress to authorize the president's actions, which were recently struck down in courts on military detainees, wire-tapping and surveillance of suspected terrorists.

"I think he has not been up in a while, and he thought it would be a good idea," Boehner told reporters. "I just think having the president interact with our Members has always been good for our team. ... We work closely with the White House and providing this kind of a forum I think is good for the president and good for our members."

Boehner downplayed suggestions that a Bush appearance may not aid vulnerable GOP incumbents, many of whom have been running campaigns that separate themselves from the president on the issues.

"I have not really seen anybody running away from the president. Frankly, I think that would be a very big mistake," he said. "I have no fears about losing our majority, none whatsoever."

On the campaign front, House Republicans will meet at the Capitol Hill Club this morning for the second-to-last fundraising pitch for the National Republican Congressional Committee's Battleground program, which raises money for their most vulnerable incumbents.

House Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) is chairing this year's effort and is tasked with raising $17.5 million for the cycle. Rob Collins, a spokesman for Cantor, said they have collected more than $11 million so far from rank-and-file members.

"We're excited about the progress in that we feel that we're ahead of the aggressive pace Mr. Reynolds set for us," Collins said, adding that Cantor will "absolutely" meet the fundraising goal

Across the Capitol, Republican Senators also are putting in place the final pieces of their pre-election game plan — hoping to put Senate Democrats on the defensive as they push through a multitiered security agenda that puts them back in the political driver's seat.

While Republican House Members will meet with Bush, Senators got some face time Tuesday with White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and Vice President Cheney at their weekly policy luncheon. Republicans in both chambers are hoping to use the next three weeks to push through a series of homeland security measures, beginning with passage this week of port security legislation, and later by passing bills to provide executive authority to engage in terrorist surveillance and to deal with the rights of suspected terrorist detainees.

That legislative agenda will be coupled with a multimillion-dollar message and ground game designed to define Democrats as weak on national security and the broader war on terrorism.

GOP Senators say that unlike their House counterparts, they have little fear of losing their chamber to the Democrats. But they remain worried about holding onto their six-seat hold in the Senate that most observers predict is in jeopardy.

"There's surely a greater focus," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said when asked about the current Republican mood.

On Tuesday, several GOP Senators and aides suggested that while the landscape may not have done an about face, the climate has improved in part because of President Bush's recent media blitz on the war, as well as their own attempts to unify around a keep America safe message. Also adding to their new-found momentum are a series of global events that show Republican strength on defense matters such as the foiled terrorist plot to blow up airliners bound for the United States.

"November is still a long way away," said one Senate Republican aide. "But today's a hell of a lot better than it was two months ago."

DOJ_NMG_0062351

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said with less than two months to go until the election, he believes there is still time to move voters, saying: "Most people don't make up their mind until 48 hours before."

A high-level Republican Senate aide suggested his party came into September fearing the worst, given the daily dose of media reports and pundit speculation predicting sweeping Democratic success on Nov. 7.

But September has shown some positive signs for Republicans, this aide said, and said that rather than "running around with our heads in our hands, we are being aggressive."

"The expectations were set so high for the Democrats that the fact there isn't a blood bath after August, buoys a lot of people," this aide said. "When you look at the landscape it's not nuclear winter."

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) said he remains optimistic about his party's chances this fall, and believes that Republicans are making clear to voters that they are the best party to keep them safe. If that message is conveyed effectively, the electorate will keep the GOP in charge this November, he said.

"I still think most of my colleagues are in agreement that we will hold our majority in the Senate," Coleman said. "There's no panic. I think we are running scared in a healthy way."

Democrats aren't ceding any ground, however. Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) said voters are wise to the Republicans' election-year maneuvers, and predicted the GOP will fail.

He said Republicans may have seen success on the security platform in the past, but voters no longer side with their foreign policies, and Democrats, for their part, have learned to stand up and fight back.

"The only thing that is going to stunt Democratic momentum is a change in course," Schumer said. "People want a change in course. People aren't happy."

Republicans, Dems Trade Jabs On War (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 13, 2006

GOP leaders in the House have signaled their support for a controversial White House plan establishing the legal framework to try suspected terrorists just as vulnerable Republicans seek to distance themselves from the president.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) pledged strong support yesterday for House language backed by the administration creating military tribunals for detained terrorist suspects.

In doing so, Boehner also seized on remarks made by his Democratic counterpart downplaying the effect of capturing Osama bin Laden.

"I listen to my Democrats friends, and I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people," Boehner told reporters yesterday.

White House spokesman Tony Snow indicated he did not share Boehner's point of view when asked about the comments. And Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) fired off his own vitriolic reaction.

"I wonder if John Boehner is more interested in protecting his majority than protecting the American people," he said in a statement. "Instead of coming up with new ways to scare Americans into voting Republican, George Bush and John Boehner ought to be doing what needs to be done to secure our country."

Over the weekend, Pelosi appeared at a press conference that was supposed to be devoted to taking the administration to task for not doing more in the war against terrorism.

"And if [bin Laden] is caught tomorrow, it is five years too late. He has done more damage the longer he has been out there," she told reporters. "But, in fact, the damage that he has done is done. And even to capture him now I don't think makes us any safer."

Rank-and-file Republicans are expected to join Boehner later this week in attacking the minority leader for her remarks, Republican leadership aides in the House said yesterday.

"We're going to expose how weak the Democrats' rhetoric and record is on national security and fighting terrorism," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "The Democrat leader wants to give up on catching terrorists, provide classified information to terrorist suspects and cut and run from Iraq."

But Republicans may have a problem with this strategy. On Meet the Press this Sunday, Vice President Dick Cheney also expressed doubt over the impact of catching bin Laden.

"He's not the only source of the problem, obviously…" Cheney said. "If you killed him tomorrow, you'd still have a problem with al-Qaeda, with Zawahiri and the others. But bin Laden has been a top priority for us from the very beginning, he continues to be a top priority today."

Pelosi responded by accusing Republicans of resorting to the politics of fear rather than defending their own "failed" record on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0062352

"If Mr. Boehner has a concern with the Hamdan decision, he should take it to the U.S. Supreme Court, where a majority of the justices found that Mr. Bush was operating outside of the rule of law," she said in a statement.

Pelosi and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) also sent a letter yesterday to the presidents of network news companies calling on them to devote more coverage to House and Senate Democrats if they continue to give extensive airtime to President Bush's national security speeches.

"In order to provide the American people with complete information to make the best choices come Election Day, we ask that you commit your network to providing fair and equitable coverage to the viewpoints of both Republicans and Democrats on these crucial national security debates," they wrote.

The war of words comes as both chambers ready legislation to legitimize military tribunals the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional in June. Republicans have made national security the thrust of their reelection efforts to hold the House despite the increasingly unpopular Iraq war.

Although GOP leaders in the House and Senate continue to support President Bush, rank-and-file Republicans in competitive seats are moving further away from the White House on a number of issues.

House Republicans in suburban Philadelphia, for instance, have run ads and sent direct mail pieces distancing themselves from the president on immigration and Iraq.

Bush is scheduled to address GOP lawmakers in the House tomorrow during a rare closed-door session where he is expected to offer words of encouragement heading into the critical midterm elections.

Pelosi's remarks over the weekend contradicts a major plank of the "real security" proposal congressional Democrats introduced earlier this year; the elimination of bin Laden and the al-Qaeda leadership was a principal objective of that proposal.

Boehner also criticized Democrats for backing proposed changes to the House bill establishing these tribunals that would allow defendants to view classified information being used against them.

"These are terrorists," Boehner said. "Providing a terrorist with classified information puts our troops in jeopardy."

The Supreme Court ruled that the previous program was unconstitutional in part because defendants were not allowed to view some of the evidence used against them.

The rhetorical battle coincides with another potentially tough negotiation with the House and Senate over the creation of these tribunals.

In addition to preventing suspected terrorists from viewing classified evidence being used against them, the House bill, which largely resembles proposed White House legislation, also would allow military prosecutors to use hearsay evidence as well as testimony obtained through coercion.

A trio of powerful Republican senators on the Armed Services Committee, including the chairman, Sen John Warner (R-Va.), as well as Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) raised significant objections last week to all three provisions.

Democrats on the House Armed Serives Committee were expected to meet last night to decide how to respond to their own concerns with these three issues, one Democratic aide said. They were deciding yesterday whether to offer amendments or a substitute bill during today's markup that would allow suspected terrorists to view the classified evidence and prohibit hearsay testimony and testimony acquired through coercion.

As the debate advances, Republicans in the House will even make a small semantics change in the tribunals themselves by calling them "terrorist tribunals" instead of "military tribunals" in order to shift the emphasis to those being tried rather than the people trying them, according to GOP leadership aides.

White House Defends 9/11 Reference To Iraq War (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 13, 2006

President Bush accomplished his goal of calling for unity while portraying the fight ahead of the United States during his Monday night Oval Office address, the White House said yesterday, as it fended off charges that the president politicized the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks.

"The president did not want to try to turn this into a Democrats-versus-the-Republicans thing, but you cannot talk about the war on terror without talking about Iraq," White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday.

"And furthermore, you can't talk about September 11th, especially when Osama bin Laden himself says Iraq is at the center of all this, without mentioning it."

On Capitol Hill, Mr. Bush's speech stiffened the spines of Republicans who have grown weary of defending an unpopular war heading into a tight election season. Yesterday, they were back to skewering Democrats as harshly as ever.

DOJ_NMG_0062353

"I listen to my Democrat friends, and I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said yesterday.

In particular, he noted Democratic objections -- shared by a handful of Republicans -- to the Bush administration's handling of terrorism suspects held at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Mr. Bush on Monday night called for unity behind the war on terror and defended Iraq as a central part of that war in a prime-time address from the Oval Office, televised by the major networks.

Almost immediately, Democrats slammed Mr. Bush, with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts saying the president should "be ashamed" and the chairman of both House and Senate Democrats' political campaign committees accusing him of doing a disservice to the day. They objected to his defense of the war in Iraq and said he was wrong to tie it into the terrorist attacks from five years ago.

"To try to make partisan gain out of such tragedy dishonors all those we lost on September 11," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said yesterday, calling the speech an attempt "to distract from his failures in Iraq."

The fight is playing out on Capitol Hill, where the House is considering a resolution commemorating the five-year mark since the attacks.

Mr. Boehner blasted Democrats for refusing to accept what in past years has been a noncontroversial resolution because it contains references to eight pieces of legislation that Congress has approved in the past five years in an effort to combat terrorism.

"What is being objected to is a list of the bills that Congress passed in response to 9/11," Mr. Boehner said yesterday. "All of the bills passed with broad bipartisan support. It is a fact that they passed. And I, for the life of me, I have no idea what the objection is."

Three of the bills mentioned in the draft resolution passed almost unanimously, and two others passed with support from most Democrats. The most partisanvote was last year's immigration legislation, which picked up support from 36 Democrats in the House.

"We're going to expose how weak the Democrats' rhetoric and record is on national security. The Democratic leader wants to give up on catching terrorists, provide classified information to terrorist suspects and cut and run from Iraq," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"They wouldn't even agree to include the national-security record of Congress in the 9/11 resolution."

At the White House, Mr. Snow would not comment directly on Mr. Boehner's statement on the Democrats' priorities, but said he did not think Democrats were more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting Americans.

Mr. Snow walked reporters through parts of Mr. Bush's speech and said there were "three or four sentences" that could be seen as controversial, but said Mr. Bush would have been criticized if he had left Iraq out.

Bush Politicized A Solemn Day, Democrats Say (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — As White House officials sought approval from television executives for a coveted prime-time broadcast of President Bush's Oval Office address commemorating the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, they said publicly that the speech would steer clear of politics.

As late as Sunday, as Bush prepared for a raft of Sept. 11 ceremonies, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow told reporters that the address was "not going to be a political speech — there are no calls to action, there are no attempts to segregate Democrats from Republicans."

But Bush's inclusion in his remarks Monday night of a stout defense of his policies in Iraq — as well as his suggestion that a united front was needed on the subject — sent Democrats scrambling to issue late-night responses and prompted at least one network to adjust its programming to make time for political analysis. And the controversy continued Tuesday, as debate flared over whether Bush inappropriately politicized a day set aside for memorials and solemn reflection.

The dispute comes eight weeks before voters are to decide which party will control Congress for Bush's final two years in office, and underscores how each side is vying to make the issue of national security work to its advantage.

Bush, in a series of recent appearances, and other administration officials have stressed their view that the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq was part of the broader fight against terrorism and that critics were playing into the hands of terrorists.

Democrats have argued that the war has weakened the United States' standing in the world and that Bush's "stay the course" policy only increases the terrorism threat.

The rhetoric escalated after Bush's speech Monday night.

DOJ_NMG_0062354

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) accused Republicans of employing "cynical tactics" to scare voters, while House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) wondered aloud whether Democrats were "more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

Democrats pressed their case that the White House had misrepresented the tenor of Bush's speech, causing the broadcast networks to give him a prime-time slot without setting time aside for an opposition response or interviews with Democrats.

"The American people, us included, took [White House officials] at their word when they said it would not be a political speech," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) sent letters to network news executives Tuesday asking for more coverage of Democrats' views as part of reporting on Bush's war-related speeches.

Bush mused Tuesday about the dispute over his speech, telling a group of conservative columnists during an Oval Office interview that he would have been attacked either way.

"Imagine what they would have said if I hadn't talked about Iraq — 'Failed policy, won't talk about it,' " he said, according to an account posted on the National Review Online.

The first indication that Monday night's address might go beyond a Sept. 11 commemoration came about three hours before Bush delivered it, when the White House press office distributed advance excerpts. It included one line declaring that winning the war on terrorism "will require the determined efforts of a unified country," and that Americans "must put aside our differences, and work together to meet the test that history has given us."

Still, the excerpts contained no mentions of Iraq — and the headline on the news release alerted reporters only that Bush's speech would "remember those who lost their lives five years ago today and pay tribute to the heroes whose acts of courage that day saved so many lives," and reflect on "what Sept. 11 has meant to America and how we can move forward together to win the war on terror."

On NBC, which like the other two major networks interrupted regular programming to televise Bush's remarks, Washington bureau chief Tim Russert told viewers before the speech that the president would be assuming the role of "commander in chief, healer in chief, comforter in chief; all alone in the Oval Office with one big megaphone for the country and the world to hear."

But Bush wasted little time in his 17-minute address before reverting to the oft-repeated lines of his election-year speeches defending the invasion of Iraq.

"I'm often asked why we're in Iraq when Saddam Hussein was not responsible for the 9/11 attacks," he said. "The answer is that the regime of Saddam Hussein was a clear threat…. The world is safer because Saddam Hussein is no longer in power."

Bush went on to quote Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden predicting that defeat in Iraq would mean America's "defeat and disgrace forever," a line the president has often used to criticize Democrats who have endorsed a timetable for withdrawing troops.

"The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad," Bush said.

With those and other passages, a speech that had been advertised as nonpolitical was sounding like the president's campaign speech.

Once the themes of Bush's remarks were clear, NBC changed plans and allowed time after the speech for additional analysis. During that segment, Russert predicted that Democrats would no doubt accuse Bush of playing "politician in chief."

A network news executive, speaking on condition of anonymity due to the sensitivity of relations with the White House, said Tuesday that the speech would prompt greater scrutiny of future White House requests for air time.

"On a scale of zero to 100, with 100 being a speech of national significance and zero being purely partisan, this clearly was not a 100 on that scale," the executive said. "And I guess over time if that pattern kept occurring, then … you'd start to look long and hard at those formal requests."

Reid took to the Senate floor to criticize Bush for, in his view, injecting politics into the Sept. 11 commemoration.

Reid recalled that the attacks had "brought America together like never before." He said that when Bush, a few days after the attack, "stood upon that mound of rubble at ground zero with bullhorn in hand, he spoke for all of us" in pledging retribution against the plotters.

But Reid said that on Monday night, "the president spoke for his administration, not for the nation. No bullhorn, only the bully pulpit of his office, which he used to defend an unpopular war in Iraq and to launch clumsily disguised barbs at those who disagree with his policies there."

Snow on Tuesday stood by his earlier characterization of the speech as nonpolitical — in the sense that Bush did not specifically argue that Democrats opposing his Iraqi policies were jeopardizing America's security, as he has done on the campaign trail.

"What I told you was there would be no drawing of partisan distinctions, and there wasn't," Snow said.

DOJ_NMG_0062355

"The point is that the use of the term 'partisan,' I think, is being now tossed around as a way to fend off the debate [on Iraq] or say, 'How dare the president talk about it,' " Snow said.

A Reprise Of The Grand Old Party Line (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) was his genial self at a meeting with reporters yesterday morning, showing off his golf-ball-pattern tie and talking of a conversation he once had with Jack Nicklaus about the baby-blue cravat.

But 15 minutes later, Boehner had moved from the necktie to the jugular: He speculated that Democrats may be guilty of the capital crime of aiding and comforting the enemy.

"I listen to my Democrat friends, and I wonder if they're more interested in protecting terrorists than in protecting the American people," he said.

One of his listeners, offering Boehner the chance to rescind that charge, asked if he really meant to accuse Democrats of treason. "I said I wonder if they're more interested in protecting the terrorists," he replied, repeating more than clarifying. "They certainly don't want to take the terrorists on in the field."

The majority leader's charge of treachery was no accident. Two months before Election Day, Republicans have revived the technique used with great success in 2002 and 2004: suggesting that the loyal opposition is, well, not so loyal.

Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) seemed to have the same talking points yesterday. In a fight for his political life, Santorum worked himself into a rage on the Senate floor, hollering: "If you listen to the Democratic leader, our lesson is: . . . Let's put domestic politics ahead of the security of this country. That's the message."

The arrival of Treason Season, heralded by the charged address President Bush gave on Monday's 9/11 anniversary, is right on schedule.

Back in 2002, Bush declared on Sept. 23 that Senate Democrats were "not interested in the security of the American people." Republicans gained seats in the midterm elections.

Two years later to the day, Bush went to the Rose Garden to say that Democrats' statements about Iraq "can embolden an enemy." A few days earlier, Republican John Thune said the words of his opponent, Senate Democratic leader Thomas Daschle (S.D.), "embolden the enemy." Bush and Thune won in November.

The aid-and-comfort line may not work as well this time, if only because polls show broad disenchantment with Bush and congressional leadership. And, unlike in 2002, Republicans have unified control of the government and find their security agenda being hamstrung by GOP holdouts as well as Democrats. But don't discount the influence of Treason Season: A Zogby poll released yesterday showed Santorum closing the gap with Democratic challenger Bob Casey.

As is often the case, Vice President Cheney launched the current round of sedition suspicions. The idea "that we should withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq," he told NBC's Tim Russert on Sunday, "validates the strategy of the terrorists."

Bush picked up the thread in his televised address Monday night, saying: "The worst mistake would be to think that if we pulled out, the terrorists would leave us alone. They will not leave us alone. They will follow us. . . . If we yield Iraq to men like bin Laden, our enemies will be emboldened." That was milder than Cheney, but not exactly the non-political speech the White House promised when it requested network time.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) rushed to the floor yesterday morning to denounce this "ploy" by Bush, saying the president "obviously was more consumed by staying the course in Iraq and playing election-year partisan politics than changing direction."

This threw Santorum into a rage, resulting in a 15-minute tirade by the agitated Pennsylvanian. "The very people that planned the attacks are the people who are in Iraq," he stipulated, drawing a conclusion different from the one the Senate intelligence committee reached. He said Democrats "can't face the reality that we have a dangerous enemy out there, an enemy that wants to destroy everything we hold dear."

Boehner, giving reporters an off-camera briefing in his office, was decidedly calmer. In shirtsleeves and sipping a Diet Coke, he told the group coolly: "I have no fears about losing our majority. None." Five minutes later, after making and repeating his supposition that Democrats prefer terrorists to Americans, Boehner added somewhat incongruously that Democrats "are the ones out there making statements."

The flap landed 90 minutes later on Tony Snow's podium in the makeshift White House briefing room. The spokesman declined multiple invitations from the press to disavow Boehner's formulation. "Do you want to let a statement like this stand from a Republican leader of Congress?" NBC's David Gregory finally asked.

"I'll get back to you on it," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0062356

The exasperated Gregory tried another tack: "Can you describe how it's possible to oppose the president on the war on Iraq without emboldening the terrorists?"

"Yes, absolutely," Snow said. But not if it means pulling out of Iraq. "That," the spokesman said, "would embolden the terrorists."

With No Ideas, The GOP Seeks To Scare (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Wasn't it just a couple of years ago that Republicans were boasting that they were the party of ideas? They would privatize the commonwealth and globalize democracy, while Democrats clung to the tattered banner of common security in both economics and national defense. The intellectual energy in America, it seemed, was all on the right.

That, as they say, was then. In 2006 the campaigns that the Republicans are waging in their desperate attempt to retain power are so utterly devoid of ideas that it's hard to believe they ever had an idea at all.

With fewer than 60 days remaining before the November election, the only two Republican strategies left standing are to scare the public about the Democrats collectively or to slime the Democrats individually. There's nothing new about these strategies, of course, but this year they exist in a vacuum. Having run both the executive and legislative branches for the past two years with nothing but failure to show for it, the Republicans can no longer campaign as the party that will balance the budget, reform entitlements, lower energy costs, fix the immigration problem, create a more secure world or find a suitable way out of their endless war of choice in Iraq. What's left is a campaign of scaring and sliming, with the emphasis on the latter.

The scare campaign is simply harder to wage this year than it was in 2002 and 2004, when Bush, Rove and company convinced just enough voters that the Democrats couldn't be trusted to take on the terrorists. This week, for instance, House Republicans will bring up their annual resolution commemorating the horror and heroism of Sept. 11, 2001, which this year comes complete with some additional language that reaffirms their deport-'em-all approach to immigration. That, the Republicans hope, may just force some Democrats to vote no -- proof positive of their secret sympathies for al-Qaeda.

A similarly threadbare calculation lies behind the Republicans' sudden rush to force a vote on rules governing the tribunals that will judge the 14 leaders of al-Qaeda whom the president abruptly decided to put on trial. The administration's bill establishes procedures clearly designed to repulse sentient beings, such as a provision denying defendants the right to see the evidence introduced against them. The political problem for the Republicans is that there are a few sentient beings in their own ranks, notably Sens. John McCain, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, a former military reserve judge who has said that a court would strike down that provision "in 30 seconds." With McCain, Warner and Graham gumming up the works by insisting on trials that reflect the influence of the Enlightenment, Democrats have been able to stay mum on a controversy that exists only because it was supposed to embarrass them.

It was all so much simpler in the days when the Democrats' reservations about the war in Iraq could be depicted as revealing their irresolution in the fight against terror. Today, alas, most Americans see Iraq as the horrific sectarian conflict it has in fact become, and in a recent poll for Time magazine, 54 percent said our involvement there was actually hurting our efforts to combat terrorism. The president, though, persists in depicting the war as the front line in the war on jihadists; to admit otherwise would be to admit that those who propose redeploying some of our forces, as Democratic congressional leaders have advocated, aren't necessarily soft on bin Laden.

But the public isn't falling for the third iteration of the scare campaign -- not yet, anyway -- so the Republicans have fallen back on slime. According to a report in Sunday's Post by Jim VandeHei and Chris Cillizza, the National Republican Congressional Committee "plans to spend more than 90 percent of its $50 million-plus advertising budget on what officials described as negative ads" that attack Democratic candidates on their business dealings, legal battles and legislative votes that can be taken out of context.

What's a party to do when its high road leads nowhere but down? The Republicans tried privatizing Social Security, but their numbers never added up. They tried spreading democracy with unilateral, preventive war but instead unleashed a sectarian bloodbath. So the party of big ideas, of Milton Friedman and the neoconservatives, is now just one big Swift Boat flotilla, its ideas sunk of their own dead weight, kept afloat solely by its opposition research. For their part, the Democrats still champion common security; they call for a government that can build dikes and reduce the costs of college and medication and that knows that remaking the world becomes more plausible when some of the world is actually willing to go along with us. Those are, in the campaign of 2006, just about the only ideas in play.

Politics Jeopardize Ports Security Bill (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

DOJ_NMG_0062357

AP, September 12, 2006

Ports security legislation that most senators agree would make the country safer was stuck Tuesday in election-year politics as Republicans threatened to scrap it if Democrats forced in a wide range of provisions.

Facing an impasse, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist set a Thursday deadline to vote on the bill that was earlier considered a sure thing.

The Democratic plan "will kill the bill," said Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska. "We have a bipartisan bill to start with. ... All these amendments are just coming out of the sewer right now. There's just too many of them, and they're just nothing but attempts to block this bill."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said his plan would also bolster security on trains and buses and at chemical plants, strengthen U.S. intelligence missions overseas and approve all of the 9/11 Commission's recommendations, half of which are still undone.

"Let's see if they'll vote against this," said Reid, D-Nev., hoisting a thick stack of white papers.

Reid acknowledged that the port security bill, even without his additions, would be better than nothing. "But why don't we try to improve that? And that's my point. Try to improve it. That's all I'm trying to do," he said.

Voters have ranked national security among top election concerns this fall, which marks the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 terror attacks, and candidates from both parties are scrambling to portray themselves as stronger on the issue than their opponents. Congress made port security a particular priority after a February fight over a buyout that put a Dubai company in control of some operations at six American ports.

The Democratic plan would put Republicans in the awkward position of voting against security measures that many voters believe are long overdue.

Stevens, however, said the plan would delay progress on port security, including putting monitors at the nation's 22 largest seaports to screen for materials to make radiological "dirty" bombs or nuclear weapons. The bill would have to be considered by multiple congressional committees to work out differences between House and Senate bills, he said.

David Heyman, homeland security director at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the flare-up could scuttle the entire bill.

"Everybody wants to go back to their constituents and say they've done something to make us more secure," Heyman said. "If something gets done, everybody benefits. But if nothing gets done, Democrats will benefit because if you look at polls, people believe Congress isn't doing its job, and voters want change."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, testifying before a Senate panel earlier Tuesday, urged lawmakers to approve the port security legislation, calling it "a tremendous contribution" to measures the Bush administration has already undertaken.

As part of the bipartisan ports security bill, senators also approved several measures Tuesday, including:

_Requiring the government to send emergency alerts to cell phones and pagers.

_Eliminating a hiring cap on Transportation Security Administration screeners.

_Bringing the total number of new Customs and Border Protection officers to 1,000.

U.S. Can't Protect All Targets, Chertoff Says (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — Congress and the American public must accept that the government cannot protect every possible target against attack if it wants to avoid fulfilling Al Qaeda's goal of bankrupting the nation, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told a Senate committee Tuesday.

Osama bin Laden, Mr. Chertoff said, has made it clear that scaring the United States into an unsustainable spending spree is one of his aims. In a 2004 video, Mr. bin Laden, the Qaeda leader, spoke of "bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy."

"He understood that one tool he had in waging war against the United States was to drive us crazy, into bankruptcy, trying to defend ourselves against every conceivable threat," Mr. Chertoff said at a hearing of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. "We have to be realistic about what we expect and what we do. We do have limits, and we do have choices to make."

The direct reference to Mr. bin Laden echoes what is now a week's worth of tough talk by the Bush administration about him, a move Democrats call a politically motivated effort to refocus the nation, and its voters, on the war on terror instead of the troubled conflict in Iraq.

Mr. Chertoff said his message was not political, but simply a recognition of reality and the tough choices he must make.

DOJ_NMG_0062358

Moving ahead will require billions of dollars in spending to finish installation of radiation detection equipment at ports by next year, build fences or high-tech barriers at borders to control illegal immigration, enhance railroad safety programs and install new explosives detection equipment at airports.

In the short term, money will be spent to inspect all cargo packages delivered by individuals to the airports, closing what has been a loophole in the security system. The department, in the next month, will also announce new freight rail regulations for trains that carry highly toxic chemicals. The rules may limit how long railcars are allowed to sit in place and how they are built.

But the list of initiatives cannot be limitless, Mr. Chertoff said. A mandate, for example, that every cargo container headed into the United States be X-rayed and subject to a radiation scan before it leaves a foreign port to search for a possible nuclear bomb is not now feasible, he said.

Senator Frank R. Lautenberg, Democrat of New Jersey, was trying on Tuesday to persuade him to consider such an effort.

"I put my daughter in my car," Mr. Chertoff told Mr. Lautenberg. "If I wanted my daughter to be 100 percent safe, I'd put a five-mile-an-hour speed limit cap on the car." But that is not an option, he added, "because that's more safety than we can afford."

Mr. Lautenberg seemed unimpressed. "If we inspected one out of 20 people going into the White House for tours, or coming into this place, would we feel secure?" he said. "I don't think so."

Others who spoke at the hearing, including Richard A. Falkenrath, the deputy commissioner for counterterrorism at the New York City Police Department, questioned just how good a job Mr. Chertoff was doing divvying up his limited resources.

Mr. Chertoff, since he was named secretary in February 2005, has talked of the need to make spending risk-based, but his department has also been lambasted for compiling a list of possible targets that included a petting zoo, a bourbon festival and a popcorn factory, while at the same time it cut antiterrorism grants to high-risk cities like Washington and New York.

Mr. Falkenrath said the department was focusing too much on screening cargo containers, when the greater threat in American ports, like the attack on the destroyer Cole in Yemen in 2000 showed, was from a small boat packed with explosives pulling up aside a ship or a ferry. It is spending $9 on security per airplane passenger, he said, but less than half a penny on each mass transit rider.

"There's something wrong with this," said Mr. Falkenrath, a former White House deputy homeland security adviser. "Terrorists are attacking the subway system worldwide."

Newly Banned Items Often Fly Past Airport Screeners (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

Wendy Shanker was passing through security at the St. Louis airport Friday when the X-ray machine detected a potential weapon inside her carry-on bag. A screener dug into the satchel and found a pair of scissors that Shanker used for knitting. The scissors' blades were shorter than the 4-inch federal limit so the screener plopped them back into the bag.

But he missed something else: Shanker's two-ounce container of Neutrogena hand cream, a substance banned since federal authorities clamped down last month on allowing liquids and gels into airline passenger cabins.

"They focused in on the scissors and didn't seem to see the cream," said Shanker, who didn't realize it was in her bag until she was on her way to Washington Dulles International Airport.

Like Shanker, many people are inadvertently taking banned liquids and gels through security in their pockets and carry-on luggage, according to interviews with several dozen travelers at local airports and with pilots and security officials.

Others, however, say they're simply not going to tolerate the new rules. They admit that they ignore the restrictions, slipping expensive cologne, perfume, lip gloss, lotion and other ointments into their carry-on bags or into their pockets in hopes of sneaking them past security. Some of the items get flagged by screeners, others do not.

Unlike Shanker, the cream and liquid smugglers refused to give their full names. One woman said she slipped her Blistex lip balm into a pocket because her lips dry out on flights; another stashed her perfume in her carry-on because she didn't trust baggage handlers; another kept a small container of body lotion in her purse to apply in the aircraft lavatory.

A business executive said he always traveled with hand sanitizer in his pocket because he worries about germs on planes. He has made about 10 trips since the restrictions went into effect and hasn't been caught.

Since the rules went into effect, most travelers have abided by the law, packing their hand cream, hair gel and toothpaste in their checked luggage or leaving the items at home. The flouters, however, say they hate the hassle of long waits at baggage carousels and worry that their expensive bottles of perfume will be broken or stolen if placed in their checked luggage.

A 33-year-old teacher, who was traveling with her 7-year-old son and 9-year-old daughter, brought her cosmetics case in her backpack on a trip from Orlando to Dulles Friday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0062359

She would give only her first name, Nicole, saying that she worried about getting in trouble. At first, she admitted to a reporter that she was carrying a $75 hydrating gel in her backpack. Then, she revealed lip gloss, toothpaste, a bottle of expensive Chanel perfume and a $300 container of facial cleanser neatly packed in a bulging cosmetic case. Screeners never noticed the items, which she had no intention of checking, she said.

"There is no way I'm putting my Chanel in a checked bag," she said. Then she looked down at her two children: "Who knows what's in their bags?"

The federal government banned most gels and liquids from passenger cabins last month after British authorities said they had foiled a plot to bomb transatlantic flights with liquid explosives. Officials with the Transportation Security Administration said they were confident their security efforts in place at the time would have prevented the plotters from getting through security checkpoints at U.S. airports. But they said they couldn't take any chances and hastily enacted the ban early on Aug. 10.

TSA officials have no way of tracking people who succeed in disobeying the ban, but screeners have caught people trying to sneak items through checkpoints, said Ellen Howe, an agency spokeswoman. Anyone caught could face fines of several hundred dollars, Howe said, although she said it was too difficult to determine whether any fines have been levied.

TSA officials point to a 20 percent increase in checked bags as an indication that most travelers seem to be complying with the rules.

"Travelers must realize this isn't a game," Howe said. "The threat is real and it continues, and we appreciate the public's cooperation. Is it the perfect system? No. But does it make it right to sneak things through security? No, it doesn't."

Security experts said the experiences of travelers interviewed at Reagan National and Dulles airports highlighted what they say are security gaps in the current product bans. A well-trained screener must notice the sometimes-subtle signatures of containers of gels and liquids on X-ray machines. The devices are much better at picking up the shapes of dense and metal objects, such as knives, guns or bomb components, security experts said.

Metal detectors at security checkpoints cannot sense plastic items that may contain liquids or gels.

"There are obviously limitations to this ban," said Clark Kent Ervin, a former inspector general at the Department of Homeland Security.

Ervin supports the restrictions but thinks they are flawed because authorities rely heavily on screeners' interpretations of X-ray images.

"It depends entirely on screeners' alertness and training," he said, "and there are problems with both."

Pilots groups have criticized the measures, saying they notice the security holes all the time. They say authorities should focus more on developing systems to identify potential terrorists, not just their weapons.

Gary Boettcher, a pilot and president of the Coalition for Airline Pilots Association, a trade group that closely tracks security issues, said he constantly sees people drinking from illicit bottles of water or putting on lip gloss when he walks through the passenger cabin. Most of the time, he said, it doesn't bother him.

"They are just doing their routines like they always did," Boettcher said. "An old woman drinking a bottle of water doesn't concern me. . . . The whole screening process is a facade to make the public feel safe, to show that the government is doing something."

Passengers said they didn't feel any safer after reaching their destination and realizing they had inadvertently left a banned item in their carry-on bags.

Libby Cole, 21, who flew into Dulles from Vermont on Friday, said she rushed to catch an early plane and didn't know until she landed that she had two lip glosses in her carry-on bag.

On a past trip, TSA screeners caught one out of two lip glosses, she said.

"I don't think this does anything, because obviously, if this can get through," she said, holding onto one of her lip glosses. "I think it's just kind of a pain."

Backups From Ban At Airport Checkpoints Short-lived (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Security lines at U.S. airports returned to normal less than a week after a terror scare last month created some of the worst checkpoint backups ever, a USA TODAY analysis of security data shows.

Transportation Security Administration (TSA) records show that five days after airline passengers were barred from carrying most liquids on airplanes, security lines wereroutine at almost all of thenation's 80 major airports.

Travelers waited 90 minutes or more at 13 of the airports on Aug. 10, when the ban took effect after British authorities said they stopped an alleged plot to bomb U.S.-bound airplanes using liquid explosives. Five airports had lines of two hours or more, the data show.

By Aug. 15, only four airports had lines exceeding 30 minutes.

The fast rebound "gives the TSA wiggle time to test and deploy technology that will deal with liquid explosives," said aviation-security consultant Douglas Laird. "The public isn't going crazy."

The TSA has said the ban will remain in place indefinitely.

Many passengers are using checked luggage instead of carry-on bags. Mike Restovich, TSA's security-operations chief, said the reduction in carry-ons helped checkpoint lines come "back to normalcy" by giving screeners fewer bags to check.

Caleb Tiller of the National Business Travel Association said the TSA did a good job explaining the ban after early confusion. The rules "are well-understood," Tiller said.

Many travelers now spend extra time waiting to check and retrieve luggage, he said.

Timing helped ease lines. Late August and September are slow air-travel periods. Some airlines lost passenger volume after Aug. 10, said James May, CEO of the Air Transport Association, an airline trade group.

Orlando International Airport screener Don Thomas said travelers are following the liquid ban "surprisingly well." Even so, he warned, "If it was holiday time, it would be really bad."

Man Seized On Flight To Dulles (WP)

By Martin Weil

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

An unruly passenger who reportedly tried to yank open a cabin door in an airliner en route to Washington was jumped last night by fellow passengers who helped federal air marshals subdue him.

United Flight 890, from Los Angeles, was about two hours from Dulles International Airport when the incident occurred about 6:30 p.m. EDT. The full Airbus 320 arrived a few minutes early, officials said.

The man, who reportedly wore a camouflage jacket and spoke Portuguese, was questioned at Dulles last night by airport police, according to an airport spokeswoman.

No motive was readily apparent, but a spokeswoman for the FBI emphasized that the incident was not terrorism-related.

"There is no terrorism nexus," she said.

The plane, which according to a Web site can carry 180 passengers, left Los Angeles at 12:50 p.m. PDT. About halfway into the flight, shouting broke out in the rear of the cabin, a passenger said after arriving at Dulles.

The man "was pulling on the rear-door release handle," said the passenger, Stephen Lockwood of Northern Virginia.

A flight attendant ordered the man to stop, but he continued to pull on the handle.

Two or three passengers standing nearby intervened, Lockwood said he was told by others onboard.

"They jumped him," Lockwood said. "He resisted," and a vigorous scuffle ensued.

"The guy took quite a beating," Lockwood said. No one else was reported injured.

Out of the tumult, the passenger said, a federal air marshal appeared. He showed his shield and placed plastic handcuffs on the man.

"The passengers clapped when they took him forward," Lockwood said.

Amy Kudwa, a spokeswoman for the Transportation Security Administration, said that she lacked details of the incident but that she understood two air marshals had subdued the man.

It was not clear how often air marshals have been called on to subdue passengers on flights into or out of Washington. The number of flights that carry marshals is not disclosed.

Intervening in such situations is "part of [the air marshals'] mission, Kudwa said.

It also was not clear whether the door could have been opened in flight. Lockwood said he was told later by airline personnel that the doors cannot be opened while the cabin is pressurized.

According to Lockwood, the man was taken to the first-class section of the airplane, where at least one passenger talked with him in Portuguese.

Courtney Prebich, a spokeswoman for the Metropolitan Washington Airports Authority, which operates both Dulles and Reagan National Airport, said airport police were called to meet the plane upon its arrival.

An FBI spokeswoman said the bureau was interviewing the unruly passenger last night. She said few details were immediately available.

Then and now

DOJ_NMG_0062361

"Back in 2003, when CBS planned to broadcast a docudrama titled 'The Reagans,' which smeared Ronald and Nancy Reagan, I wrote a column for National Review Online condemning it," Ed Morrow writes at www.nationalreview.com.

"I advised viewers to not watch it and to write CBS protesting its broadcast. In the last few days, I've had the dubious pleasure of having that column quoted by Clintonites attacking ABC's 'The Path to 9/11.' Supposedly, conservatives like me, who criticized the Reagan smear, are hypocrites for not objecting to this miniseries because Bill Clinton and members of his administration believe it falsely depicts their actions before 9/11," Mr. Morrow said.

"But those who cry hypocrisy are often the most splendid hypocrites. I don't recall many liberals leaping to Reagan's defense. ...

"Now, when the Clinton administration appears to be getting a little rough treatment, conservatives are supposed to saddle up and ride to their rescue. ...

"While the Democrats have complained the most about 'The Path to 9/11,' the Bush administration doesn't get reverential treatment in it. ... Wisely, the Republicans didn't demand the editing that the Democrats have. To put it mildly, the Democrats went nuts.

"Clinton's lawyers threatened to sue, and various Democratic congressmen and senators promised to use their offices to punish ABC. In protesting 'The Reagans,' conservative critics called for a boycott and strove to expose its falsehoods.

"I don't recall anyone setting a pack of lawyers on CBS, or Republican politicians threatening to use the power of the federal government to put them out of business. The heavy-handed tactics of the Democrats have gotten them the changes they wanted, but have left the impression that the miniseries was gutted to hide errors made by Clinton that might politically damage the Democratic Party."

He's back

Filmmaker Oliver Stone, who surprised many with the patriotic flavor of his new film "World Trade Center," hinted in Moscow on Monday that he is considering a more controversial follow-up investigating the "conspiracy" around September 11.

"There is a great story in a movie, a conspiracy by a group of people in the American administration who have an agenda and who used 9/11 to further that agenda," he told reporters in Russia.

There could be a "fascinating project [on] what happened after September 11," the director said at his packed press conference on the fifth anniversary of the attacks.

Mr. Stone accused President Bush of mishandling the fight against Osama bin Laden's terrorists and using the crisis to stoke fear and bolster his own power at home in a way that was "right out of George Orwell."

A confession

The campaign of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's Democratic rival acknowledged yesterday that it downloaded -- and leaked to the press -- a recording of a private meeting in which the governor described a Hispanic legislator as having a "very hot" personality.

But Cathy Calfo, campaign manager for Democrat Phil Angelides, said the campaign had done nothing wrong because the file was available publicly on the governor's Web site.

"No one hacked," the spokeswoman said at a press conference to address the role played by the Angelides campaign, first reported by the Sacramento (Calif.) Bee. "They accessed information that was available to the public."

However, Mr. Schwarzenegger's legal-affairs secretary, Andrea Lynn Hoch, said Monday that the sound files were stored "in a password-protected area of the governor's office network computer system." She said she forwarded the Internet protocol address used to download the file to the California Highway Patrol, which is investigating how the files became public.

Sounds familiar

Republican Vernon Robinson, who describes himself as a black Jesse Helms, is mimicking the former North Carolina senator's most famous ad in his first foray into television.

In his 1990 victory over former Charlotte Mayor Harvey Gantt, Mr. Helms depicted a pair of white hands crumpling a job rejection letter. "You needed that job," Mr. Helms' ad said. "And you were the best qualified. But they had to give it to a minority because of a racial quota."

Mr. Robinson, who counts the former Republican senator as a political idol, shows a pair of black hands crumpling a letter.

"You needed that job," the ad says. "And you were the best qualified. But they gave it to an illegal alien so they could pay him under the table."

Mr. Robinson, a long-shot candidate for a U.S. House seat from North Carolina, invested $30,000 in the cable television spot, the Associated Press reports.

Casey's ad

Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, wrote that both parents shouldn't work outside the home if they can survive on one income. Democratic rival Bob Casey is using those words against him.

DOJ_NMG_0062362

Mr. Casey started a statewide television ad campaign yesterday featuring Debbie Balcik, a working mother who argues that the comment is ridiculous.

"He doesn't understand how hard it is in order to make ends meet," Mrs. Balcik says. "I would like Rick Santorum to come to my house at the end of the month when we're doing our bills and tell me how we can live on one income. I'm not like a U.S. senator. I can't vote my own pay raise."

Mr. Casey, the state treasurer, is challenging Mr. Santorum, the No. 3 Senate Republican, in one of the nation's most competitive races.

The ad refers to a passage in Mr. Santorum's book, "It Takes a Family: Conservatism and the Common Good," which was published last year.

In it, Mr. Santorum writes, "In far too many families with young children, both parents are working, when, if they really took an honest look at the budget, they might confess that both of them really don't need to, or at least may not need to work as much as they do."

Virginia Davis, a Santorum spokeswoman, said Mr. Casey was taking the words out of context, the Associated Press reports.

A proud voter

If Hillary Rodham Clinton was in doubt, Sen. Charles E. Schumer assured the senator she had his vote in yesterday's Democratic primary.

Mr. Schumer hosted a press conference on port security, and explained his fellow New York Democrat's absence was a result of her primary election.

Asked by a reporter if he had voted for the former first lady, Mr. Schumer grinned.

"I did, and proudly," he said.

The Rise Of The Homeland Security Practice (LAW)

By Joe Crea, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 13, 2006

As he surveyed the lifeless bodies surrounding him, André Hollis was certain he should have been one of them.

The windows of his office in the E-ring on the second floor were blown in, and 22 co-workers in neighboring offices were killed. Combined with the passengers on American Airlines Flight 77 that crashed into the Pentagon that morning, a total of 189 people perished at the nation's military headquarters.

By dumb luck, Hollis says, he was at a conference in northern Virginia's Crystal City the morning of the attacks. The former deputy assistant secretary of defense for counternarcotics eventually worked his way back to the Pentagon, where he navigated the shattered complex, helping the wounded out and onto the south parking lot until 2 the next morning.

For Hollis, who is now a homeland security lobbyist at Van Scoyoc Associates, the work he currently does has distinct meaning: "It's personal," he says, clasping his hands together and banging them firmly and repeatedly on a table as his eyes close. "It's personal."

With photos of three close friends killed in the Iraq and Afghanistan wars pasted on a side panel of a bookshelf in his office, in clear view of his desk, Hollis says it's a challenge not to sound too fatalistic to potential clients about the dangers the country still faces. "I remember walking through the Pentagon, and I couldn't see my hands," he says of the smoke that surrounded him.

The attacks of Sept. 11 gave rise to a new world on K Street: the homeland security practice. Born out of the tragedy are scores of lawyers and lobbyists fine-tuning their young practices at some of the top firms in town, such as Van Scoyoc and McKenna Long & Aldridge.

"It's truly an outgrowth of 9/11, and then again it isn't," says Joe Whitley, a partner at Alston & Bird and the first general counsel at the Department of Homeland Security. "So much of what is being packaged as homeland security is a lot of old wine -- old wine and some new wine in a new bottle."

LONG-TERM SECURITY

The Department of Homeland Security was officially launched in March 2003, dumping 22 legacy agencies with different philosophies and temperaments, including the Federal Emergency Management Agency, United States Customs and Border Protection, the Coast Guard and the Secret Service, under one giant umbrella. The Cabinet-level agency is already on its second secretary, Michael Chertoff.

"They each have unique cultures that have been utterly changed by being pushed together," says Hunton & Williams partner Steven Solow, whose homeland security practice primarily involves the area of risk management and integration of security matters with regulatory issues. "It's obviously a work in progress, which isn't always pretty, but it's what we have and what we have to learn to work through."

Many lobbyists say they are motivated to work in this field by a desire to protect and secure the nation. But money is not a bad motivator, either.

Bruce Aitken, president of the nonprofit Homeland Security Industries Association, says that before Sept. 11, homeland security was a $5 billion-a-year government-contracting industry. When Congress passed an aviation security bill in November 2001, the measure moved $50 billion from the private sector into government contracting.

And the money is still increasing.

According to the Homeland Security Research Corp. (HSRC), the United States and the international community spent $44 billion on homeland security in 2005. The research firm estimates that by 2015, $174 billion will be dished out globally. The statistics are based on an "ongoing crisis" scenario, a "medium-level, painful but not devastating terrorist activity," according to HSRC reports.

"Our worst nightmare has already happened in other countries, and, I'm sad to say, once that happens here you will see a huge public outcry," says Aitken, who is also co-chairman of Aitken Berlin. "We will get attacked again, and at some point al-Qaida will stop trying to throw the proverbial Hail Mary by going after monuments and will go after shopping malls and frighten the hell out of the public."

Though fortunes are already being made now by smaller companies, Aitken predicts they will increase exponentially should a series of attacks by terrorists occur against institutions like churches and sports arenas.

But entering this line of work is anything but simple. Since the terrorist attacks, Washington firms have all too easily slapped the homeland security label onto their marketing brochures, but lobbyists and lawyers entrenched in the daily grind say the work is difficult and the three-year-old department is a maze. And the big matters at hand often involve the nuances of regulation and compliance law versus contract acquisition and appropriations. The Washington firm Cassidy & Associates, for example, has branded its practice a "national security" one, claiming on its Web site that the practice is more comprehensive than a straight defense or homeland security one.

"Many firms want a homeland security practice, although they may not fully know what that entails," says Jason Klitenic, a partner at McKenna Long & Aldridge who was the former deputy general counsel at DHS, the agency's second-ranking legal officer.

CHECKING THE BOXES

And, indeed, the work is difficult and better suited to a law firm with a lobby practice than a nonlaw firm like Van Scoyoc or Cassidy, some say.

"I think a law firm has a lot more in the way of resources to draw on, particularly if they have a robust government contracts practice," says James Burnley IV, a partner in Venable's homeland security group and secretary of transportation during the Reagan administration. "Mostly, lobby firms hold themselves out as being helpful, but you really have to have lawyers who practice in the government-contract field."

But Gregg Hartley, a lobbyist at Cassidy, disagrees. "If you're a general lobbyist like me ... I have great Hill connections. I won't be helpful, personally, to help someone get a contract at Homeland Security or the Pentagon," he says, "but I don't think a lawyer who knows the regulatory process will be beneficial, as well. But the people who know how to get you down that corridor to get those boxes checked are the people who've worked in that process before."

Some firms, such as DLA Piper, began establishing practices shortly after the terrorist attacks. Former Rep. Dick Armey, R-Texas, who joined DLA Piper in January 2003, was hired primarily because he was involved early on in creating the department.

But Armey, who co-chairs the firm's homeland security practice, says no one knew in the early days of the practice how the new department was going to develop. Armey, who was involved in one of the biggest overhauls of government since the Department of Defense was created a half-century ago, is surprised at the different shapes the department has taken.

"The initial attitude that prevailed on K Street was that this was going to be a big market and everyone was going to be selling something," he says. "Well, areas like compliance and regulations have become much more important. The work is deeper than it is a matter of schmoozing the client through the appropriations process."

Of chief frustration to many lawyers and lobbyists is figuring out who at the department is in charge of what.

"This is often the most challenging assignment," says Burnley. "They've reorganized reporting relationships in the short history of the department, and they've had a fair amount of turnover. They get burned out."

Van Scoyoc has sought to minimize this roadblock by hiring Tim Cook, who spent 20 years in the Coast Guard, three of them as the Coast Guard Senate liaison officer. He specializes in homeland security along with Hollis.

"Your access and assistance to them [officials at Homeland Security] will be based primarily on personal relationships," says Cook. "If you don't have that with the upper leadership like André [Hollis] does, or with lower folks like me, you won't be as successful."

Lawyers and lobbyists have also found success in other aspects.

DOJ_NMG_0062364

Brian Finch, a former homeland security attorney at McKenna, joined Dickstein Shapiro's homeland security practice this year and has done work with companies seeking liability exemptions for products with an anti-terror component.

But even in the short time this practice has been around, there's even been turnover on K Street. Mark Holman, a former senior principal at Blank Rome and deputy assistant to the president at the White House Office of Homeland Security, has returned to Pennsylvania to work on Lynn Swann's Republican bid for governor. And Asa Hutchinson, the former undersecretary of Homeland Security who used to run Venable's practice group, is running on the Republican ticket for governor of Arkansas.

But for now, lawyers and lobbyists just want some stability at the new department.

"Hopefully, more people are thinking of staying rather than leaving," says Whitley. "The knowledge of the agency is hard to come by when you don't have that many people who've been there for a while. Some think it will take eight years for the department to be on its sea legs."

New Orleans Mayor Pleads For Patience In Meeting Goals (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 12 — Another anniversary passed for Mayor C. Ray Nagin on Tuesday — the first 100 days since his re-election — with a plea from him for patience and "perspective" amid continued restiveness over the city's slow recovery from Hurricane Katrina and his role in it.

After his election victory May 20, Mr. Nagin pledged a strong focus on improving services in his first 100 days. Three of his electoral rivals, two of whom were regarded as policy heavyweights during the campaign, signed on as unpaid advisers.

But two blocks from City Hall, street signs are still askew from last summer's storm, some traffic lights downtown are nothing but boxes of dangling wires and previously bustling storefronts in the Central Business District remain empty.

The message Tuesday was mixed, the mayor's advisers recited what they pictured as a litany of progress, even as Mr. Nagin repeatedly reminded the reporters at a news conference in City Hall of the size of the remaining recovery effort, "a task of epic proportions," as he put it.

"No one has gone through what we've gone through," the mayor said. "The road to recovery is long and arduous."

The mayor has frequently been out of town: fund-raising in Philadelphia, drumming up investment in New York and speechmaking in Indianapolis, among other trips. His absences have become a target of jokes and speculation.

A radio talk-show host here calls him "Ray Nay-gone," and a new Web site, wheres<129>nagin.com, chronicles his travels side-by-side with a list of the city's yawning potholes.

Reporting on the first three months of his second term, Mr. Nagin appeared unfazed by recent jibes, casually dismissing reports of a recall effort and mixing in breezy cheerleading with reminders of difficulties that remain. He was at pains, though, to reassure citizens that "things are starting to pick up" and that he was on the job.

Mr. Nagin put forward a dual message Tuesday: while insisting that he is working hard, he also emphasized his trademark laissez-faire approach. It is not he but the "citizens" who are in the driver's seat in the city's recovery, the mayor said.

He said he did not plan to dictate the city's contours, or where citizens could live, even though many neighborhoods remain vulnerable and devastated by last year's storm.

"We chose to go forward with a market-driven recovery effort," Mr. Nagin said. "I believe citizens can make intelligent decisions about where to live. It is my position that government investment will follow citizen investment."

In practice, this means, as Mr. Nagin put it, that "for the most part the redevelopment of our city is going to be done by our citizens." With more than half the city's pre-hurricane population still elsewhere, including many of its poorest citizens, early indications are that it is mostly those with some resources who have been able to move back.

Against that hands-off stance, several advisers were left to chronicle small steps forward. Water pressure has improved to pre-storm levels, one said. Murders dropped in August. Most abandoned cars have been picked up. Sales taxes are at 77 percent of pre-storm levels.

The city has begun to cite homeowners who fail to comply with a one-year deadline for the cleanup and gutting of flooded houses. Universities are functioning, though enrollment is down. The city's bonds have "junk" status, but Moody's recently upgraded the city's debt rating to "stable," officials said.

Still, the city has a "huge cash flow need," said the mayor's economic adviser, Virginia Boulet. "We've got to find billions of dollars to fund the recovery of New Orleans," she said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has paid only 247 of 806 claims by the city, though 634 have been approved, said Ms. Boulet, a former challenger of Mr. Nagin.

Meanwhile, Mr. Nagin pleaded for patience. "Everybody wants it to happen yesterday,'' he said, "and it's just not going to happen yesterday."

Residents Will Define New Orleans' Recovery Plan (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, September 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — City government will not design a new look for Katrina-flooded neighborhoods, nor will residents be told where they can rebuild, Mayor Ray Nagin said Tuesday in a briefing on the first 100 days of his second term in office.

"For the most part, recovery will be done by citizens' investment," Nagin said. "We are giving all citizens the right and opportunity to return home."

Responding to criticism that the city's recovery is slow in part because there is no blueprint for rebuilding, Nagin said he'll have a comprehensive plan by the end of the year. But he said the city is taking "the road less traveled" by allowing residents to decide where they want to live.

"There are very few areas where we will be totally redesigning this city," he said.

The Urban Land Institute, which Nagin hired to come up with ideas, recommended last fall that some hard-hit areas be closed to redevelopment. Less than half the population of New Orleans has returned since Katrina flooded 80% of the city for weeks. Shrinking the city's footprint would save money and encourage development on higher ground, the institute said.

"We chose a market-driven effort" instead, said Nagin, who rejected the recommendations last winter.

Gary Solomon, who served on Nagin's Bring New Orleans Back Commission, said there is still no direction in the city's recovery. "If every street is allowed to be rebuilt and there's less people here, something doesn't make sense to me," he said.

When he was re-elected, Nagin vowed to make measurable progress in the first 100 days of his second term. That period ended Friday. He cited improvements in water pressure, which had been so low that many businesses were forced to close for a day or more. He also said the city has begun to cite residents who missed a deadline for gutting flooded homes and businesses.

Many challenges remain, Nagin said. Katrina left the city's government with damage totaling almost $500 million, including more than 350 damaged or destroyed city buildings.

WAR NEWS:

Rice Says Afghanistan Needs World's Help (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 12, 2006

STELLARTON, Nova Scotia - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice acknowledged "difficult going" fighting a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, but insisted Tuesday that the world cannot afford to pull out now.

"We owe it to the people of Afghanistan to help them finish the job," Rice said as she thanked Canada for its role as a leader of NATO forces in the country. Canada's combat role is unpopular at home, as is the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

Afghanistan is struggling with the deadliest militant violence since U.S.-led forces toppled the hard-line Taliban regime five years ago. The United States blamed the Taliban for incubating al-Qaida as a terrorist force and for harboring Osama bin Laden after the Sept 11., 2001 terrorist attacks.

Canada has 2,200 troops in Afghanistan and has lost at least five soldiers there.

Opponents of the Afghanistan mission suggested Rice's visit to Canada was an attempt to persuade Canada to commit more forces. But Rice and her host, Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, said she made no such request.

"I know it's very difficult going in Afghanistan," Rice said in an address to Conservative supporters and others in this small town north of Halifax.

MacKay invited Rice to accompany him to his home district where polite but cheeky protests greeted the pair.

"Condi, We Don't Want Your War Machine," read one sign hoisted along the road to a museum Rice and MacKay visited. Other signs made light of the tandem visit by the two unmarried diplomats. "Condi + Peter Make Love Not War," read one, decorated with a large, red heart.

During a news conference with MacKay, Rice said the United States left too soon after supporting Afghanistan in the 1980s civil war. "Afghanistan became a failed state" and a haven for terrorism, Rice said. "We all came to pay for that."

The deadliest fighting since the fall of the Taliban government has killed more than 500 people, mostly militants, since mid-May and confirmed fears of a Taliban military resurgence in southern Afghanistan, where NATO took command from a U.S.-led coalition on Aug. 1.

Britain, Canada and the Netherlands have taken lead roles, pumping in around 8,000 troops and bringing NATO forces in Afghanistan to about 20,000. The alliance claims to have inflicted grave insurgent losses, including more than 250 in an offensive near Kandahar this month.

But at least 35 British and Canadian soldiers have died in a little more than a month, and militants show no signs of giving up.

Don't Abandon Afghanistan, Says US, As NATO Digs Around For Back-up (AFP)

AFP, September 12, 2006

On the eve of a NATO meeting to round up more troops for Afghanistan, US officials urged its partners there to stay the course, amid fresh fighting and kidnappings in the turbulent country.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a rallying call not to abandon Afghanistan as it struggles to build a stable democracy.

"If you allow a failed state in that strategic location, you will pay for it," she warned, speaking on a trip to Canada where she expressed her gratitude for Canada's 2,300-strong troop deployment to Afghanistan.

Her comments coincided with stark warnings of the threat posed by the fighters of the Islamist Taliban militia who are waging a bitter insurgency against foreign forces posted there after the Taliban was ousted from power in 2001.

Addressing European parliamentarians in Brussels, Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf said the Taliban had overtaken Osama bin Laden's Al-Qaeda network as his region's biggest threat to security.

With NATO countries set on Wednesday to discuss finding extra troops to shore up their deployments in Afghanistan, a senior US official said it was too soon to know details of likely reinforcements.

Richard Boucher, the assistant US secretary of state for south and central Asian affairs, told journalists in Brussels that it was "probably a little too early" to "draw any conclusions about the efforts to get more troops".

He highlighted the dangerous situation in Afghanistan, where NATO and Afghan forces are making forays into areas held by Taliban fighters.

"As we challenged them in these areas they've challenged us back and there's been a high level of violence," Boucher said, speaking at the US embassy here.

His comments came ahead of Wednesday's meeting at NATO's military headquarters in Belgium aimed at drumming up more troops for Afghanistan.

The alliance's military chief, US General James Jones, has called for reinforcements of up to 2,500 troops to deal with increasing Taliban attacks.

The situation on the ground in the war-ravaged central Asian country turned grimmer meanwhile, as NATO pressed on with a major offensive.

Security forces killed 26 Taliban rebels and captured 28 others in separate operations across Afghanistan. Rights groups said at least 25 Afghan civilians were believed killed and 7,000 families displaced in the southern province of Kandahar since the start of the NATO operation this month.

Elsewhere, police said unknown assailants had kidnapped a Colombian aid worker and two Afghan colleagues employed by a French organisation in Wardak province, central Afghanistan.

In Britain, Lieutenant General David Richards, commander of NATO's International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan, insisted the war against the Taliban was being won, even as the bodies of 14 British airmen who died in a plane crash in Afghanistan were brought home.

The Taliban regime was toppled by US-led forces weeks after the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States. The US accused it of providing a safe haven for the Al-Qaeda network and its leader, Osama bin Laden, blamed for the attacks.

NATO now leads more than 8,000 troops in the restive south, and some 20,000 more soldiers from 37 countries deployed throughout Afghanistan. Nevertheless, the Taliban have dramatically stepped up their insurgency this year.

In Cuba, a summit of countries of the Non-Aligned Movement issued a draft closing statement expressing support for Kabul and their "profound" concern over "terrorist groups including former Taliban" in the south and east of Afghanistan.

Nato Plea For Afghan Troops Is Rebuffed (FT)

By Stephen Fidler, Daniel Dombey, Neil MacDonald, Mark Mulligan, And Hugh Williamson In Berlin And Tony Barber

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Nato's plans to provide reinforcements for its hard-pressed troops in Afghanistan suffered a setback on Tuesday, as a series of countries ruled out providing further soldiers and controversy mounted over the alliance's tactics.

Officials conceded that a meeting on Wednesday, intended to obtain pledges for up to 2,500 extra soldiers, was extremely unlikely to meet its target.

Last week, General James Jones, Nato's military chief, called for the reinforcements – to be led by a 1,000-strong reserve battalion – as a matter of urgency. At present Nato has 20,000 soldiers in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0062367

"We do not have the capacity to send more," said a German defence ministry spokesman. "Our upper limit remains 3,000 troops and we already have almost 2,900 on the ground."

Turkey has also said it will not be able to provide further soldiers, having just announced it is sending 1,000 troops for the new United Nations force in Lebanon.

Italy, which is making the biggest contribution to the Lebanon force, is in a similar position. And this week, José Antonio Alonso, Spain's defence minister, said his country's 690 troops in Afghanistan were "more than sufficient".

Nato has even sought troops from Serbia, the country it fought a war against in 1999.

But Zoran Stankovic, defence minister, says Belgrade is offering fewer than five mid-rank officers, with technical roles in airport security and logistics.

The lack of response makes it more likely that the UK will, in the words of one military analyst, have to "cobble together a battle group" of perhaps 900 troops to augment Nato's forces. Canada is reportedly planning to reinforce its contingent of 2,300 with 15 heavy tanks and 300 personnel.

Meanwhile, an internal dispute is mounting over Nato's tough fighting tactics, which have seen the alliance claim it has killed hundreds of Taliban in an offensive around the southern city of Kandahar this month.

"I have doubts about our military strategy," said one Nato official, who argued that the alliance could have focused more on development.

Even American officials have questioned whether such an approach – in part designed to emphasise that the Taliban is a losing cause – is sustainable in current circumstances.

"The level of fighting has not been a result of a change in our strategy but because the circumstances on the ground require it," said an official with Nato's forces in Afghanistan.

He emphasised that Lieutenant General David Richards, the head of the alliance's force in the country, still spent the bulk of his time on development issues.

Taliban Adopting Iraq-style Jihad (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 13, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN

Even in near-total darkness, the wounded Taliban fighter insists on masking his identity, his head and face covered by a tightly wound white cloth. Only two bright eyes and a confident voice tell how Afghanistan's Islamist militants are ramping up their fight against US and NATO forces.

He speaks a warning, of how the "new" Taliban has become more radical, more sophisticated, and more brutal than the Taliban ousted by US-led forces in 2001 - and of how its jihadist agenda now mirrors that of Al Qaeda, stretching far beyond Afghanistan.

Among the keys to the Taliban resurgence - which is sparking lethal violence on a scale unknown here for almost five years - are crucial lessons drawn from Iraq.

"That's part of our strategy - we are trying to bring [the Iraqi model] to Afghanistan," says the fighter. "Things will get worse here."

Those "things" include suicide attacks, assassinations of government officials, moderate clerics, and civilians, along with guerrilla tactics now in use against Western forces in the southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, where NATO claims to have killed more than 500 insurgents in 10 days of intense fighting.

Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf, speaking in Brussels Tuesday, said the Taliban now pose a greater danger than Al Qaeda. "The center of gravity of terrorism has shifted from al Qaeda to the Taliban," he told European lawmakers."

"This is a new element, a more dangerous element, because it [the Taliban] has its roots in the people. Al Qaeda didn't have roots in the people," he said.

On Tuesday, Afghan police said that they had arrested more than 30 people suspected of planning attacks; the US military reported detaining eight others.

"The Taliban have tried their best to avoid murdering civilians, but they finally found if they don't get active, they will lose this opportunity" to attack "infidel" Western troops, says the fighter. "Now you are seeing explosions everywhere."

Among the most recent suicide attacks was one near the US Embassy last Friday, killing two US soldiers and 14 Afghans.

"I'm very happy about the murder of the Americans, though I am a little bit sad about the death of the Afghans - but this is wartime," says the fighter matter-of-factly. Such deaths, he says, are "inevitable," even if they cause a popular backlash.

DOJ_NMG_0062368

"The shift has taken place," warns Hekmat Karzai, head of the Center for Conflict and Peace Studies (CAPS) in Kabul, which analyzes terrorism trends. The Taliban still have local concerns, he says, but embrace global jihad as never before and believe in encouraging a "clash of civilizations."

"Taliban commanders talk of jihad in Fallujah in the same terms they speak of jihad in [the eastern Afghan province of] Kunar," says Mr. Karzai. "They think: 'Just as they are battling there, we are battling here.' "

Figures tabulated by CAPS indicate a recent 60 percent increase in attacks across Afghanistan, from 85 in July to 136 in August. Police have borne the brunt, with deaths jumping more than fourfold in that period. Civilian deaths have tripled, with 92 losing their lives in August.

"The world is small now, and just as McDonald's is being globalized ... so can violence be transmitted from one place to another," says Waheed Mozhdah, a Taliban-era Foreign Affairs Ministry official, and author on the Taliban.

"The tactics have been imported from Iraq: suicide bombers, remote-controlled roadside bombs," says Mr. Mozhdah. "These things we didn't have in the [past] jihad, and they have been very effective...."

Other tactics have also changed. Prior to 2001, the Taliban would take on the Northern Alliance by charging through their front lines - despite high casualties from mines. Today, they use more guerrilla-style strikes.

Another factor chills many Afghans. "[The Taliban] have become more violent. They slaughter people, beheading them, and this didn't exist before," says Mozhdah. "They used to regard video cameras as haram [forbidden by religion], but now they use these videos as a tool. It shows how Al Qaeda has affected the Taliban."

Indeed, coming from a group that in the late 1990s draped checkpoints with wads of magnetic tape - pulled from video and music cassettes banned by the Taliban - that is quite a change. Recent videos show commanders, including, apparently, the rarely seen fugitive Taliban chief Mullah Omar - directing operations from the front line. In one, Mr. Omar is shown with binoculars, inspecting a small rocket launcher in a bid to counter charges of cowardice from President Hamid Karzai.

Other footage shows one Afghan suicide bomber after another - as well as at least one Pakistani - making strident statements and collecting chits for their explosives. The clips also list the number of "crusader troops" killed in each attack.

But even by the gruesome standards of global jihad, which include taped beheadings by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq, and similar deaths of Russians by Chechen militants, the Taliban footage is brutal.

"The greatest achievement of video like that is to instill fear in the hearts of the population, making them believe that the government and international forces can't protect them," says Karzai of CAPS, who estimates that Taliban material is on 30 percent of an estimated 4,000 jihadi websites. "It is a psychological component that shocks people, who ask: 'They are Afghans. They are Muslims. How can they do that?' "

Karzai says the message is clear: "It is ... telling people: 'This can happen to you.' The consequence is that many people stop working for government institutions. They ask if it is more important to get $200 a month - more like $60 - or to stay alive."

"They are very dangerous, because they think that anyone who is not pro-American should come to them or leave the country," says Idriss Yusefi, an Afghan medical resident whose uncle was a key player in the Taliban's despised "vice and virtue" squads. "They think the people of Kabul are all pro-American, and so [they] can kill them."

The "biggest fear" of youths, says Mr. Yusefi and his friends, is that the Taliban will retake power. Most analysts say the Taliban is still no strategic threat to the fragile government, a view challenged by militants like the wounded fighter.

Schooled in the extreme Deobandi strain of Islam followed by most Talibs, he joined 18 months ago, prompted, he says, when US troops arrested his cleric father from their home in Kandahar after a roadside bomb went off nearby. The father's body was dropped off at the hospital by US forces 10 days later, the militant claims.

"I want two things: revenge and martyrdom. Martyrdom is the hope of every true Muslim," declares the 26-year-old. His mother stopped his two older brothers, the fathers of seven, from joining the Taliban. But she could not stop this son.

"Every jihad fighter has the best morale - you can't compare it to any other type of fighter," he says, tightening his head wrap in the dark. "In this country, there are many religious people and they want a reason to fight for God, for martyrdom. They welcome this opportunity to ... go to Paradise."

While he recovers in Kabul, the militant keeps in contact with Taliban networks, and claims that the NATO figure of more than 500 insurgents killed during "Operation Medusa" in the south is a "total lie." NATO commanders say the sustained fighting has at times been fiercer than in Iraq. The militant says the Taliban grow stronger daily, with support from locals fed-up with insecurity and corruption.

"The Taliban have increased their attacks, because people came and asked for help to bring back justice," he says. "Security was ensured under the Taliban. We will reintroduce sharia law."

Still, he was wounded when local "spies" gave away the location of a safe house during fighting in Panjwayi in Kandahar. Two Americans and two Talibs were killed in the raid.

DOJ_NMG_0062369

But the fighter is certain of victory. "It's the will of God," he says, adding there must be a reason he is not yet a martyr. "Maybe God wants me to fight more."

Musharraf: Taliban Real Terrorist Threat (USAT)

USA Today, September 13, 2006

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf warned the West on Tuesday that Taliban insurgents are a more dangerous terrorist force than al-Qaeda because of their broad support in Afghanistan. “The center of gravity of terrorism has shifted from al-Qaeda to the Taliban,” he told European Union lawmakers in Brussels. Pakistan is a counterterrorism ally of the EU and United States. Musharraf blamed the West for breeding terrorism in his country by bringing in thousands of mujahedin to fight the Soviet Union in neighboring Afghanistan in the 1980s and then leaving Pakistan to face the militants a decade later. “We armed the Taliban and sent them in. We did it together,” he said.

Ex-commander guilty in Rwanda genocide

A United Nations tribunal in Tanzania sentenced former Rwandan military commander Tharcisse Muvunyi to 25 years in prison on four counts of genocide and crimes against humanity for his role in the 1994 slaughter of minority Tutsis. Judge Asoka de Silva of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda said Muvunyi's troops were behind the systematic killing of at least 140 students and Red Cross workers.

Muvunyi, a former army lieutenant colonel, incited hatred and oversaw roadblocks where Tutsis were separated from Hutus before being executed, the judge said. The court acquitted Jean Mpambara, a former mayor in Rukara. Since its inception in 1994, the court has convicted 26 people and acquitted four.

Pro-Western bloc wins in Montenegro

Montenegro's ruling pro-Western coalition led by Prime Minister Milo Djukanovic won Sunday's parliamentary elections, the State Election Commission said. The coalition won 41 of 81 seats in the parliament of the world's newest nation. Djukanovic led the Balkan state to independence from Serbia this year.

Gordon reaches hurricane strength

Tropical Storm Gordon strengthened into a hurricane over the open Atlantic on Tuesday, forecasters said. Hurricane Gordon, with top sustained winds of 75 mph, was to remain over open waters and will not threaten land, the National Hurricane Center said. “At this point, it looks like it will recurve out into the Atlantic,” said Jamie Rhome, a hurricane specialist.

Pakistan's Separate Peace (WP)

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

SECRETARY OF Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld didn't say who he was thinking of when he warned in a controversial speech last month about people who think that "countries can negotiate a separate peace with terrorists." In fact the most obvious candidate is that enduring favorite of the Bush administration, Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Mr. Musharraf, whose country has been the main base for leaders of both al-Qaeda and the Taliban since 2002, last week concluded a peace deal with tribal leaders in North Waziristan, a territory near the border with Afghanistan. The Pakistani strongman agreed to withdraw his army from the area and release prisoners in exchange for promises by militants not to attack the Pakistani army or set up a parallel government.

The Pakistani tribesmen also promised to stop cross-border attacks into Afghanistan and to disarm the many foreign terrorists in their midst -- but few analysts expect them to follow through on those pledges. Instead, both North and South Waziristan -- where a similar truce was agreed on earlier -- are likely to become territories where members of al-Qaeda and the Taliban operate without fear of challenge.

Why would Mr. Musharraf strike this deal? The simple answer is that his army was defeated in its attempt to eliminate the al-Qaeda sanctuary by force; since launching the campaign in 2003, it had suffered more than 500 killed. Mr. Musharraf, who tried to dress up his maneuver by visiting Afghanistan the next day, said he was worried about a full-scale uprising in the area. Though he didn't say so, the general is surely hoping that the truce will add to his personal security: He has survived at least two assassination attempts by al-Qaeda.

The cost of his decision will be borne by American and NATO troops in Afghanistan, whose commanders already say that the ability of Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters to retreat to Pakistan greatly complicates the challenge of defeating their escalating attacks. So why did Vice President Cheney call Mr. Musharraf "a great ally" just days after his separate peace? Administration officials seem more willing to forgive their autocratic friend than they are domestic critics of the war on terrorism.

Iraqi Leader Asks Iran For Help With Security (NYT)

By Edward Wong And Nazila Fathi

DOJ_NMG_0062370

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 12 — In his first state visit to Iran, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki today discussed the security situation in Iraq with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran and asked for Mr. Ahmadinejad's support in quelling the violence that threatens to fracture this country.

"We had a good discussion with Mr. Ahmadinejad," Mr. Maliki said at a news conference in Tehran, the Iranian capital, after the two met. "Even in security issues, there is no barrier in the way of cooperation."

Mr. Ahmadinejad said that "Iran will give its assistance to establish complete security in Iraq because Iraq's security is Iran's security."

For Mr. Maliki, the visit was a kind of homecoming, since he had spent a part of his exile years during Saddam Hussein's rule living in Tehran. Many members of Mr. Maliki's Shiite political group, the Islamic Dawa Party, fled to Iran to escape the wrath of Mr. Hussein's security forces. Iranian leaders are close to Dawa and other religious Iraqi Shiite parties, because Iran is governed by Shiite Persians.

Ordinary Iraqis are generally more suspicious of the Iranian government because the two countries waged war from 1980 to 1988, and because the Persians have been the traditional rivals of Arabs for influence in the Middle East.

It was not clear what form Iranian support on security would take, or how it would be received by the American authorities. Mr. Maliki's visit came at a time when the American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, and American military commanders have increasingly accused elements in Iran of stoking violence in Iraq.

American generals have said people or groups in Iran are providing training and financing to Shiite militias here. Mr. Khalilzad said last month that Iran was urging Shiite militias to step up attacks against the American-led forces in retaliation for the Israeli assault on Lebanon.

The United States has also been pressuring Iran to end its uranium enrichment program, which White House officials say could result in a nuclear weapon.

The initial American reaction today was cautious. In Washington, Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, told reporters: "As you know, though, we've repeatedly expressed our concerns, as have others, about Iranian interference in Iraq's internal affairs. That is something that we remain concerned about.

"And while certainly we would welcome any statements of support for Iraq's government and democracy, and any pledges to act in a responsible way that does not interfere in the internal affairs of Iraq,'' he said, "we certainly want to make sure that any statements made were followed up by real concrete actions to address some of the concerns that are out there.''

Mr. Maliki said today that the American accusations of Iranian interference in Iraq will not affect economic deals that have already been signed between the two countries.

"All the political, security and economic accords that have been signed with the Islamic republic's officials will be carried out," he said.

Mr. Maliki is leading a large delegation that includes Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the Iraqi national security adviser, who is close to some Iranian officials. The Iraqis are scheduled to meet on Wednesday with Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the Iranian supreme leader, and Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a powerful former president. Mr. Maliki's predecessor, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, visited Iran in July 2005.

In the southern Iraqi city of Najaf, another Shiite leader close to Iran, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, defended his decision last week to ask Parliament to endorse a mechanism allowing Iraqi provinces to form autonomous regions. Mr. Hakim's move has roiled Iraqi politics, spurring the legislators who answer to Moktada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric, to unite with the Parliament's main Sunni Arab and secular blocs to try to sink Mr. Hakim's plan. The Sunni Arabs are especially opposed to the idea of regional autonomy, called federalism in the Iraqi Constitution, because their provinces lack oil resources.

"We think that federalism is one of the administrative ways that helps to secure our rights, remove oppression and prevent sectarian discrimination among people of one country and one belief," Mr. Hakim said.

In Anbar Province, the western region that is home to the Sunni-led insurgency, the American commander of forces in the area said he agreed with a classified intelligence assessment filed last month by a colonel that said Anbar was in a precarious state and could continue to deteriorate.

But the commander, Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, said he believed he had enough troops to do his job, which he said was to train Iraqi security forces to fight the insurgency and not to win against the insurgency with his own troops.

"Given what our mission is, what we're trying to achieve out here, I think our force levels are about right," he said in a telephone conference call to reporters.

Elements of the intelligence report have been published in newspapers the last two days. One conclusion of the report was that without the addition of another American division to the province, "there is nothing" the American forces there "can do to influence the motivation of the Sunni to wage an insurgency," according to a military officer familiar with the assessment. The report also describes Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia as an "integral part of the social fabric" of Anbar.

Violence flared across parts of Iraq tosday. In western Baghdad, a car bomb aimed at an American convoy killed six civilians and wounded 15, an Interior Ministry official said. A homemade bomb killed one policeman and one civilian and wounded six civilians. An Iraqi policeman was shot dead in southwest Baghdad, and two bodies and a human head were discovered in three different parts of the city. The head had a note attached: "This is the destiny of those who work with the Americans."

Two civilians were killed in separate shootings in Diyala Province.

A police captain in Mosul was assassinated, and Iraqi Army soldier was killed and three wounded by a roadside bomb explosion south of Kirkuk.

Judges in the trial of Saddam Hussein for genocide against the Kurds continued to listen to testimony from witnesses today.

Iran Offers Talks On Nuclear Issue (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

PARIS, Sept. 12 -- Iran's confidential response three weeks ago to an international proposal over its nuclear program offered extensive negotiations to resolve the standoff, but only if proceedings against Iran in the U.N. Security Council were stopped.

In a detailed and sometimes rambling document given to foreign governments, Iran stopped short of rejecting demands to halt its nuclear enrichment program, saying the issue could be resolved in talks. The response, closely held for weeks, was made public on a Web site Monday.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran does not intend to reject the whole issue unilaterally, and is ready to provide an opportunity for both sides to share their viewpoints on this issue and try to convince each other and reach a mutual understanding," the document says.

But ending enrichment should not be a prerequisite to negotiations, as demanded by the United States and other countries, the proposal suggests. And if Security Council deliberations aimed at imposing sanctions on Iran continue, the document warns, "the positions expressed in this response would be void and the Islamic Republic would choose a different course of action."

Iran was responding formally to a package of political and economic incentives offered to it in June by the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China. The countries hope to persuade Iran to stop enriching uranium, which some foreign governments feel is intended for nuclear weapons. Iran contends that the program is peaceful, aimed at making fuel for electrical power plants.

The incentives included the possibility of direct talks with the United States for the first time since relations between the two countries were severed in 1979.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, have been in preliminary talks in recent days over Iran's proposals. On Monday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice suggested that a temporary suspension might be enough to clear the way for formal negotiations.

In the document, posted on the Web site of the Institute for Science and International Security on Monday, the Iranian government repeatedly refers to its rights under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty to develop a peaceful nuclear program, saying it "cannot accept deprivation from its legal rights." As for allegations that it is pursuing weapons, the document demands that Iran be granted a presumption of innocence, in the absence of any proof that it is has a nuclear weapons program.

Iran "is against production, stockpiling, development and proliferation of nuclear weapons," the document says.

It calls for "simultaneous mutual confidence-building" that would include a commitment by the foreign governments "to seriously follow up the fulfillment of a nuclear free zone in the Middle East, particularly the commitment to disarm [Israel] from weapons of mass destruction and in particular nuclear arms." Israel is widely believed to have a nuclear arsenal, but it has never acknowledged having such weapons.

The document also seeks assurances that if Iran engages in nuclear negotiations, it will not be attacked or subjected to economic sanctions.

In the document, Iran portrays the current standoff as the beginning of a negotiating process, saying the foreign governments' proposal "has elements which may be useful for a constructive approach."

But the document complains that the package "lacks any reference to irreversible and irrevocable guarantees" for any ultimate agreement. "Such guarantees are particularly essential on access to advanced nuclear technology and equipment, erection and commissioning of nuclear power reactors, nuclear fuel supply, and transfer of know-how and technology," it says.

DOJ_NMG_0062372

The document also seeks a clear statement by the foreign governments of Iran's rights under the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

The document suggests that the secretiveness of Iran's nuclear program was forced upon it by the hostility of other countries, which it said tried to constrain its legitimate and legal rights to develop nuclear technologies under the treaty.

"We have no interest in limiting or suspending inspections of our nuclear facilities and activities," the document says. But "a quarter century of denial and deprivation" forced Iran to develop a nuclear program "on the basis of independence and self-reliance."

U.S. Dismisses Iran's Ideas About Nukes (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 12, 2006

The Bush administration was dismissive Tuesday of Iranian suggestions that it might suspend uranium enrichment for up to two months to set the stage for negotiations over its nuclear program and to head off U.N. sanctions.

"To the best of my knowledge, there has been no Iranian proposal," State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said. "There's been no change in the Iranian position."

Casey said, "They have not agreed to suspend uranium enrichment activities for any length of time that I am aware of."

The spokesman said the Bush administration was proceeding with discussions with other nations on pursuing sanctions against Iran in the U.N. Security Council.

Casey's comments came a day after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left the door open to pursuing a possible compromise with Iran, based on reports that Tehran had proposed a temporary enrichment suspension.

Rice had said Iran had not made a formal offer, and she added that she had not had a chance to learn all the details of the Iranian suggestion. But rather than rule it out, she said, "The question is, are they prepared to suspend verifiably so that negotiations can begin?"

Casey said it was unfortunate that Iran has not given any indication that it would be willing to suspend uranium enrichment activities to pave the way for negotiations.

Casey said Rice will take up the sanctions issue with other diplomats attending the special session of the U.N. General Assembly next week in New York.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns held a telephone conference with officials of other governments Monday and Tuesday and will continue with the talks later in the week, Casey said.

Casey said suspension of uranium enrichment remained a condition for negotiations with Iran over a package of incentives offered by the United States and the European Union. This included a U.S. offer of technical assistance to Iran for civilian nuclear power development.

The outlook for the Bush administration succeeding in pushing sanctions through the Security Council is not clear.

Russia and China have expressed reservations about imposing sanctions on Iran and called for further diplomacy. Both have the power to veto any resolution and thereby kill it. Some European governments also have seemed dubious about punishing Iran at this stage.

The council threatened Iran with sanctions in July if it did not suspend uranium enrichment as well as work on plutonium for nuclear weapons by Aug. 31. Iran let the deadline pass. It insists it is not trying to make nuclear weapons.

Europe Set For Nuclear Talks With Iran (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Gareth Smyth, And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Europe is poised to compromise on Iran's nuclear programme, in a step that could break the year-long stand-off over Tehran's atomic ambitions.

A deal, floated by Tehran at a weekend meeting in Vienna, would rein in the most sensitive part of the programme as soon as formal negotiations began with the west. In response, the European Union is watering down its insistence that a suspension of enrichment activities must come before talks. But European diplomats stress that they will require Iran to allow United Nations inspectors to carry out spot-checks on its nuclear facilities to ensure that the Islamic republic has kept its side of the bargain.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, appears to have thrown his weight behind Tehran's new proposals, which would suspend uranium enrichment for up to two months once negotiations began. Enrichment can be used to produce both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

The remaining issue of nuclear inspections will be at the centre of a meeting between Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, and Ali Larijani, Iran's senior nuclear security official, scheduled for Thursday. Both sides said the two men's previous encounter, at the weekend, was "constructive".

A deal could pave the way for formal talks with the western powers and the first top-level contact between Tehran and the US since the 1979 revolution. "The dynamic has changed," said a European diplomat. "The key is the inspectors."

But the compromise on offer would be hard for Washington to accept, raising the possibility that the US and Europe could be split on the issue. Washington would be unhappy with any suspension that halted enrichment only for two months, since the United Nations Security Council has already demanded as a matter of course that Iran halt uranium enrichment.

The US said on Tuesday it was not aware of any Iranian proposal to suspend. But some European diplomats warned that the US would be "isolated" if it held out against Tehran's initiative to halt enrichment work if talks got under way.

Tehran's formal proposals refer to the possibility of "suspension of enrichment activities by Iran through negotiations".

The Iranian document also envisages that Iran could "consider voluntary steps towards implementation of the Additional Protocol", an extension to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation treaty that would give UN staff the right to carry out snap inspections of Iran's nuclear facilities.

The document also seeks to confront fears in the west that Iran could, at a later date, leave the NPT and legally develop nuclear weapons.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said on Tuesday Washington would continue its consultations on the text of a UN sanctions resolution.

Grim Report Out Of Anbar Is Disputed By General (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — The senior Marine commander in Iraq said Tuesday that he had sufficient forces to carry out his mission but that the mission did not include defeating the insurgency.

"For what we are trying to achieve out here I think our force levels are about right," said Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, who defined his primary mission as training the Iraqi forces who ultimately would be responsible for security in the area.

"Now, if that mission statement changes — if there is seen a larger role for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight — then that is going to change the metrics of what we need out here," General Zilmer added.

The Marine general commands a force of 30,000 troops who are charged with securing Anbar Province, a vast region in western Iraq that borders Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia. He spoke to reporters in a telephone interview from his headquarters at Camp Falluja.

The Pentagon arranged the interview after articles in The Washington Post and The New York Times reported that General Zilmer's senior intelligence officer had submitted a grim assessment about the political and security situation in Iraq.

The intelligence assessment concluded that Al Qaeda of Mesopotamia, the dominant insurgent group in the area, is an "integral part of the social fabric" in Anbar. It described the region as marked by violence and criminality. It reported that Sunnis had lost confidence in the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government.

The classified intelligence assessment, according to military officials familiar with it, also said that the region would continue to deteriorate unless there was an infusion of aid and a division was sent to reinforce General Zilmer's command, known as MNF-W, for Multinational Force-West.

In his telephone discussion with reporters, General Zilmer declined to discuss the specifics of the report but indicated that he agreed with the intelligence assessment.

At the same time, he insisted that the United States was winning the war, while acknowledging that the effort was hampered by sectarian differences and the belief among Iraqis in Anbar that the Baghdad-based government was not meeting their needs.

"Until those things change, until those long-term effects are realized, then trying to solve the insurgency out here is going to be problematic," he said.

General Zilmer said that sending additional American troops would help in the short run, but was not the key to "achieve long-term security and stability out here in Anbar" because that ultimately depended on the Iraqis.

The general's comments contrasted with those of some of his subordinate officers in the field. Regimental Combat Team 7, which reports to General Zilmer, has recommended that additional forces be deployed in its sector, its officers have said.

The general's account of his mission — training Iraqi forces — was also a narrow one.

President Bush has suggested an expansive strategy to achieve victory by using American forces to clear contested towns of insurgents, holding them with Iraqi security forces and then spending funds to rebuild the infrastructure and win the support of the Iraqi people.

A White House fact sheet issued in March described this process as the "Strategy for Victory: Clear, Hold and Build." At the White House, Tony Snow, the president's spokesman, asserted that Mr. Bush was prepared to send more troops to Anbar if they were requested. “He has made it absolutely clear to generals that the job is to win,” Mr. Snow said. “And the first thing you have to do is, to the best of your ability, cut through that fog of war and tell him what the situation is and what they need to get the job done.”

Mr. Snow added, however, that the intelligence assessment did not account for the accomplishments of American forces in Iraq. General Zilmer made a similar point in a statement that was released early Tuesday.

“Recent media reports fail to accurately capture the entirety and complexity of the current situation in the Al Anbar Province of Iraq,” the statement said. “The classified assessment, which has been referred to in these reports, was intended to focus on the causes of the insurgency. It was not intended to address the positive effects coalition and Iraqi forces have achieved on the security environment over the past years.”

General Affirms Anbar Analysis (WP)

But Zilmer Also Cites 'Progress'

The U.S. commander in western Iraq said he agrees with the findings of a pessimistic classified report recently filed by his top intelligence officer but also insisted that "tremendous progress" is being made in that part of the country.

"I have seen that report and I do concur with that [intelligence] assessment," said Marine Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, speaking to reporters yesterday by telephone from his headquarters near Fallujah, Iraq. He said he found "frank and candid" the analysis by Col. Pete Devlin, the Marine intelligence chief in Iraq, who concluded that prospects for securing Anbar province are dim.

Although the U.S. military can achieve tactical victories daily, the general continued, the insurgency will be "problematic" in western Iraq until comparable success is achieved politically and economically.

According to several Defense Department officials who have read the report, Devlin also argued that the lack of political progress has created a political vacuum in the province. He wrote that the gap is being filled by the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq, said one Army officer who read the assessment. Zilmer did not address that point in his comments to reporters.

"I'm really uneasy" about discussing specifics of the report, the general said, noting that it remains classified.

Until now, the U.S. military view of Iraq has tended to be more optimistic than that of much of the rest of the government, such as the CIA and the State Department. Devlin's report has been received respectfully at the Pentagon and in intelligence circles, where it has been much discussed since it was filed in mid-August.

During a hearing on Capitol Hill on Monday, senior Pentagon official Eric S. Edelman confirmed a Washington Post article about the intelligence assessment and discussed some of its findings.

White House spokesman Tony Snow treated the Devlin report gingerly yesterday when asked about it at a news briefing. "It is conceivable that other people have differing assessments," Snow said.

In his telephone news conference, Zilmer became much more upbeat than his intelligence chief, saying he saw long-term trends as positive. "I think we are winning this war," he told reporters. "We are certainly accomplishing our mission," which he defined as developing Iraq security forces.

In a statement posted on the Web site of the U.S. military in Iraq, Zilmer said that recent news reports "fail to accurately capture the entirety and complexity of the current situation." He also said that Devlin's analysis focused on the causes of the continuing insurgency in Anbar, not on the positive news there.

Zilmer said the number of Iraqi police officers has been growing steadily, and he predicted that he will have an adequate number in the province by next year.

The 30,000 U.S. and allied troops are "stifling" the enemy in the province, Zilmer told reporters. But he would not say insurgents are being defeated. The violence won't be "solved," he said, until progress is made politically, socially and economically.

Devlin suggested in his report that persistent shortages of troops in Anbar have undercut U.S. operations there. Zilmer said he believes that having more U.S. forces would "provide a temporary solution," but that in the long run, the insurgency will be put down only by social and economic advances.

Snow, the White House spokesman, said that President Bush will speak later this week with Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq. "If the president gets a recommendation from the combatant commanders to send more troops to al Anbar province, they will get them," he said.

General Says Sunni Area Not Yet Lost (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — The top American general in insurgency-ravaged western Iraq acknowledged that his troops were far from pacifying Al Anbar province but insisted that the U.S. fight there was not a lost cause.

"We are not where we intended to be," Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer said in an unusual telephone news briefing from Marine headquarters in Fallouja. But, he added, "we are not in our end state yet."

The general acknowledged that two key objectives — training Iraqi forces and establishing a functioning local government — lagged in the vast, strategically vital province.

The general was called in to rebut reports, first published this week in the Washington Post, that a secret Marine intelligence assessment last month had concluded that the prospects for securing Al Anbar were dim. The province covers nearly one-third of Iraq.

Word of the intelligence finding came as the Bush administration was trying to put the best face possible on the war before midterm elections and amid a major offensive in Baghdad deemed crucial to any eventual U.S. success here. The strikingly frank findings by the top Marine intelligence officer in the region, which have not been released publicly, are said to have unsettled U.S. policymakers and top brass at the Pentagon.

Zilmer did not dispute the intelligence appraisal: "I have seen that report, and I do concur with that assessment." But he argued that it had been misinterpreted in media accounts.

"It was not intended to address the positive effects coalition and Iraqi forces have achieved on the security environment over the past years," the general said in a statement released Tuesday.

It was unclear whether the report cited a lack of military strength in the region, where about 30,000 U.S. troops work alongside about 13,000 American-trained Iraqi soldiers and 6,400 Iraqi policemen. But the general, echoing other senior U.S. commanders, insisted that he had sufficient American personnel to do the job in an area that encompasses much of the "Sunni Triangle" and such sometime insurgent strongholds as Fallouja, Ramadi and Haditha.

Some U.S. critics have argued that the Bush administration's plan for Iraq has suffered from a shortage of troops since the American-led invasion in March 2003 that toppled Saddam Hussein. But Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and other top officials have insisted that troop strength is sufficient to defeat the insurgency and bring a stable government to war-torn Iraq.

Al Anbar, with its immense open spaces, palm-fringed Euphrates River valley villages and long borders with Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Syria, has been a hotbed of the Sunni Arab-led insurgency since shortly after the invasion.

The region is considered the Sunni heartland, and its residents have been hostile to the U.S.-backed, Shiite-led government that came to power after the fall of Hussein, a Sunni who oppressed the nation's Shiite Muslim majority.

Many Al Anbar residents see U.S. forces as agents of a regime that intends to disenfranchise and marginalize Sunnis while forging alliances with Shiite Iran, Iraq's historical rival.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, a Shiite, has vowed to reach out to Sunnis and form a unity government.

To some critics, the U.S. effort in Al Anbar and elsewhere in Iraq also has suffered from the unduly optimistic forecasts of American commanders. Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler, who headed the Marines in Iraq at the time of a concentrated 2004 attack on Fallouja, declared that November that the operation had "broken the back of the insurgency."

In fact, the rebellion has continued in Al Anbar, Baghdad and elsewhere as the death toll for U.S. troops in Iraq has topped 2,600. Zilmer acknowledged Tuesday that Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups in the region were mostly composed of fighters "largely from within Iraq," not foreigners.

Zilmer said his chief mission was to train Iraqi soldiers and police to replace U.S. troops. Despite setbacks, the general said, he envisioned a full Iraqi police contingent and independently operating Iraqi army units to be ready by late spring.

"The Iraqi face on the soldier, the Iraqi face on the police that are here, is very threatening for the insurgency," Zilmer said.

The development of security forces in Al Anbar has long been slowed by desertions, discord within the ranks and a lack of trust among the region's mostly Sunni population.

Insurgents frequently target police and soldiers. Many residents resent the large numbers of Shiite troops deployed there from the largely Shiite south. Local recruiting has often proved difficult because of the insurgency. Widespread illiteracy also has disqualified many military applicants, the general said.

Pentagon officials requested that Zilmer go on a media offensive to correct what the Marine command and some defense officials considered an oversimplified portrait of what was going on in Iraq.

"Clearly there are parts of local governance working better than others," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

Whitman suggested that the possible problems in Al Anbar "shouldn't overshadow the fact there is much progress throughout Iraq."

In a House hearing Monday, Eric S. Edelman, the undersecretary of Defense for policy, acknowledged that the insurgency in Al Anbar remained a problem and said the Marine intelligence assessment was important as "a snapshot in time."

DOJ_NMG_0062376

The report states that military power alone will not solve Al Anbar's problems, Edelman said.

"I think it's clear to all of us who have been involved in this issue for a while that Anbar has been the epicenter of the insurgency for some time — that a purely military solution to any insurgency is not possible; it needs a political solution as well," he said.

Zilmer: U.S. 'Stifling' Iraq Insurgency (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 12, 2006

A senior American commander in Iraq said Tuesday that U.S.-led military operations are "stifling" the insurgency in western Anbar province but are not strong enough to defeat it.

Marine Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer told reporters in a telephone interview from his headquarters in Fallujah that he has enough U.S. troops — about 30,000 — to accomplish what he called his main mission: training Iraqi security forces.

"For what we are trying to achieve out here I think our force levels are about right," he said. Even so, he said the training of Iraqi soldiers and police had not progressed as quickly as once expected.

"Now, if that mission statement changes — if there is seen a larger role for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight — then that is going to change the metrics of what we need out here," he added.

Zilmer, who has commanded U.S. forces in western Iraq since February, said increasing the number of U.S. troops there would help in the short term, "but at the end of the day I don't think it's going to be the significant change that is necessary to achieve long-term security and stability out here in Anbar."

What is needed, he said, is progress on the economic and political fronts that will undercut support for the insurgency.

The situation in Anbar, with its heavily Sunni population, is a barometer for the entire Sunni Arab minority, which lost its favored position to the majority Shiites and the Kurds when Saddam Hussein's regime collapsed in 2003.

As long as the insurgency rages, it is unlikely that Sunni Arab politicians in Baghdad can win over significant numbers of Sunnis to support the government of national unity, which took office May 20.

Some areas in Anbar have shown significant progress, such as the border city of Qaim, once an al-Qaida stronghold. Trouble has increased in other areas, like the rural stretch between Ramadi and Fallujah. Insurgent killings of Iraqi police in Fallujah have become commonplace, according to officials there.

Zilmer dismissed a reporter's suggestion that the war in Anbar — a province the size of North Carolina that stretches west from Baghdad to the borders of Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia — has been lost.

"I think we are winning this war," he said.

In the long run, the war will not be won on the battlefield, Zilmer said. The outcome will be determined by the Iraqis' ability to compromise on their political goals, accommodate their sectarian differences and demonstrate to ordinary people that a democratic central government can serve their needs.

"Until those things change, until those long-term effects are realized, then trying to solve the insurgency out here is going to be problematic," he said.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said President Bush would be talking to Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, later this week.

"If the president gets a recommendation from the combatant commanders to send more troops to al-Anbar province, they will get them," Snow said.

As of Monday there were 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, the highest number since December 2005. Most of the recent increase was for Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi forces are trying to avert a civil war.

Pentagon officials hastily arranged the interview with Zilmer in response to a series of news reports about a classified report by the chief of intelligence for the Marines in western Anbar province, Col. Pete Devlin. Zilmer said he agreed with the assessment by Devlin, who works for Zilmer, and he did not dispute news reports that characterized it as depicting Anbar as locked in a military stalemate with inadequate political progress.

The classified report was first reported by the Washington Post.

The New York Times reported Tuesday that the Devlin report concluded that Anbar's political and security situation will continue to deteriorate unless it gets a major infusion of aid and substantially more U.S. troops.

Zilmer would not discuss specifics of the Devlin report, but said he did not want more U.S. troops as long as his mission did not include defeating the insurgency.

The Devlin assessment was made in mid-August.

Before the telephone interview, Zilmer issued a written and a video statement.

DOJ_NMG_0062377

"Recent media reports fail to accurately capture the entirety and complexity of the current situation," Zilmer said in his written statement.

He added that the assessment "which has been referred to in these reports, was intended to focus on the causes of the insurgency. It was not intended to address the positive effects Coalition and Iraqi forces have achieved on the security environment over the past years."

Zilmer acknowledged, however, that "there is an active insurgency in Anbar. The enemy we face has no concern for the welfare of the Iraqi people, nor any peaceful vision for their future. We believe the Iraqi people want something more and are willing to fight and die for it."

General: Force Too Small To Beat Insurgency (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — A senior American commander in Iraq said Tuesday that U.S.-led military operations are "stifling" the insurgency in western Anbar province but are not strong enough to defeat it.

Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer told reporters in a telephone interview from his headquarters in Fallujah that he has enough U.S. troops — about 30,000 — to accomplish what he called his main mission: training Iraqi security forces.

"For what we are trying to achieve out here, I think our force levels are about right," he said. "Now, if that mission statement changes — if there is seen a larger role for coalition forces out here to win that insurgency fight — then that is going to change the metrics of what we need out here."

Pentagon officials arranged the interview with Zilmer in response to news reports about a classified report by Col. Pete Devlin, the chief of intelligence for the Marines in western Anbar province.

Zilmer did not dispute news reports that said Devlin depicted Anbar as locked in a military stalemate with inadequate political progress. The classified report was first reported by The Washington Post.

Zilmer, who has commanded U.S. forces in western Iraq since February, said increasing the number of U.S. troops there would help in the short term. What is needed, he said, is progress on the economic and political fronts that will undercut support for the insurgency.

Zilmer dismissed a suggestion that the war in Anbar had been lost: "I think we are winning this war."

In Iraq on Tuesday, former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein railed against "agents of Iran and Zionism" and vowed to "crush your heads" after listening to Kurdish witnesses at his genocide trial tell of atrocities against them nearly two decades ago.

The outburst came after witnesses talked about the campaign in 1987-88 to suppress a Kurdish revolt in northern Iraq. The prosecution claims about 180,000 Kurds lost their lives. If convicted of genocide charges, Saddam and the six other defendants could face death by hanging.

Also, at least 24 people were killed around Iraq overnight and Tuesday.

More Troops For A Shrinking Battlefield (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

President Bus h 's forceful and, of course, nonpartisan 9/11 commemoration speech Monday night obviously didn't suit some of his critics.

"The safety of America," he said, "depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." This linking of the "Global War on Terror" with the war in Iraq naturally brought howls of protest from the usual naysayers and cut-and-runners.

But the address also may have disappointed those conservative supporters who think things aren't going exactly swimmingly in Iraq.

For example, early and staunch war backers such as the Weekly Standard's William Kristol and the National Review's Rich Lowry called on Bush yesterday "to stop the downward slide in Iraq" by putting "substantially more troops" there. (Lowry was among several conservative journalists who met with Bush later yesterday.)

Kristol and Lowry didn't talk numbers, but it shouldn't require that many.

After all, Anbar province (Sunnistan) is looking pretty much gone -- and that's 30 percent of the country. Kurdistan in the north, about 20 percent of the county, is quiet for now pending a Kurdish move to push out the Shiites in Kirkuk. And Shiastan in the south, except for some squabbling, is quiet in its own 30 percent of the country. So it really comes down to greater Baghdad.

Meanwhile, the number of U.S. troops in Iraq has quietly inched up to about 140,000, and nearly 300,000 Iraqi forces have been fully trained, though many have yet to "stand up" -- except to run for it.Worth a Thousand Words

Despite Bush's fine speech, it's unclear whether the State Department is fully on board. A colleague reports that, as of last week, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's photo has yet to replace that of former prime minister Ibrahim al-Jafari in the Bush Diplomatic Hall of Glory photo array at the department.

It's been nearly five months since Maliki took over, but still no photo. Are they thinking he's a short-timer and trying to save on framing costs?Do Speak, Don't Tell

Attention, native speakers of war-on-terrorism languages! The Pentagon will pay "full scholarships" -- $14,000 in tuition and an $11,000 "living stipend" -- for a six-month intensive training program at Georgetown University.

It's the first of its kind: the English for Heritage Language Speakers Program, being offered to "native speakers of Arabic . . . Hindi, Indonesian, Pashto, Persian (Farsi or Dari), Urdu or Punjabi." Speakers of Chinese (Mandarin or Cantonese) are also welcome.

The program, funded by the Pentagon's National Security Education Program, is for folks who want to "develop English skills for careers in the federal government," according to a recent ad.

"Apply now!" the ad says. Applications must be received by Oct. 2. Get your forms at http://ehls.georgetown.edu . There are only 16 slots.

Now, you may be wondering: "But will there be a job for me when I graduate?" No problem. There are certain to be plenty of openings. A 2005 Government Accountability Office report found that since 1993, about 300 language specialists -- 55 of them in Arabic -- have been booted out of the military because of the "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gay men and lesbians.

So don't worry. Sign up now!An Unintended Warming

What happens when you say something, anything, acknowledging your opponent's effectiveness? Your competitor uses it to generate money and publicity. Take politician extraordinaire Al Gore , speaking a few months ago on National Public Radio, when he was asked to name "an organized campaign to discredit the science of global warming."

"One of the many front groups that's funded by these polluters, the Competitive Enterprise Institute," Gore said, "is running television ads right now, and the tag line is, the announcer says, 'CO2, they call it pollution, we call it life.' It almost falls off its own absurdity," Gore said, "but over 20 years, I have seen them have a tremendous effect."

Next thing you know, the last part of that statement appears prominently in a CEI fundraising brochure. Then a couple of days ago, when Gore was on Australian television, the announcer played one of CEI's ads attacking his cause cÃ©lÃ¨bre. Gore was then obliged to respond.

"Despite his prominence in our fundraising brochure," CEI general counsel Sam Kazman notes, "we have yet to receive a contribution from him, even though it would be fully tax-deductible." Best not to hold your breath.The Bin Laden Effect

Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, ripped into a comment by "Democrat" leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who had said of Osama bin Laden : "Even to capture him now, I don't think makes us any safer."

Hunter said that Pelosi's "statement can only have a demoralizing effect on American troops and intelligence personnel who are currently risking their lives" pursuing bin Laden.

Of course, the president and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have also played down bin Laden's importance in the overall fight against terrorism.

60 Bodies Found Scattered Around Baghdad (AP)

Associated Press, September 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- Police said Wednesday that they had found 60 bodies dumped around Baghdad, the majority in predominantly Sunni Arab areas.

The bodies were found overnight, 45 in mostly Sunni parts of western Baghdad and the rest in majority Shiite areas of eastern Baghdad, police said.

All the bodies were bound, bore signs of torture and had been shot, police 1st Lt. Thayer Mahmoud said. Such killings are usually the work of sectarian death squads.

Meanwhile, violence killed at least two dozen people across Iraq on Tuesday, including six who died when a car bomb blew up in western Baghdad.

The attack also wounded 18 people in Mansour, an upscale neighborhood that has been the scene of repeated bombings and kidnappings.

Northeast of the capital, at least four people were killed and two dozen wounded when a roadside bomb exploded next to a market in the town of Middadiyah.

And in the northern city of Mosul, gunmen attacked and killed four Kurds and injured another, said Ahmed Abdul-Aziz, a doctor at Jumhouri Hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0062379

Police in the Anbar province capital of Ramadi, meanwhile, reported that three people were killed in an explosion in the city west of Baghdad.

The violence came as deputies argued over a bill that Sunni Arabs fear will split Iraq into three sectarian and ethnic cantons.

A group of lawmakers tried Tuesday to take advantage of the unpopularity of U.S. troops among many Shiite and Sunni legislators to seek approval of a resolution setting a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops - something the Shiite-dominated government has refused to do.

Sponsored by supporters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and some Sunni Arabs, the resolution managed to gather 104 signatures in the 275-member parliament before it was effectively shelved by being sent to a committee for review.

That committee will need at least six months to examine the resolution and present its findings to parliament. If it were to be approved, such a resolution would be binding on the government.

"We do not want another kitchen in which decisions are cooked away from the representatives of the people and away from the hearing of the Iraqi people," complained Falah al-Mishaal, the Shiite legislator who presented the resolution.

No headway was made on an even more contentious proposal: legislation that would set in place the mechanism for establishing autonomous regions as part of a federal Iraq. Debate on the matter was put off until Sept. 19.

Sunni Arabs have vehemently opposed the legislation. Both the north, already controlled by Kurds, and the south, where Shiites are dominant, are rich in oil, and Sunnis fear they will end up squeezed into Baghdad and Iraq's western provinces, which have no natural resources.

"People are more preoccupied now with the deteriorating security situation and in order to have federalism, we should have democracy first. But with this deterioration in security, it difficult to achieve federalism," argued Naseer al-Ani, a member of largest Sunni Arab political group.

Although federalism is part of Iraq's constitution, and there is already an autonomous Kurdish region in the north, legislation and a referendum would be needed to turn Iraq into a full federation.

Iraq's most powerful Shiite politician and leader of its largest party, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, called on fellow clerics to support the bill.

The coalition al-Hakim leads in parliament, the United Iraqi Alliance, submitted the bill last week. It would be the first step in creating a separate autonomous state in the south much like the region run by Kurds in the north.

Federalism Plan Dead, Says Iraqi Speaker (WP)

By Amit R. Paley And K.I. Ibrahim

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 12 -- The speaker of the Iraqi parliament said Tuesday that a controversial plan to partition the country into three autonomous regions is politically dead.

Mahmoud al-Mashhadani said in an interview that legislation to implement a concept known as federalism, which threatened to collapse the country's fragile multi-sect government, would likely be postponed indefinitely after a meeting of political leaders on Wednesday.

The federalism plan would create a Shiite region in southern Iraq much like the autonomous zone in the north controlled by the Kurds. Sunnis have generally opposed the plan, on grounds that it would leave them only with vast swaths of desert in the country's middle, devoid of the oil reserves in the other regions.

The constitution that Iraq adopted last fall allows for a form of federalism. Sunni parties supported the charter only reluctantly and joined the current government on condition of a resumption of federalism discussions, in which they hoped to kill the concept.

"If federalism is to be applied now, it will lead to the secession of the south and the establishment of an Islamist extremist state in the center of the country," said Mashhadani, an outspoken Sunni Arab who is the third-ranking official in the government. "It is not possible to venture or to start the application of federalism now."

"Look, Iraqi blood is more important than federalism," he said.

When asked to predict the likely outcome of Wednesday's meeting of political leaders, he said: "We could agree on the principle and then postpone the topic for four years."

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the largest Shiite political coalition in Iraq, is the strongest backer of legislation that would begin translating the constitution's vague concepts of federalism into law.

In the Shiite holy city of Najaf on Tuesday, Hakim issued a full defense of federalism, which he described as a basic constitutional right of all Iraqis. Analysts say Hakim hopes to become the leader of the Shiite region, which would comprise about nine of Iraq's 18 provinces.

"We believe federalism is one of the administrative methods that would help the people gain their rights, undo the injustices, and prevent discrimination on the basis of ethnic origin, sect or religion," Hakim said.

But support for the plan began to erode after a vast array of Sunni, Shiite and secular groups boycotted parliament on Sunday to protest the plan. Mashhadani said Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the most revered Shiite cleric in Iraq, had ordered Shiite politicians to back off from the plan in order to prevent bitter infighting.

Mashhadani said the country is not prepared for federalism because its government is not strong enough to provide security and services, and because of troubled relationships with some neighboring countries.

"The United States is a federated system and it is leading the world. But this was after the Civil War," Mashhadani said. "So must we go through a civil war in order to achieve federalism?"

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, in his first state visit to Iran, discussed ways to improve the security situation in Iraq with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. American officials have accused Tehran of fomenting violence in Iraq by supporting Shiite militias.

"Iran will provide assistance to the Iraqi government to establish full security," Ahmadinejad said, according to the official Islamic Republic News Agency. "We believe strengthening the Iraqi government is tantamount to promoting security, peace and friendship in that country."

Violence continued across Iraq on Tuesday. At least 32 people were killed or their bodies were found in separate incidents in different parts of the country, authorities said. In northern Baghdad, 14 students were kidnapped after completing their exams, the Iraqi military said. No further details were released.

Kurd's Testimony Includes Taunt For Hussein: `You Are In A Cage' (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — A Kurdish villager mocked Saddam Hussein in court Tuesday as the man recalled the disappearance of his relatives during a 1980s military campaign in northern Iraq.

"Congratulations! You are in a cage," said the witness, Ghafour Hassan Abdullah, addressing Hussein and his six codefendants seated behind metal grates in the courtroom.

The former strongman's patience failed as a defense lawyer described Iraqi Kurdish rebels as freedom fighters.

"No, they are not! They are collaborators for the Zionists!" Hussein shouted during his trial on charges that his forces killed as many as 100,000 people during the campaign against Kurdish militants. "We will crush the heads of all Zionists and their collaborators!"

Several witnesses testified Tuesday at the trial, which is expected to last until at least December, about abuses by Hussein's military.

Akram Ali Hussein, 41, described what he said was a chemical attack in 1987 on the village of Sikanyan.

"We saw all the bushes had turned white," he said.

The following year, he said, the village was bombarded again and a dozen relatives, including his mother, sister and brother, were imprisoned. Later, he said, he learned that two cousins had died of hunger and that their bodies had been eaten by dogs at the prison.

"I want the whole world to know what he did," the witness said of the former Iraqi leader.

Hussein seemed exasperated on several occasions.

"When I am right I cannot be scared, and I don't think there is a power on Earth that can shake even one hair of my mustache," Hussein declared. "But I have noticed today that there were too many insults. And when you put a lion in a cage, any coward can put a stick in the cage and frighten him."

The Iraqi parliament, meanwhile, on Tuesday shelved a measure that would have forced American authorities to present a schedule for the withdrawal of U.S. and other foreign troops from Iraq.

"We demand a timetable to rebuild our Iraqi forces and to rehabilitate our army," said Dhafir Ani, a representative of the minority Sunni Arab bloc. "This gathering today is the first step for a political stance against the occupation and to unite Iraq."

The Bush administration has refused to give a timetable for withdrawal, saying it would embolden the insurgency.

The resolution is said to have the support of more than 100 lawmakers, including followers of militant Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr.

But the Shiite leadership in the 275-member parliament opposes a strict timetable, and the proposal was sent to a committee for study.

It was another violent day in the capital, where a car bomb killed six people and wounded 15 in the upscale Mansour district, the site of frequent attacks and kidnappings. The bomb targeted a passing U.S. patrol, authorities said, but no U.S. troops were reported injured.

Elsewhere, the country's communal slaughter persisted amid grisly new finds of bodies.

A hospital source said authorities discovered six beheaded bodies in Baghdad's Ghazaliya neighborhood. Ghazaliya is one of a number of districts "cleared" during a recent U.S.-led sweep that reduced violence. But there has been a resurgence of violence in the district since most U.S. forces moved on to other neighborhoods.

The bodies of 10 young men, all gunshot victims, were found in various parts of Baghdad and delivered to the morgue, an official said. Most had signs of torture. Four other bodies were found south of Baghdad, authorities said.

In the troubled, mixed-sect province of Diyala, northeast of the capital, officials said two Sunni mosques were attacked and burned Tuesday. Those assaults followed an attack Monday on a Shiite mosque. Factions also fired about 40 mortar shells, officials reported. There was no word on casualties.

A hospital source in the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi said three people were killed and five injured in clashes between gunmen and U.S. forces. There was no confirmation from American authorities.

The Associated Press reported that at least four people were killed and two dozen wounded in a bomb explosion near a market in the town of Miqdadiya, northeast of the capital, and that gunmen shot and killed four Kurds in the northern city of Mosul. Kurds and Arabs have been battling in Mosul and in Kirkuk, a key northern city.

Soldier Describes Anguish In Revealing Murder Allegations (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, September 13, 2006

On a night in June, Pfc. Justin Watt lay in his cot in Iraq, anguishing over whether to tell Army investigators that he suspected soldiers from his own platoon had raped a 14-year-old girl and then killed her and her family.

He decided to call his father back home. "If you knew something bad about your brothers," Watt asked him, "would you come forward?"

The satellite phone link between Iraq and South Carolina was clear, and Rick Watt remembers that his son sounded distraught.

An Army veteran, the elder Watt asked for details, but Justin Watt would offer none. Finally, Rick Watt told his son that whatever had happened would have to be monstrous. "Heinous," he said, "is the only reason for giving up a brother."

Hours later, Justin Watt, 23, of Tucson, told authorities what he had learned from talking with another soldier from their platoon in the 101st Airborne Division. That soldier is one of four now accused of the killings March 12 in Mahmoudiya, Iraq.

In the months since, the four soldiers have been charged in a military court in Iraq with rape and murder. Another soldier is accused of failing to report the crime. And Steven Green, a platoon member discharged from the Army since the crimes, faces rape and murder charges in federal court in connection with the case.

If the allegations prove true, the assault by American soldiers would be among the worst atrocities of the Iraq war. "It is extremely damaging to the standing of the United States," Samir Sumaidaie, Iraqi ambassador to the United States, told ABC News, "(and) hurts the fight against terrorism."

By coming forward, Watt became — in the eyes of his father and one Army officer — a different kind of war hero, one whose valor wasn't immediately commended and who now lives with the fear of payback from other soldiers. A U.S. senator has told the Army that Watt has "received threats," and the Army says it is investigating whether Watt is in danger.

In interviews by telephone and over the Internet from Iraq, Justin Watt recounted for the first time details about his decision to come forward. He declined to discuss the criminal case or any threats against him because they are under investigation. But he explained how the violence that racked his platoon all year and claimed so many of his friends drove his decision.

Since being assigned to a different unit and moved away from those who may resent what he did, Watt says he feels isolated and misses his buddies.

"I'm an ordinary guy in an extraordinary situation who is dealing with a stupid amount of stress right now," he says. "This investigation hasn't changed the fact that I'm at war. I still deal with that every day. The only difference is, now when I come home, in the back of my mind I'm thinking, 'Could something happen to me because of this?' I don't know."

'We'd come through hell'

Mahmoudiya is in a region south of Baghdad known as the "Triangle of Death," an area patrolled since October by Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 502nd Regiment of the 101st Airborne.

Bravo, particularly the 1st Platoon in which Justin Watt served, has suffered heavy casualties. "There was a saying," Watt recalls, " '1st Platoon is in no shortage of very good, but very unlucky, men.' "

DOJ_NMG_0062382

He would later testify in a military court: "We'd come through hell with each other."

His best Army friend and former roommate, Pfc. Tyler MacKenzie, 20, of Evans, Colo., died in a roadside explosion in November. Four 1st Platoon soldiers were killed in a 12-day period in December. In February, an electrical fire swept through the company barracks. Watt lost letters and pictures from home, a digital camera, an iPod and a knife that was a gift from his father. By then, he says, he was convinced he would not survive Iraq.

On March 12, in the midst of the platoon's hard-luck tour, the bodies of Abeer Qassim al-Janabi, 14; her 5-year-old sister, Hadeel; their mother, Fikhriya Taha; and their father, Qassim Hamza, were found in their Mahmoudiya home. The Army initially blamed the assault on insurgents.

Three months after the Iraqi family was found slaughtered, the 1st Platoon suffered a devastating attack. Insurgents overran a checkpoint in Youssifiyah on June 16, killing Spc. David Babineau, 25, of Springfield, Mass., and capturing Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, of Houston, and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25, of Madras, Ore. Watt was close friends with Tucker and Menchaca, who were later found tortured and killed.

Watt says he could barely sleep after the kidnappings. When he did, he had nightmares about dead Iraqi children or slain comrades, talking to or staring at him. The bodies of Tucker and Menchaca were discovered June 19.

What he learned

Shortly after the kidnappings, Watt spoke with another Bravo Company friend, Sgt. Anthony Yribe, 22. According to testimony Watt later gave in court, reported by a small group of journalists allowed inside the hearing, Yribe disclosed a terrible secret: He suspected that 1st Platoon soldiers had attacked the Iraqi family March 12.

Shaken, Watt later approached another soldier in 1st Platoon, Pfc. Bryan Howard, 19. Howard, Watt testified, told him a gruesome story. The details emerged during a so-called Article 32 hearing held in Baghdad last month. In such hearings, an investigator listens to evidence and decides whether to recommend a court-martial.

The Article 32 hearing considered charges of rape and murder against the four soldiers: Howard, Spc. James Barker, 23, Sgt. Paul Cortez, 23, and Pfc. Jesse Spielman, 21. A fifth, Yribe, is not alleged to have taken part in the attack and is charged with dereliction of duty for failing to report the crimes.

The official transcript of the hearing has not been released. According to the testimony reported by a pool of journalists and made available to news outlets, the rape victim and her family lived about 220 yards from a traffic-control point in Mahmoudiya. For several days before the killings, Howard, Barker, Cortez, Spielman and then-Army Pvt. Steven Green staffed the checkpoint.

Army investigator Benjamin Bierce testified at the hearing that Green repeatedly spoke of his desire to kill Iraqis and emerged as the leader of the attack, the media pool report said.

The soldiers also talked about the 14-year-old girl, whom they had seen passing through their checkpoint, Bierce testified.

Bierce testified at the Article 32 hearing that on March 12, the group had a plan to assault the girl. With Howard acting as lookout, Barker, Cortez, Spielman and Green entered the family's house, Bierce testified. Green herded the parents and the 5-year-old into a bedroom, according to the pool report of a statement made by one suspect, Barker.

At the hearing, there was conflicting evidence about who raped the girl, according to the pool coverage. Army investigator Michael Hood, for example, testified that Spielman passed a polygraph test in which he denied raping or shooting anyone during the attack. Cortez, in his statement, denied raping the girl. Howard's lawyer, Army Capt. Megan Shaw, argued that he did not believe the attack was actually going to happen.According to Barker's statement, Cortez pushed Abeer, the 14-year-old girl, to the floor, lifted her dress and tore away her underwear as she struggled. Barker said in his statement that he and Cortez both attempted to rape the girl.

Barker also said he heard gunshots from the bedroom, and an agitated Green emerged holding an AK-47, the media pool report said. "They're all dead. I just killed them," he told the others, according to Barker's statement.

Green then raped the girl and shot her to death, Barker told investigators, and her body was set on fire.

'Put yourself in my shoes'

Watt says he struggled over what to do about what he had learned from Howard and Yribe. He would later testify at the Article 32 hearing that the Army excels at teaching soldiers everything from hygiene to rifle assembly. "But there's nothing I've read that says what to do if your buddies have raped and murdered a family," he said in court, according to the media pool report.

"Put yourself in my shoes," Watt says in an interview. "My roommate's dead. A bunch of my friends are dead. Two of my buddies are being tortured to death. Green is back in the States. He doesn't have to suffer at all. These good men are dead."

Watt says he's not religious. But months before, when so many friends were killed, he had prayed for God to give him strength. As he wrestled with a decision, he says he sensed God was watching. "I felt like if I didn't do the right thing, I wasn't holding up my end of the deal," Watt says. "If I didn't do anything, I was dead. Lost my grace with God."

DOJ_NMG_0062383

That's when he called home. Watt says he had already decided to go to authorities before the call home to his father. But he says he needed — if only briefly — to connect with his dad. "I knew there was a world to go back to where people cared about me," he says. "I didn't feel so alone."

After the call, Watt asked to speak to a mental health counselor. Subsequent media reports said that a soldier receiving counseling suddenly had reported the attack on the Iraqi family.

Watt says there was nothing sudden about it.

He asked to speak with a mental health counselor because he wanted to bypass what he thought would be a skeptical command structure and get an audience with Army investigators, he says. Through the mental health counselor, Army investigators were notified and interviewed Watt.

Documents in the federal court proceeding against Green say investigators were tipped off June 20. By that time, Green had been sent home from Iraq and discharged from the Army in May with a "personality disorder," according to the documents.

After Watt came forward, the FBI arrested Green in North Carolina on June 30. He has pleaded not guilty, and his arraignment in federal court on rape and murder charges in the Mahmoudiya case is scheduled for Nov. 8 in Louisville.

Based on the evidence presented at the Article 32 hearing for the five soldiers charged in Iraq, Army Col. Dwight Warren issued a report Sept. 3 recommending that they face a court-martial. A final Army decision on that recommendation is pending.

The four soldiers charged with rape and murder, who could face the death penalty if convicted, were recently transferred to a stateside military jail in an undisclosed location, Army spokesperson Kelly Tyler says.

Two weeks after testifying in the Article 32 hearing, Watt was moved from Bravo to Charlie Company. Capt. William Dougherty, Charlie Company's commander, wrote to Watt's parents Aug. 2 praising their son. His comments were the first accolades from the Army the family has received.

"I am proud of him for coming forward. It took moral courage," Dougherty wrote in an e-mail Watt's father shared with USA TODAY. "I know that he has been through a lot."

Dougherty did not respond to a request for comment.

Rick Watt, 55, a demolition consultant from North Charleston, S.C., believes his son deserves a medal. "I'm amazed at the content of his character and his courage," he says.

Due to come home soon

Watt is the oldest of Rick and Vivi Watt's three children.

The couple separated last year, but the family remains close. Rick Watt says he worked hard to instill honesty in his children. "I'm a firm believer that when we leave this world, the only thing we take with us is the imprint we've made on other people, and our own reputation," he says.

Justin, considered by family members as the most sensitive and introspective of the three kids, seemed the least likely to choose the Army and combat, his brother Darin and his father say.

Watt dropped out of high school at age 17 and passed his high school equivalency exam so he could pursue his dream job: working for an Internet gaming company. The company failed within a year, and after working various jobs,Watt surprised his family by enlisting.

Like so many other soldiers in Iraq, he created a page on MySpace .com, a popular collection of personal Web pages. There, he listed his dad as his hero. Until Justin Watt took the page down from the Internet, it was a place to vent his frustrations and fears about war.

He noted on June 26: "Nobody will ever know that I brought justice to a murdered family."

When his name surfaced in the media, Rick and Vivi Watt pleaded for help from U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz. Kyl wrote the Army on Aug. 2, warning that Justin Watt had "received threats" and demanding that his safety be a priority. Kyl also questioned whether Watt should be shifted out of the 101st Airborne for his own security and provided a lawyer.

In a response Aug. 11, Army Brig. Gen. Bernard Champoux wrote that Watt has been provided a lawyer "although he is not suspected of any wrongdoing." Champoux also says that the Army is investigating Watt's claim that he has been harassed and mistreated since he came forward.

"In Pfc. Watt's sworn statement and his conversations with his chain of command, he expressed that he has never been personally threatened," Champoux wrote. "He was told about possible threats by another member of his (original) unit."

Watt's father shared with USA TODAY the exchange of letters written by Kyl and Champoux. Andrew Wilder, a spokesman in Kyl's office, confirmed that Kyl sent and received the letters.

Rick Watt says he is still not satisfied with the steps the Army has taken to keep his son safe.

"I am legitimately concerned," he says. "I guarantee you, if anything happens to my son, there will be careers lost and people will be prosecuted who are wearing brass today. Because I won't stop until it happens."

DOJ_NMG_0062384

Watt is now stationed in Latifiyah, a few miles from Mahmoudiya, and his unit is due to rotate home in a few days. He remains stunned by all that followed his decision to come forward.

"I don't regret it by any means," he says. "But, God, I had no idea it was going to be like this."

He says the Army has promised new assignments that he cannot discuss. "That's all I want," he says, "a fresh start."

Army Secretary Reveals Combat Death Plan (USAT/AP)

USA Today/AP, September 13, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Army Secretary Francis Harvey says he is aiming to "achieve perfection" in a new drive to inform families of soldiers killed in combat about the circumstances of their deaths.

In a memo obtained Tuesday by the Associated Press, Harvey outlines a far-reaching review he recently initiated of some 2,000 casualty reports from Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere.

In the Sept. 1 letter to Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., Harvey reveals a previously unknown element of the reforms: Commanders in the field must investigate even if the cause of death was apparent. Previously, such investigations were conducted only when there was uncertainty about the circumstances, Army spokesman Paul Boyce said.

The review follows highly publicized mistakes in what families were told about their relatives who had died. The best-known error involved Cpl. Pat Tillman, who quit professional football to join the U.S. Army Rangers and was killed in Afghanistan in April 2004. His family was originally told he had been killed by enemy fire, but five weeks later they learned that fellow Rangers had accidentally shot him.

Harvey offers heart-rending new details on the mishandling of one such case: A medic apparently misjudged a soldier dead and ordered other wounded soldiers treated first.

"As part of this program, numerous improvements have been made to the casualty reporting, notification, and assistance process in order to prevent the mistakes of the past, such as those that were made in (the) Sgt. McCaffrey and 1st Lt. Tyson case," Harvey wrote in the memo to Boxer.

He referred to two California soldiers shot to death in June 2004 by Iraqi civil-defense officers whom they were training: Spc. Patrick McCaffrey Sr., promoted posthumously to sergeant, and 1st Lt. Andre D. Tyson.

The Army initially told the men's families that they had died in a conventional ambush. Two years after their deaths, and nine months after its investigations were completed, the Army informed their survivors that the two were deliberately killed by Iraqi trainees patrolling alongside them.

According to Harvey, the mistake was the result of a bureaucratic oversight. The soldiers' unit had redeployed by the time Army investigators completed their probe in September 2005. By then, the soldiers' brigade had "lost visibility" of the investigation.

Additionally, the Army Casualty and Memorial Affairs Operations Center did not know of the existence of that last investigation, he said.

The Army secretary said he remains deeply involved in the reforms he recently initiated. "I personally review this program monthly," Harvey wrote, adding that he tracks individual cases where families have raised concerns about information they have or have not received.

"The objective is to achieve perfection — no errors at any time in any part of the process," he wrote.

Attached to the memo is a 2 1/2-page list of answers to questions Boxer had posed to Harvey regarding the circumstances of McCaffrey and Tyson's deaths.

McCaffrey's mother, Nadia McCaffrey, believes her son was left to bleed to death after he was shot repeatedly. According to the investigation completed in September 2005 and obtained previously by the AP, a crew of medics rushed to the scene to treat the wounded soldiers, driving straight into the "kill zone" with little protective cover.

A medic who assessed the wounded soldiers' condition said McCaffrey was dead. But another combat lifesaver checked McCaffrey's pulse and couldn't tell whether he had one or not, so he helped load him onto a truck, then gave him CPR. About halfway back to Camp Anaconda the soldier heard faint gurgling from McCaffrey and later felt a faint pulse, he wrote in a sworn statement the next day.

McCaffrey had a bullet and bullet fragments in his lungs, plus one in his abdomen and another in his chest cavity.

The document obtained Tuesday says, without naming names, that "the soldiers responding to the incident prioritized the casualties," starting with Tyson, who had a bullet in his brain, the projectile entering just below where his Kevlar helmet's protection stopped. "Other soldiers also at the scene related that Sgt. McCaffrey appeared dead due to the extensive visible injuries."

"This medic needs to be punished," Nadia McCaffrey said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0062385

The Army Criminal Investigation Command, which conducted the 2005 investigation, has found no other cases in which Iraqis who infiltrated the country's young security services have deliberately killed U.S. soldiers, according to the memo to Boxer.

Vote Of 'No Confidence' Would Be Unprecedented (RC)

By Emily Yehle

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

Now in their sixth year of complaining about Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Congressional Democrats have found a creative new way to make their case — borrow from Britain.

Last week, Senate Democrats tried and failed to force a vote on a "sense of the Senate" resolution calling on President Bush to "replace the Secretary of Defense." And while the text of their resolution didn't include the phrase, Democrats in both the House and Senate have taken to calling their effort a vote of "no confidence" in Rumsfeld.

Those two words that garnered so much media attention have a decidedly British twist — "no confidence" is the name of a motion in Parliament that can mean the end of a prime minister's reign.

Once those words left their homeland, however, they lost the power to force an official to resign or call a new election. In Congress, the term would have only a symbolic effect; a passed resolution with the phrase "no confidence" simply would relay the disappointment of Congress.

But perhaps Rumsfeld should feel honored: It's also a term that has never been used in legislation to oust a Cabinet official, Associate Senate Historian Don Ritchie said.

And such an action has "certainly never happened during a war with the Secretary of Defense," said James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University.

History, alas, was never made. The resolution, presented by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) on Sept. 6, didn't contain the words "no confidence" and the measure never reached a vote, as the GOP procedurally blocked it from being attached to the Defense appropriations bill.

The wording in Reid's measure is slightly different than that of a similar resolution sponsored by Rep. Charlie Rangel (D-N.Y.) in 2003. That piece of legislation was more forceful; it used words such as "immediately," "resign" and "failure." It also named Rumsfeld, whereas the recent proposed resolution only referred to the "current Secretary of Defense."

Congress hasn't impeached a Cabinet official since the 1870s, but executive officials have since left their post because of their unpopularity in Congress, Ritchie said. Sometimes, officials resign to preclude a more formal rebuke — impeachment.

In 1983, Anne Gorsuch resigned from her position as the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency after Members of Congress merely discussed the possibility of impeachment.

Democrats have not laid out impeachment as a strategy to force Rumsfeld out of office, but they still seemed attached to that other phrase borrowed from their parliamentary cousins. On Friday, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) sent to his organization's e-mail list an urgent appeal: "Demand a Vote of No Confidence in Secretary Rumsfeld."

Mideast Peril Growing Concern: Terrorist Havens In 'Failed States' (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

In April, Saudi Arabia disclosed plans for an unusual and hugely expensive project: a multibillion-dollar electrified fence along its 560-mile border with Iraq.

The move angered U.S. and Iraqi officials, but Saudi officials said Iraq's growing instability left them little choice. They said they were concerned about militants infiltrating from Iraq to carry out attacks aimed at either toppling the ruling family or inciting Saudi Arabia's restive Shiite minority to seek independence.

Concern about extremism seeping out of Iraq underscores a painful irony in the five-year-old war against terrorism: The U.S. and its allies now face the distinct possibility that the same kind of "failed state" that gave terrorists a haven when the Taliban ruled Afghanistan -- leading to Sept. 11 -- could be forming again, in more than one place.

Both Iraq and Lebanon are threatening to degenerate into states with weak central governments where extremists can thrive. Iraq already appears to serve as a kind of finishing school for young radicals seeking battlefield experience. In Lebanon, Hezbollah's war with Israel this summer both destabilized the country and enhanced the reputation of Hezbollah extremists, who in the past have demonstrated a desire to extend their reach beyond Lebanon's borders.

To make matters worse, Afghanistan itself now appears to be sliding backward so much that it could again become an international terror breeding ground.

DOJ_NMG_0062386

Forces from the U.S. and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization are locked in the bloodiest fighting in Afghanistan since late 2001. U.S. casualties are running at more than twice last year's rate. U.S. military commanders speak openly of an "Iraq-ification" of Afghanistan: Once-rare suicide bombings and roadside bombs have become common, and both arms and militants flow over mostly undefended borders. Much as in Iraq, the bulk of the Afghan insurgency is local, but there are signs al Qaeda-linked foreign fighters are participating.

Attack in Syria

The violence and instability roiling the Middle East spread to another country yesterday, as Islamic militants armed with machine guns, grenades and an explosives-filled van mounted a brazen but unsuccessful attack on the U.S. Embassy in Damascus, Syria. The attack in Syria, which borders both Iraq and Lebanon, left three of the attackers and one Syrian guard dead.

This unwelcome picture is forcing changes in America's posture across the region. Most significantly, the U.S. in midsummer abandoned a plan that Gen. George Casey, the top American commander in Iraq, had crafted that would have had the U.S. withdrawing some of its forces beginning this month.

Instead, the number of American forces in Iraq is increasing. In recent weeks the U.S. has shifted thousands of troops to Baghdad as part of an effort to secure the city, which means the U.S. has had to increase the overall number of troops in Iraq. Last week, the Pentagon said there were 145,000 troops, or 18,000 more than in late July and the highest level since the start of the year.

Senior military leaders say their top priority is to ensure that Iraq doesn't become a failed state. That has caused shifts in how U.S. forces operate on the ground. In places such as Tal Afar in northern Iraq and Tarmiyah, a Sunni stronghold northeast of Baghdad, U.S. military forces are reaching out to insurgent leaders in search of some sort of compromise that would get them to participate in the political process and move away from terror groups. As a result, American officers today are negotiating with Sunni leaders who only a couple of years earlier had been in jail.

U.S. officials acknowledge their main goal in Iraq now is to prevent it from turning into a place run by fundamentalists who export terrorism to the region. The administration's public comments also have shifted markedly in tone, from stressing the benefits of a democratic Iraq to citing the threats that failure in Iraq would pose to U.S. national security.

"If we abandon the Iraqi people before their government is strong enough to secure the country," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at an American Legion convention last month, "we will leave the makings of a failed state in Iraq, like that one in Afghanistan in the 1990s, which became the base for al Qaeda and the launching pad for the Sept. 11th hijackers." She added: "And we should not assume for one minute that those terrorists will not continue to come after the American homeland."

Similar concerns are leading the West to adopt a more aggressive strategy for extending the strength and reach of Lebanon's government. After several years of a U.S. policy of benign neglect toward the country, Ms. Rice threw herself into crafting and ensuring implementation of a United Nations resolution to create a peacekeeping force that the U.S. hopes will keep Hezbollah at bay. The U.S. Treasury Department has launched an effort to shut down the flow of money to Hezbollah from Iran. And partly to try to limit Lebanese citizens' attraction to Hezbollah -- which provides extensive local social services -- the U.S. pledged millions of dollars in aid and got involved in projects to clean up oil spills and rebuild wrecked schools.

The picture in Lebanon and Afghanistan, to say nothing of Iraq, is an uncomfortable one for the Bush administration. After Sept. 11, 2001, Mr. Bush announced a far-reaching policy shift. No longer, he said, would the U.S. allow what he called failed states to be havens for terrorist groups plotting attacks outside their borders. If the countries were unwilling or unable to root out extremist groups, the president said, the U.S. would strike both the groups themselves and the governments that sheltered or tolerated them.

Now the U.S. is forced to try to keep extremists from taking deeper root in the very places it hoped would be footholds for stability -- most notably Iraq.

There, a typical battle against the resilient and elusive guerrillas began one spring night on a trash-strewn lot in Samarra. U.S. soldiers quietly surrounded the house of a suspected leader of an insurgent cell. As the advance team took down the front door and burst inside, Army Capt. Chris Brawley climbed over mounds of garbage and trained his rifle on a back alley. A shadow went flying over a narrow alleyway separating two houses, as the suspect scurried across an adjacent roof and then merged into the darkness.

The nighttime sweep did net several other suspects. Soldiers roused a man named Ayoob from his bed, stepping around the dinner leftovers of fries and sausage on the floor of his decrepit living room. A man named Mahmoud was grabbed next to a hollowed-out vehicle that looked like a car bomb in the making. Soldiers also rounded up a skinny man with a scraggly goatee who had a bag of suspicious-looking circuit-breakers stashed in his house.

Back at their base, soldiers checked the detainees' names and photos against military intelligence reports. The reports said Ayoob was reported to have received training from al Qaeda-linked groups. Mahmoud had fought the U.S. in Fallujah and now specialized in small arms and roadside bombings. The skinny man's circuit-breakers were parts for improvised explosive devices.

The emergence of this new generation of experienced militants in Iraq -- along with the critical issue of how much political violence they may carry out in neighboring countries -- is a source of deep concern for counterterrorism officials.

Until now, Iraq's violence has largely been contained within the country's borders, except for the bombings that killed 60 people in Amman, Jordan, in November. Intelligence officials worry that extremists are building a durable foothold in the vast and lawless Sunni province of Anbar, in center-west Iraq, as a future base for attacks in neighboring countries like Jordan or Saudi Arabia.

Last week, President Bush cited an al Qaeda document found in Anbar that laid out a detailed governing structure for the province. It included education, justice and social-services departments plus an "execution unit" -- responsible for "sorting out, arrest, murder, and destruction."

A senior Jordanian official says that since the Amman bombings, Jordan is bolstering its long border with Iraq with motion-detectors, cameras and other electronics. After discovering that the bombers had entered with forged Iraqi passports, Jordan instituted a two-step system for entering Iraqis: Border personnel search them, while others study their passports for evidence they were faked.

The U.S. faces a diplomatic cost as three allies in the region -- Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey -- increasingly chart their own courses because they see a possible threat to their security from extremists in Iraq. The U.S. communicated "unease" to Saudi Arabia after it announced plans for its fence, according to a U.S. official familiar with the exchange. The U.S. saw it as a slap in the face of the new Iraqi government. But the Saudis said they would press ahead.

The U.S. has renewed its push to build a force that can hold Iraq together. In the early days after the 2003 invasion, U.S. officials were hesitant to build too strong an Iraqi army. The concern was that if the army became the most powerful instrument in the country, it would dominate political affairs, and instead of a flowering democracy Iraq might begin to look like other Middle Eastern states.

Today, the U.S. military's focus is building as strong an Iraqi army as possible to impose some semblance of order. Often that means empowering Iraqi commanders who have little faith in or loyalty to the current government. At Camp Taji, a U.S.-run base in central Iraq, many senior officers in Iraq's sole armored division are Sunnis who once were officers in Saddam Hussein's military.

Many of the officers express little faith in Iraq's current Shiite-led government. Some complain openly that the current Iraqi prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, is little more than a puppet of Shiite-dominated Iran. To enlist these officers' support, U.S. commanders have used the promise of a steady paycheck, as well as appealing to their wish to stem chaos in their country.

In Lebanon, the government's inability or unwillingness to curb Hezbollah has given the group a better base from which to carry out attacks. Hezbollah has long shown a willingness, but limited ability, to attack outside the Mideast. Now, the State Department's most recent "Patterns of Global Terrorism" report says Hezbollah "has established cells in Europe, Africa, South America, North America and Asia." That contrasts with other militant groups in the area such as Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, which restrict their operations to Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Hezbollah's history worries terrorism experts even though its last known overseas strike was more than a decade ago. A few months ago, Argentine prosecutors announced that the deadliest act of terrorism in their country -- a 1994 suicide bombing at a Buenos Aires Jewish community center that killed 85 -- had been carried out by a Hezbollah member, Ibrahim Hussein Berro.

Israeli intelligence officials say that in 2002, representatives of Hezbollah and other Islamic fundamentalist groups met in a South American area called the tri-border region (the intersection of Brazil, Argentina and Paraguay) to discuss possible strikes. "Hezbollah thinks globally, not regionally," maintains Ilan Berman, an Iran expert at the right-leaning American Foreign Policy Council.

Meanwhile, amid mounting concerns that Lebanon and Iraq are becoming terrorist havens akin to Afghanistan under the Taliban, Afghanistan itself appears to sliding back toward disarray.

U.S. and NATO commanders cite three big problems there. The Hamid Karzai government is deeply unpopular in many rural areas, seen as a U.S. puppet. Opium-poppy production is skyrocketing, with Afghanistan now supplying 92% of the world's supply of the heroin ingredient, according to the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime. The biggest threat is a military one: A resurgent Taliban has triggered the heaviest fighting since the U.S. toppled the fundamentalist Islamic group's rule in 2001.

Taliban offensives have left more than 1,000 people dead in the past four months and greatly complicated reconstruction efforts. In just the past few days, a suicide bomber killed a provincial governor, and then another suicide bomber attacked at his funeral.

DOJ_NMG_0062388

NATO commanders in southern Afghanistan have been surprised by both the intensity of the Taliban attacks and the tactics used. They say the Taliban have shifted from ambushes to larger-scale ground assaults, in which the militants stand and fight rather than melt back into the countryside. On Thursday, NATO's top commander, Gen. James Jones, asked the alliance's 26 member states to send more soldiers, warplanes and helicopters to reinforce the allied forces battling the Taliban.

Some veteran observers of Afghanistan are watching the violence with alarm. In 2004, Joseph Collins, who had recently left a senior Pentagon post, wrote a scholarly paper saying the U.S. was successfully blending three missions in Afghanistan: combat operations, humanitarian aid and peace-keeping work. He called it "Afghanistan: Winning the Three Block War." If he wrote it today, Mr. Collins says, "There'd be a question mark in the title, if not two or three."

Young Anger Foments Jihad (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

During Monday's commemorations of the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11, 2001, I found myself wondering what the world will look like on the 10th anniversary, or the 20th. Will the catastrophe that began five years ago become a permanent feature of life -- a "long war" that won't end for many decades? Or will it gradually wane with time?

President Bush made an emphatic case for the long war in his speech to the nation Monday night. In his account, America is locked not simply in a war but in a meta-conflict, "the decisive ideological struggle of the 21st century and the calling of our generation." He described a global enemy of Muslim fanatics that imprisons women in their homes, beats impious men and attacks Americans at will. I admire Bush's toughness, but I disagree with his analysis.

As it happened, I spent the hours before Bush's speech moderating a discussion of the meaning of Sept. 11, which was hosted by the World Affairs Council here. One of the panelists was Marc Sageman, a man who comes to these issues with an unusual background -- he was a CIA case officer in Pakistan and then became a psychiatrist. I found in his comments a similarly unusual clarity.

Sageman argues in his book, "Understanding Terror Networks," that we are facing something closer to a cult network than an organized global adversary. Like many cults through history, the Muslim terrorists thrive by channeling and perverting the idealism of young people. As a forensic psychiatrist, he analyzed data on about 400 jihadists. He found that they weren't poor, desperate sociopaths but restless young men who found identity by joining the terrorist underground. Ninety percent came from intact families; 63 percent had gone to college; 75 percent were professionals or semi-professionals; 73 percent were married.

What transformed these young Sunni Muslim men was the fellowship of the jihad and the militant role models they found in people such as Osama bin Laden. The terrorist training camps in Afghanistan were a kind of elite finishing school --

Sageman likened it to getting into Harvard. The Sept. 11 hijackers weren't psychotic killers; none of the 19 had criminal records. In terms of their psychological profiles, says Sageman, they were as healthy as the general population.

The implication of Sageman's analysis is that the Sunni jihadism of al-Qaeda and its spinoff groups is a generational phenomenon. Unless new grievances spawn new recruits, it will gradually ebb over time. In other words, this is a fire that will gradually burn itself out unless we keep pumping in more oxygen. Nothing in Sageman's analysis implies that America should be any less aggressive in defending itself against terrorism. But he does argue that we should choose our offensive battles wisely and avoid glamorizing the jihadist network further through our rhetoric or actions.

Sageman's focus on the generational arc of violence got me thinking about my recent trip to Iran. The revolutionary intensity hasn't disappeared there, but it is certainly further down the curve than is the Sunni world. When I attended Friday prayers at Tehran University, I was struck by how old the people shouting "death to America" were. I would guess the average age was well over 40. The generation of the Iranian revolution is getting long in the tooth. The only sure way to ignite revolutionary zealotry in the younger generation would be for America to go to war with Iran -- something I dearly hope we can avoid.

There's another small detail about Iran that strikes me as relevant, now that I'm back home. As I explained in an earlier column, Tehran is a city of crazy drivers who nearly collide at every intersection. But the police are quite strict about requiring seat belts -- something I don't often see in the Muslim world. Even fatalistic taxi drivers buckle up. Another surprise: When I was traveling last week from Tehran to the holy city of Qom, there were actually police on the highway with radar guns, stopping pilgrims who might be tempted to speed. And I'm told the new mayor of Tehran, Mohammad Qalibaf, who succeeded the rabble-rousing Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has created a special hotline so people can call and get potholes filled and trash collected.

Now I submit to you: A nation that is wearing seat belts is probably not a mortal enemy of the United States.

This is a week when we remember, with horror, that there are dangerous killers in the Muslim world. But unless we make big mistakes, we should not find ourselves condemned to a permanent war, much less a clash of civilizations.

Justice's Next Level Of Protection (GCN)

By William Jackson, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, September 13, 2006

IT security program focuses on database vulnerabilities

A key element of the Justice Department's security program is managing vulnerabilities in its IT systems. According to director of IT security Dennis Heretick, when it comes to compliance with the Federal Information Security Management Act, this is even more important than implementing operational controls.

"Vulnerability management has been the emphasis of our program," Heretick said. "That is what FISMA is all about. What are your weaknesses, and what can you do about it?"

The department started with network and configuration scanning, using tools such as FoundScan from Foundstone Inc. (now a division of McAfee Inc.) and the open-source Nessus scanner, managed by Tenable Network Security Inc. of Columbia, Md. This year the department is expanding its scanning capabilities to assess application security, beginning with database software.

Two Justice offices, the FBI and Office of Justice Programs, already had been using the AppDetective scanner from Application Security Inc. (www.appsecinc.com) of New York. Other offices in the department were making plans to use it, Heretick said. "We expanded that with an enterprise license" this summer, he said. "We've started scheduling our training now."

AppDetective is AppSecInc's flagship product. It is a network-based scanner that can work with other tools such as FoundScan, but it is specialized for identifying and fixing database—rather than network—vulnerabilities. Heretick said he had been aware from the beginning of the need for application-level assessments, but the network and security configurations came first.

"There is so much to be done, we had to prioritize," he said.

AppDetective performs two primary functions: discovery and assessments.

"You need to know your inventory before you can secure it," Heretick said.

Application discovery is more than a formality, even for databases that can cost up to $1 million a year to maintain, said AppSecInc's vice president of marketing Ted Julian.

"In almost any organization we are in, they usually find a significant number of databases they were not aware of," Julian said.

Organizations change over time. People leave, and detailed knowledge of assets can be lost. Auditing organizations that keep track of resources tend to be centralized, while the rest of the enterprise is decentralized, allowing some valuable assets to fall into the cracks. But just because a database doesn't appear on an inventory list doesn't mean that it's an orphan. Somebody is usually maintaining the program, and it's likely to contain valuable data that requires protection.

Once an inventory has been created, App-Detective performs automated penetration tests and inside audits. Penetration tests are done from a hacker's-eye point of view, with no access privileges required for the device. "If we can see it, we can assess it," Julian said.

AppDetective also performs an inside audit of databases and their applications to assess security levels. The scanner supports most common databases, including MySQL, Oracle, Sybase, IBM DB2 and DB2 on Mainframe, Microsoft SQL Server, Oracle Application Server and Lotus Notes/Domino. The company recently announced it was seeking Common Criteria certification for the software through the National Information Assurance Partnership. Testing will be performed by Science Applications International Corp. in its Columbia, Md., lab.

AppDetective can run as a standalone product, with licenses costing $900 for each database scanned. For scaling in larger enterprises, the App- SecIncConsole provides centralized management and reporting for the scanner.

Reports rank vulnerabilities according to level of severity, with detailed information and links to vendor patches or data on workarounds. Automated routines are also available to fix common problems such as changing or shutting down default passwords and accounts. "We build the scripts, and the administrators can plug in their own values," Julian said.

The FBI and Justice programs began using the database scanner in 2004. Those infrastructures must have been more tightly managed than most, for few unknown databases were uncovered.

"I don't think there were any surprises," Heretick said. "There were vulnerabilities."

AppDetective was able to spot them well enough to convince Heretick to get an enterprise license. He'll also be implementing the $10,000 console for management as AppDetective is rolled out through the department. As training on the scanner progresses, Justice will pilot it throughout the department.

Vulnerability scanning and assessment is not a one-time event. Because of the dynamic nature of networks and the time needed to correct problems, repeated if not continuous scans are necessary to keep track of vulnerabilities and track progress in remediation.

The ability to document remediation and security postures is helpful in meeting FISMA certification and accreditation requirements, Julian said. Heretick said vulnerability assessments during system development will be valuable for creating secure systems.

Database application security is not the end of the security road for Justice, Heretick said.

"There are other things still on the radar, such as Web applications," he said. "The list of things you have to do never stops."

He said work has begun on Web application vulnerability assessment tools, but nothing has been selected for an enterprise license.

By Roseanne Gerin, Staff Writer

Washington Technology, September 13, 2006

Accenture Ltd. won a contract potentially worth $54 million from the Justice Department to construct a new, integrated debt collection system.

Under the contract, Accenture of Hamilton, Bermuda, will consolidate multiple legacy systems into an integrated system. The management and technology consulting firm also will operate and maintain the system.

The Justice Department and all of its component agencies, including the U.S. Attorneys Offices, tax and litigation divisions, and the offices of the chief finance officer and CIO, will use the system.

Accenture, which has more than 133,000 employees and had annual revenue of $15.6 billion in fiscal 2005, ranks No. 24 on Washington Technology's 2006 Top 100 list of the largest federal IT contractors.

Accenture Receives Two Federal Government Contracts (WASHBIZ)

Washington Business Journal, September 13, 2006

Management consulting and technology services company Accenture said Tuesday that it won two federal contracts, one each with the Department of Justice and the Department of Homeland Security.

Accenture, which has local offices in D.C. and Reston, says the Justice contract calls for the company to deliver a new integrated debt collection system to the department and all its component organizations, including U.S. attorneys' offices.

Accenture will also provide operations and maintenance to support the new system, which will help the Justice Department improve its communications and reporting and provide better financial controls.

The contract is valued at $54 million if all options are exercised.

Under the Homeland Security contract, Bermuda-based Accenture (NYSE: ACN - News) will support the department's program for acquiring information technology services over the next five years.

Accenture officials say the value of this contract isn't yet known.

The consulting giant employs more than 133,000 people in 48 countries.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Boardroom Fallout Dunn Resigns As H-P Chairman Amid Furor Over Phone Probes (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman And Joann S. Lublin

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. named Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd to succeed its embattled chairman, but the computer maker faced a graver legal threat as California's attorney general said he has enough evidence to bring criminal charges against people at the company.

Mr. Hurd will succeed Patricia Dunn, H-P's nonexecutive chairman, in mid-January 2007. Her efforts to catch boardroom leakers last year led the Palo Alto, Calif., company to hire a contractor that scrutinized the private phone records of H-P's own directors and nine journalists.

DOJ_NMG_0062391

H-P has said those records were improperly obtained by outside investigators through the use of "pretexting," or masquerading as the directors and journalists in order to request their records from phone companies. Mr. Hurd and Ms. Dunn apologized for the company snooping yesterday, though Ms. Dunn reiterated boardroom leaks had been a substantial problem for H-P.

In addition, H-P said George Keyworth, a former presidential science adviser and H-P's longest-serving director, resigned from the board. Mr. Keyworth was identified in Ms. Dunn's probe as a leaker of information to the press.

A spokesman for California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, confirming a remark made by Mr. Lockyer in an interview on the NewsHour with Jim Lehrer, said state investigators have "sufficient evidence to bring criminal charges against individuals inside Hewlett-Packard as well as outside the company." In the interview, Mr. Lockyer said: "People's identities were taken falsely, and it's a crime. People accessed computer records that have personal information. That's a crime."

Yesterday's resignations reflected a tense compromise worked out among some of H-P's disaffected board members, brokered by Mr. Hurd and H-P's outside attorney, Lawrence Sonsini. The compromise addressed the bitter infighting on H-P's board but it failed to deal with many of the questions that lie behind a host of investigations, including Mr. Lockyer's.

Among the welter of questions still unanswered: Besides Ms. Dunn, who knew within the company and the board that personal phone records were being scrutinized? Why didn't that practice raise alarm bells, even if it wasn't clear that the records were obtained via "pretexting"? Why didn't Mr. Hurd, who was given the results of the investigation two months before they were presented to the board in May, kill the probe before it blew up?

An H-P spokesman said Mr. Hurd focused only on the leaker when he first heard the results, not the methods used in the investigation. The CEO found out only in recent weeks that pretexting was involved and that journalists were targeted, and he worked with the board to turn the matter over to outside lawyers for investigation, the spokesman said.

People familiar with the matter said H-P has told them one of the outside investigators it used is Ronald R. DeLia of a small Boston firm called Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. (See related article3.) An H-P spokesman reiterated that the company isn't commenting on who did its investigative work.

The H-P board met by phone Sunday morning and the meeting ended inconclusively after about three hours. The directors couldn't figure out how to satisfy both Ms. Dunn and her two main adversaries -- Mr. Keyworth and Thomas Perkins, a venture capitalist and former H-P director.

Outside the boardroom on Sunday and Monday, negotiations continued among high-powered lawyers representing the principals. The board reconvened Monday night with Ms. Dunn apparently resistant to the notion of her stepping down.

To break the impasse, H-P agreed to issue two statements yesterday. In the first, H-P announced Ms. Dunn's resignation as chairman -- the main demand of the Keyworth-Perkins side. She will stay on as a director after the resignation takes effect in January. Ms. Dunn apologized for the methods used in the leak probe, saying they "went beyond what we understood." She defended the probe itself as an "important investigation that was required after the board sought to resolve the persistent disclosure of confidential information from within its ranks."

The second H-P statement, delayed several minutes yesterday morning as the lawyers haggled over final wording, announced Mr. Keyworth's resignation. It included explicit regrets from Mr. Hurd and Ms. Dunn for violating the privacy of Messrs. Keyworth and Perkins. The two are old friends, and Mr. Perkins resigned from H-P's board in May to protest the leak investigations.

The second statement also described Mr. Keyworth's role in leaking information, without H-P authorization, to a reporter with CNET News in January. The statement said H-P's board recognized that Mr. Keyworth was trying to "further H-P's interests." The statement added that Mr. Keyworth often had met with reporters at H-P's request. He was described as "an important member of the H-P family."

H-P announced no action yesterday against Ann Baskins, its general counsel. Her office handled the leak investigation with outside private investigators. She is married to a partner at Wilson Sonsini, the company's outside law firm.

A U.S. House of Representatives committee is seeking information from H-P about the leak investigation, including the identity of private investigators that H-P used.

A spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation said yesterday an investigation started by the agency on Monday hasn't determined whether anyone in the case violated federal laws. LaRae Quy, a special agent in the FBI's office in San Francisco, said the investigation is focused on how the confidential information was obtained, not on H-P itself. The FBI normally doesn't discuss ongoing investigations but made an exception because there is "such a national interest," Ms. Quy said. H-P says it is fully cooperating with all the investigations.

Investors didn't seem worried about the remaining questions: H-P's stock rose 1.5%, amid broad gains in the market, and reached a five-year high. Since arriving at H-P, Mr. Hurd has overseen a surge in profit as the computer maker has won market share from rival Dell Inc.

As H-P's board deliberated, it had to wade through a thicket of legal and personality issues. It hesitated to disclose much about the privacy intrusions because of the active investigations by federal and state authorities. Meanwhile, Mr. Perkins and Mr. Keyworth, who is a protégé of the late H-P co-founder David Packard, were adamant that Ms. Dunn step down for triggering the leak probe and acting on the information gained via the privacy violations, people familiar with the discussions said.

Ms. Dunn said she would step down if asked but argued that she was only doing her job as chairman in ferreting out boardroom media leaks that could move stock prices and cause legal problems for H-P.

She had a particularly bad relationship with Mr. Perkins, the former H-P director. He accused her of betraying him by presenting the leak investigation to H-P's board in May rather than dealing with it more privately among a subset of the board, say people familiar with the situation. Other knowledgeable people say Ms. Dunn was told by Mr. Hurd and H-P's lawyers that she needed to present the information to the full board. Mr. Perkins went on to challenge H-P for its use of pretexting and hire his own lawyer.

Mr. Keyworth's associates have argued that the only evidence H-P has produced of Mr. Keyworth's leaking was the CNET story in January, which these people say was complimentary to H-P and didn't include many inside details. They say Mr. Keyworth felt that his long career in business and government was tarnished when he was branded a habitual leaker. His phone records were among those improperly scrutinized by H-P's investigators.

People close to Ms. Dunn have said there were a total of 10 leaks from late 2004 through March 2006, with seven of them linked to Mr. Keyworth. H-P hasn't gone that far in its public disclosures. A company Securities and Exchange Commission filing last week described "multiple leaks of confidential" information and said they dated "to at least 2005." The filing singled out Mr. Keyworth as a leaker, but it didn't say how often the company believed he had leaked information. The only incident of leaking H-P cited yesterday was the CNET article this year.

An executive familiar with H-P says leaks were a chronic problem before Mr. Hurd was named CEO in March 2005 but ceased as a major issue after that except for the CNET case. That leak disturbed top levels of H-P's management, said company spokesman Robert Sherbin, and prompted Ms. Dunn to reopen a previous leak investigation that had been inconclusive.

Mr. Keyworth declined to comment. An associate said he is particularly satisfied that Ms. Dunn is likely to spend much of her remaining four months as chairman in legal proceedings and hearings explaining -- and apologizing for -- H-P's intrusions of privacy.

H-P said that after Mr. Hurd assumes the chairman's post, the lead independent director on the board will be Richard Hackborn, who worked at H-P for 33 years and was a senior executive before retiring in 1993.

The carefully worded statements H-P issued yesterday also included a conciliatory message from Mr. Perkins: "I believe in HP. I believe in Mark Hurd. I applaud Jay Keyworth for his courage in stepping down today and thank Patricia Dunn for her grace in letting HP move on. This too shall pass."

Chairman, Director Resign In HP Scandal (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi And Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, September 13, 2006

The chairman of Hewlett-Packard Co. and one of its directors agreed yesterday to resign over a spying scandal that the California attorney general said could lead to charges against company employees, the latest shake-up for a board plagued by internal strife.

Chairman Patricia C. Dunn, who led the company's controversial efforts to identify the source of media leaks, will step down on Jan. 18, handing over the reins to Mark V. Hurd, currently the firm's president and chief executive. Dunn, who joined HP's board in 1998, will remain a director.

George A. Keyworth II, a longtime director whose phone records identified him as a source of the leaks, also resigned, effective immediately. But in a tersely worded statement, Keyworth defended his actions, saying his statements to the news media "did not involve the disclosure of confidential or damaging information."

It's unclear how soon charges in the scandal could be filed, but on last night's "NewsHour With Jim Lehrer" on public television, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said, "We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard, as well as contractors on the outside."

The management turmoil follows the resignation of Thomas J. Perkins, who stepped down from the board in protest in May when he learned that the outside investigators looking for the leak posed as company directors and journalists in an attempt to obtain private phone records, an act known as pretexting.

The HP board has been divided for years, stemming to Carly Fiorina's bid to acquire Compaq Computer Corp. when she was chief executive, a move that the company's founding family members and their allies opposed. When Fiorina was ousted in early 2005, Dunn was named chairman and soon after authorized an investigation into the leaks.

This week's resignations are unlikely to restore harmony to the board -- mostly, because the lineup of directors doesn't include any newcomers, said Charles M. Elson, director of the Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware.

The company designated current director Richard Hackborn, a 33-year veteran and former executive at HP, as the lead independent director. Dunn, who will remain on the board, said in a statement that she hopes to expand it.

"Ideally, you go outside" to fill such positions, Elson said, "but it's very hard to find someone to fill that spot."

Few people would have the industry experience and willingness to join a board under such intense scrutiny, he said.

Paul Hodgson, a senior researcher at the Corporate Library, a corporate-governance watchdog group, said HP's moves are only stopgap measures that won't address underlying issues, including that board members don't appear to trust one another.

"It is a dysfunctional board" that will need to fully replace at least three of its slots, Hodgson said, but at the moment, trying to attract qualified board members would be a tough sell. Consolidating board leadership under the chief executive, however, is not a step forward, he said.

"It makes things a little incestuous," he said. "The problem is that the HP board and management appear to have decided something needs to be done to escape unwelcome media attention, and Dunn was chosen as a scapegoat."

Andrea Zulberti, former chief administrative officer at Barclays Global Investors and who worked alongside Dunn for 15 years, defended Dunn, noting that it was her responsibility as chairman to address the matter of media leaks.

Dunn's management style at Barclays was always respectful of both corporate governance and private space, Zulberti said. "It's surprising that she could be tainted with something like this, because she was always respectful of privacy matters."

In written statements, Hurd promised to ensure that similar tactics will not be employed in the future, but a company spokesman declined to elaborate on any specific measures the company planned to take.

Hurd also issued apologies to Perkins and Keyworth for the phone-records spying.

"On behalf of HP, I apologize to Tom Perkins for the intrusion into his privacy," Hurd said. He added that while Keyworth's contact with reporters was not "vetted through appropriate channels," it was done to further the company's interests. "HP board chairman Patricia Dunn expressed regret for the intrusion into his privacy."

Meanwhile, Congress and federal and state investigators continue to pressure HP about the methods used to obtain those phone records, with calls from lawmakers from both parties to pass legislation, now pending, that would make it a crime to obtain people's phone records by impersonating them.

That follows separate probes by the FBI, a House subcommittee on investigations, the California attorney general and the Federal Communications Commission.

The House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee yesterday sent a letter to Dunn, requesting detailed information by Monday on the outside consulting firm and subcontractors that are accused of impersonating board members and reporters to obtain their records. The committee is requesting names of individuals and copies of contracts and all reports of the internal inquiry into the leak probe.

"The most logical potential course of action is to convene a hearing and bring in witnesses who can testify to the facts," said Larry Neal, deputy staff director for the committee, which last week called British Petroleum executives to testify about their failure to prevent a pipeline leak. The investigative panel, he noted, takes all its testimony under oath.

In her statement, Dunn did not take responsibility for accessing phone records, calling that "inappropriate techniques." "These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologize that they were employed," said Dunn.

Lockyer Addresses Possibility Of Hewlett Packard Indictments (LAT)

By James S. Granelli And Charles Piller

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

The boardroom intrigue at Hewlett Packard Co. intensified Tuesday as California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said he has "enough evidence to indict" people inside the Silicon Valley icon for snooping confidential phone records.

Criminal charges could be filed as early as next week -- deepening a weeklong corporate spying scandal that has riveted the close-knit technology industry, but has been largely ignored by Wall Street.

Lockyer's comments came just hours after HP sought to wind down the drama by announcing that Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn would surrender leadership of the company's board and that another director, George A. Keyworth II, had resigned.

Chief Executive Mark V. Hurd will become chairman at the board's next regular meeting on Jan. 18, defying the growing sentiment among big corporations that chief executives should not also run the board charged with overseeing them.

Hurd is not expected to be accused of wrongdoing.

Dunn, 52, came under fire last week after the revelation that she ordered a probe of press leaks that was conducted by private investigators who allegedly gained illegal access to the call logs of HP directors and reporters covering the company. Investigators allegedly impersonated the directors and reporters to access their records, a practice called "pretexting."

Keyworth was identified by that probe as having talked to reporters about board matters and was asked to resign in May. He refused, but another director -- venture capitalist Thomas Perkins -- quit the board in protest in May and took his concerns to the attorney general's office.

"Crimes have been committed," Lockyer said in an interview on PBS' "NewsHour with Jim Lehrer." "People's identities being taken falsely is a crime. People gaining access to computer records that have personal information -- in California, that's a crime."

HP spokesman Ryan J. Donovan said: "HP declines comment on this, except to say that we reinforce what we said: that we are cooperating fully with the AG's investigation."

Criminal charges against HP employees ratchets up the pressure on the Palo Alto, Calif., company and could threaten the turnaround engineered by Hurd, who was recruited last year from NCR Corp. to revive the storied maker of computers and printers.

It was unclear Tuesday whether Dunn is being targeted by Lockyer, who also said he had sufficient evidence to indict contractors outside the company. Neither HP nor Lockyer has identified the firms that conducted the leak probe, which was carried out earlier this year.

"Until the AG plays his cards, we're going to be guessing for awhile," said Michael L. Mallow, a white-collar defense lawyer.

HP is also under investigation by Congress, the FBI and the Securities and Exchange Commission. The company could also face civil lawsuits by the reporters whose records were obtained.

So far, Wall Street has greeted the controversy with yawns, focusing instead on Hurd's focus on the bottom line and the inroads the company has made against archrival Dell Inc. HP shares rose 56 cents Tuesday to $36.92, their highest level since January 2001.

But Lockyer's comments, which came after the close of financial markets, could change the situation for HP, said Michael D. Cohen, research director at Pacific American Securities.

"It's definitely going to impact the stock, but I think it will have minimal impact on operations," Coehn said. "The worst-case scenario is if Mark Hurd is somehow implicated, but I highly doubt he was. One reason the board is promoting him to chairman is that everyone thinks he has no culpability, no exposure, to any of this."

Lockyer said the deception in the Hewlett-Packard case violated three state laws. One bars obtaining utility records illegally, another bars "unauthorized use of personal identifying information," or identity theft, and the third covers "unauthorized use of data" -- a law more commonly applied to computer hackers.

Spying Uproar Causes Shuffle In Boardroom (NYT)

By Damon Darlin And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 12 — Hewlett-Packard shook up its board Tuesday in an artfully calibrated agreement that seemed to leave all the parties in its boardroom drama satisfied, if not happy. Its chairwoman will step aside in January, the chief executive will succeed her and the longest-serving director resigned.

The moves were part of an attempt to mend a board racked by disclosures that the company hired investigators who surreptitiously — and possibly illegally — obtained the private telephone records of directors and journalists.

Even while addressing its internal divisions, Hewlett-Packard faced the prospect of increased legal pressure. The California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, said that after looking into the company's investigative effort, "we have enough information to indict people inside H.P. and outside."

For the garage-born company, whose H.P. Way set a standard for corporate behavior in Silicon Valley, the troubles have clouded its image but underscored the resilience of its resurgent business. Even after a week of intense publicity over its upheaval, the company's stock closed at its highest level since 2001.

Hewlett-Packard's investigation now appears to have included active surveillance and the review of videos to see if board members were meeting with reporters, according to people with knowledge of the company's examination of its private detectives' activities.

They also identified a Massachusetts company, Security Outsourcing Solutions, as a Hewlett-Packard contractor hired to find the source of internal leaks. Efforts to reach that company by phone and e-mail were unsuccessful.

Hewlett-Packard has said only that an outside consulting concern, which it has refused to identify, hired subcontractors who gained access to phone records by pretending to be those subjects, a practice that has become known as pretexting.

Whatever the unresolved legal questions, the Hewlett-Packard board seemed to restore order on Tuesday. In a deal arranged in board meetings conducted by telephone that stretched over two days, Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive, will assume the title of chairman in January from Patricia C. Dunn, who will continue to serve as a board member. The delay was intended in part as a face-saving move for Ms. Dunn, according to people briefed on the board discussions.

An associate of George A. Keyworth II, a board member accused of leaking information to reporters, said he agreed to resign only after Ms. Dunn, his antagonist, agreed that she would give up her leadership post. As part of the deal, Richard A. Hackborn, a former H.P. executive who has served on the board since 1992 and was briefly its chairman, will be designated in January as lead independent director, a role engineered to counterbalance Ms. Dunn's influence on the board.

The statements issued by the company on behalf of the major players in the boardroom upheaval allowed the principal participants to justify their actions — whether Ms. Dunn in authorizing the investigation or Mr. Keyworth in his discussions with reporters — as having been in the company's best interest.

An associate of Ms. Dunn said that "Pattie is not unhappy with this," while a person close to Mr. Keyworth expressed a similar sentiment: "He is actually pretty happy."

Even Thomas J. Perkins, the venture capitalist who resigned from the board in May in a dispute with Ms. Dunn over the investigation, appeared pleased. In a statement issued by the company, he was quoted as saying: "I believe in H.P. I believe in Mark Hurd. I applaud Jay Keyworth for his courage in stepping down today, and thank Patricia Dunn for her grace in letting H.P. move on. This, too, shall pass."

Representatives of Mr. Perkins, whose disclosures about the investigation last week made the board's troubles public, refused to comment further.

Hewlett-Packard's two news releases — the first issued just before the stock markets opened for trading, and another several hours later after the parties struggled with their statements — were just as artfully worded.

They avoided the word "leaker," a term that an associate said chafed Mr. Keyworth, who served as science adviser to President Ronald Reagan from 1981 to 1986 as director of the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy. Instead, even though Ms. Dunn had said last week that Mr. Keyworth was responsible for 7 out of 10 leaks, the company took a softer stance on Tuesday.

It said the board "does not believe" that Mr. Keyworth's contact with a reporter from the technology news Web site CNET in January 2006 "was vetted through appropriate channels." Mr. Keyworth, who refused a request to resign in May, has always maintained that he met with the reporter to praise senior company officials and did not divulge confidential or damaging information.

He also said in one of the news releases that he was "frequently asked by H.P. corporate communication officials to speak with reporters — both on the record and on background."

Ms. Dunn was given the opportunity to justify her need for an investigation of board leaks and apologize for its methods. Mr. Hurd was able to state the company policy clearly: "I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again. They have no place in H.P." The company said it had ended its relationship with the investigations firm.

Delaying Mr. Hurd's assumption of the chairman's post gives Ms. Dunn " a more graceful exit than an immediate departure," said Charles Elson, director of the Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. "There needed to be change, but they wanted to do it so they limited damage to reputation."

It also reflected her interest in personally resolving the controversy and not saddling Mr. Hurd with that responsibility, associates of Ms. Dunn said.

Mr. Hurd came to the company as chief executive last year after the ouster of his predecessor, Carleton S. Fiorina, whom Ms. Dunn succeeded as chairwoman. It was news leaks in the final days of Ms. Fiorina's tenure that first set the internal investigation in motion.

Since Mr. Hurd's arrival, the company's business in personal computers and printers has thrived, with its stock price rising almost 85 percent. It closed on Tuesday at $36.92.

But a number of difficult issues remain unresolved, ones that may take more than four months to settle. Some of the inquiries, except for a formal Congressional request for documents related to H.P.'s outside investigators, are still informal. The Securities and Exchange Commission has alerted the company that it is seeking further information on the limited release of information about Mr. Perkins's resignation in May.

DOJ_NMG_0062396

Other investigations could pose bigger problems. Mr. Lockyer, the California attorney general, is conducting a criminal inquiry into the methods used by H.P.'s outside investigators, exploring whether they broke privacy laws. Mr. Lockyer said Tuesday night that he could not identify who might be charged, as his agency was still investigating.

The United States attorney for Northern California has said that he is conducting a parallel inquiry.

California's efforts are focusing in part on Security Outsourcing Solutions, according to someone briefed on the investigation. A spokeswoman for the Massachusetts attorney general confirmed that the two states were working together.

Hewlett-Packard refused to comment about any role the Massachusetts company might have played.

The company's Web site says: "When it is determined that specialized services are required, we select a firm from our network of affiliated companies to provide the services. Our in-depth knowledge of the security industry ensures that our clients receive the most favorable rates from our affiliates."

Ronald R. DeLia, whose Web site identifies him as the managing director of Security Outsourcing Solutions, did not respond to calls and e-mail messages seeking comment.

The company shares a business phone number and a Boston address with Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata, a law firm with offices in several cities. No one answered at the number Tuesday night. The firm's Web site says one of its specialties is internal corporate investigations.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said the Hewlett-Packard case underscored the need for more stringent laws and regulations to protect phone records.

"There are laws that might be applied, but prosecutors will tell you they have to cobble things together," Mr. Schumer said. In January, he was a sponsor of legislation that would make it a crime, punishable by up to 10 years in prison, to obtain telephone records fraudulently or to sell or purchase them.

HP Chief Turns A Bad Situation To His Advantage (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler And Jim Hopkins

USA Today, September 13, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Embattled computer giant Hewlett-Packard survived another boardroom brawl Tuesday — and CEO Mark Hurd appears to have won the fight.

Hurd, who has been CEO since April 2005, will become chairman on Jan. 18, HP said Tuesday. Current board Chairman Patricia Dunn will resign that post then, although she will remain a director.

George Keyworth II, a 20-year veteran of HP's board, also resigned Tuesday. Board member Richard Hackborn has been promoted to lead independent director.

The shuffle stems from a controversy over how HP tried to stop boardroom leaks to the press. The computer giant used sneaky — and possibly illegal — methods to obtain the home phone records of nine reporters and at least two board members.

The fallout threatened to rip apart the board. It plunged HP, a pillar of Silicon Valley, into scandal in less than a week. And it threatened to derail Hurd's attempt to turn around the computer giant.

But Hurd managed to simultaneously handle the crisis, get a promotion and lay the groundwork for bringing in new board members friendly to his style of governance. He "made the best of a bad situation," says Charles Elson, governance professor at the University of Delaware.

That doesn't mean HP has emerged unscathed. A host of government agencies, including the FBI, Department of Justice, House Energy and Commerce Committee, Securities and Exchange Commission and California attorney general, are looking into whether HP broke the law when it obtained the phone records. The legal cases could drag on for years, providing much bad press for a company troubled since the dot-com bust of 2000.

California's attorney general warned on Tuesday that company insiders could face criminal charges.

"We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett-Packard as well as contractors on the outside," Attorney General Bill Lockyer said on PBS' NewsHour with Jim Lehrer.

Hurd wants to move beyond the crisis quickly. "I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again. They have no place at HP," he said in a statement.

The news sent HP shares up 1.5% to $36.92 Tuesday.

The latest crisis helped Hurd prove his worth as HP's turnaround man — and his skill at the tricky game of corporate politics. That's even though "he's not the kind of person who enjoys this side of boardroom dynamics," says Jeff Christian, an executive recruiter who has known Hurd for more than 12 years.

"It was a new experience for Mark," says Christian. "Under the circumstances, I think he did a pretty good job."

The scandal began in 2005, when Hurd ran Ohio-based tech company NCR. Hewlett-Packard's then-CEO, Carly Fiorina, was clashing with her board. Information about it leaked to the press, so she hired a law firm to find the source.

The search was unsuccessful, and Fiorina was ousted in February 2005. Yet the leaks continued.

Responsibility for the search passed to Dunn, appointed non-executive chairman after Fiorina left. The former CEO of Barclays Global Investors, who gave up that job to fight a bout with breast cancer, has a reputation for integrity and honesty, says Christian. (Dunn was diagnosed with stage four ovarian cancer in 2004.)

Dunn hired a yet-unidentified detective firm and told it to conduct a legal investigation, HP says. But a subcontractor used a controversial technique called "pretexting" to obtain phone records. Pretexting is when someone contacts a company pretending to be someone else, in order to get that person's confidential records.

It worked, and Keyworth was exposed as the source of a leak to tech website CNet. He was outed during a May 18 board meeting. Dunn asked him to resign. He refused.

Another member, venture capitalist Tom Perkins, objected to how Keyworth was treated and resigned in protest. Later, he asked HP for more information about the investigation.

That inquiry eventually discovered the pretexting. Under pressure, HP revealed the news on Sept. 6, and the board began to meet to discuss the crisis. Hurd's promotion was announced early Tuesday, and about an hour later Keyworth announced his resignation.

"The invasion of my privacy and that of others' was ill-conceived and inconsistent with HP's values," he said in a statement. But he agreed to step down to protect HP's interests, he said.

Hurd was probably the driving force behind Keyworth's resignation and the compromise deal that allowed Dunn to stay on the board while still assuaging critics, says tech analyst Roger Kay at Endpoint Technologies Associates.

But he still must grapple with political fallout, says independent tech analyst Rob Enderle.

Pretexting falls into a legal gray area. The HP flap has made it a popular cause among lawmakers. The House has passed a bill that would expressly make it a federal crime to fraudulently obtain phone records. Congressmen James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., Lamar Smith, R-Texas, and Howard Berman, D-Calif., sent a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., last week urging the Senate to pass it, too.

Such battles are not Hurd's strong point, says tech analyst Crawford Del Prete at researcher IDC. The CEO is best known for his operational skills, which are helping HP recover from the dot-com bust and its controversial $25 billion acquisition of Compaq Computer in 2002, Del Prete says. Actions Hurd has taken include a restructuring and 15,000 job cuts. HP's stock has jumped 68% since he was hired in April 2005.

"Mark has proved that he's got the company under control," Del Prete says. But, he adds, Hurd has his hands full running an incredibly diverse company that competes with giants such as IBM, Sony and Canon, leaving little time for boardroom squabbles.

HP's once-vaunted reputation, already damaged in a nasty shareholder battle over the Compaq deal, might be more at risk. "I am astonished at the depth of poor judgment exhibited in this case," says Roger McNamee, managing director at Elevation Partners, a private Silicon Valley investment firm.

The fast-changing role of corporate boards may help explain what went wrong at HP. After energy giant Enron collapsed, tough new regulatory burdens were imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. It is designed to make boards accountable for a company's performance.

At the same time, shareholders now expect boards to fire CEOs who aren't performing. Directors once got all their information from management, but now they regularly interview employees who are not at headquarters. Most now collect information from outside sources, says RHR International.

That atmosphere helps explain why there were leaks and such a severe crackdown. HP directors make more than $200,000 a year in cash and stock.

Yet they couldn't keep secrets, the release of which could violate securities laws, says Corporate Library editor Nell Minow.

But the aggressive hunt for the source of the leak was even worse, says the University of Delaware's Elson. Snooping "chills effective director oversight. … It's very dangerous," he says.

Now HP must contend with a new risk: its chairman and CEO jobs are held by the same person. Fiorina held both titles, and that caused problems when she disagreed with the board, says Patrick McGurn, special counsel for Institutional Shareholder Services, an advisory firm.

It would be best if HP brought in several outside directors, including an outside chairman, he says. But such directors would probably be hard to find in the midst of its recent crisis, he says.

Once this has passed, "The board needs to bring in some new members," he says. "They need to fix what's wrong, and then they need to go forward," McGurn says.

HP Chair To Step Down In Aftermath Of Company Leak Probe (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Patricia Dunn will step down in January and be succeeded by CEO Mark Hurd amid a widening scandal involving the computer and printer company's possibly illegal probe into media leaks.

Director George Keyworth II, who acknowledged sharing company information with reporters, resigned from HP's board later Tuesday morning. The board had asked Keyworth to resign in May, but he refused.

Hurd will retain his existing positions as chief executive and president and Dunn will remain as a director after she relinquishes the chair on Jan. 18.

"I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again. They have no place in HP," Hurd said in a statement Tuesday.

Dunn apologized for the techniques used in the company's probe, which included "pretexting" in which private investigators impersonated board members and journalists to acquire their phone records.

"Unfortunately, the investigation, which was conducted with third parties, included certain inappropriate techniques. These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologize that they were employed," Dunn said in a statement.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard Co. rose 62 cents, or more than 1.7 percent, to $36.98 in Tuesday trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

The pressure on Dunn to step down began rising sharply on Monday when Congress and federal investigators entered the fray surrounding HP's investigation. The FBI, the U.S. Attorney for Northern California and the House Energy and Commerce Committee all joined the probe of the scandal swirling around HP's Board of Directors.

Dunn was angry about the media leaks of confidential board discussions and commissioned an unnamed outside firm to identify their source. They used Social Security numbers and other personal information to get phone companies to turn over detailed logs of home phone calls of reporters and company directors.

Although frequently used by private investigators, pretexting tests the bounds of state and federal law.

At a board meeting in May, Dunn identified Keyworth as the source of a news article that appeared on CNET Networks Inc.'s News.com in January. The board asked Keyworth, 66, to resign, but he refused. HP then barred him from seeking re-election.

"The invasion of my privacy and that of others was ill-conceived and inconsistent with HP's values," Keyworth said.

His ouster riled another board member, longtime Silicon Valley venture capitalist Tom Perkins, 74, who resigned and stormed out of the May 18 meeting.

Perkins' attorney later discovered that private investigators working for HP had obtained the last four digits of his client's social security number. They used that information to open an online account with AT&T, then called the telephone company and impersonated Perkins, asking for a record of phone calls to and from his house.

HP's investigators also obtained the phone records of several journalists, including those who work at The Wall Street Journal, BusinessWeek, The New York Times and News.com.

Keyworth, who has acknowledged talking to the media, was the former science adviser to President Reagan and director of the Physics Division at Los Alamos National Laboratory. He was not mentioned in the company's statement Tuesday.

On Tuesday, Dunn defended the need for the investigation.

"These leaks had the potential to affect not only the stock price of HP but also that of other publicly traded companies," she said.

HP's board met Monday night to discuss whether Dunn should remain chairwoman of the Silicon Valley giant.

Richard Hackborn, who has served on the board since 1992, will become lead independent director in January.

"I think the fact that they made the statement that she's going to leave solves most of the problem," said Roger Kay, who follows HP as president of Endpoint Technologies Associates, a market research firm. "I don't think it's that material precisely when she leaves."

Dunn's entanglement in the pretexting scandal marks a rare stumble for one of the most powerful women in corporate America.

The child of a vaudeville actor and a showgirl in Las Vegas, Dunn, 52, worked as a freelance journalist after college before taking a temporary secretarial job at Wells Fargo & Co.

She was CEO of Barclays Global Investors before she resigned from that post in 2002 to battle breast cancer and melanoma. Dunn joined HP's board in 1998 and became chairwoman in 2005, taking an active role in running the 11th largest company on the Fortune 500.

She oversaw the ouster of former HP CEO Carleton Fiorina in February 2005, and two months later introduced Hurd as Fiorina's successor.

Hurd wasn't well known on Wall Street or in the financial media before taking the reins of HP. But he enjoyed a solid reputation among business experts as a no-nonsense cost cutter familiar with nearly every facet of management. HP shares surged 10 percent the day his appointment was announced.

He was previously chief executive at Dayton, Ohio-based NCR Corp., a computer services company best known for its ATM machines.

At HP he orchestrated a cost-cutting campaign that, when it winds down later this quarter, will have resulted in as many as 15,000 layoffs. But morale had been noticeably higher under Hurd than Fiorina - until the pretexting scandal.

Dunn Steps Down As HP Chairman (FT)

By Kevin Allison, Richard Waters And Chris Nuttall

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

Facing the intense pressure of federal, state and congressional investigations, Hewlett-Packard on Tuesday announced the January departure of chairman Patricia Dunn as it moved to restore the reputation of the venerable Silicon Valley company.

However, the company's attempt to put a quick end to the controvery over its boardroom leak investigation was dealt an immediate blow by Bill Lockyer, California's attorney general. Speaking on television late on Tuesday, Mr Lockyer said his office already has "sufficient evidence to indict people both within HP as well as contractors on the outside."

Ms Dunn has maintained that she did not know in advance of the tactics used in the investigation that she had authorised into HP's own directors, but had delegated the job to the company's legal department. HP said its board had accepted that assurance in allowing her to remain as chairman until January, and to continue as a director after that.

Mark Hurd, chief executive officer, is to replace Ms Dunn as chairman in January, while Richard Hackborn, a company veteran, was named lead independent director, a new position designed to help restore confidence in the conduct of the board.

HP has been damaged by subterfuge ordered by Ms Dunn as she sought to uncover a boardroom mole. Private investigators impersonated company directors and journalists to gain access to phone records and identify the source of leaks showing dramatic rifts at the top of one of the world's most powerful companies.

News of Mr Hurd's appointment followed two days of emergency meetings by the HP board. It will allay fears that the spying scandal could put Mr Hurd's role as chief executive in jeopardy.

He has led a resurgence at the world's second-biggest computer maker since he took over following the removal of Carly Fiorina as chief executive last year. The leaks included details of discussions to oust her.

California's attorney general last week declared the practice of "pretexting" – assuming a person's identity to access personal information – as illegal. Federal prosecutors, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the US Congress have since launched their own investigations.

In an HP statement on Tuesday, Ms Dunn continued to defend the investigation into the leaks, which she said "had the potential to affect not only the stock price of HP but also that of other publicly traded companies."

"Unfortunately, the investigation, which was conducted with third parties, included certain inappropriate techniques. These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologise that they were employed," Ms Dunn said.

Mr Hurd said the techniques used by the board's investigators "had no place at HP".

"I am taking action to ensure that inappropriate investigative techniques will not be employed again. HP holds itself to the highest standards of business conduct and we are accountable to these standards for everything that we do."

Nel Minow, a corporate governance expert at The Corporate Library, commented: "What I was hoping they would avoid is a Queen of Hearts chop-off-her-head response, which would have done no good to anyone."

"The main thing they need to do right now is bring in someone to investigate and tell them what happened, and to bring in strong new directors."

HP refused to comment on whether it had launched a new investigation into the matter. It also announced that George Keyworth, the director identified as the source of the leaks, had resigned.

An HP spokesman defended a decision that Ms Dunn would stay on as a director.

"She has brought a lot of valuable insights into the company. She is still beneficial to HP,"he said.

He added that she was remaining chairman till January "so that she can tie up some loose ends with the investigation", but she had voluntarily decided to step down in order not to be "a distraction".

Carly Fiorina had combined the roles of chairman and chief executive. They were split when Mr Hurd took control.

HP shares were bolstered by news of Ms Dunn's resignation, rising 1.7 per cent to $36.97 in midday trading in New York.

People Inside HP Could Be Indicted (MERCN)

By Pete Carey

The San Jose Mercury News, September 13, 2006

California's attorney general said today his office has enough evidence in the Hewlett-Packard boardroom leak scandal to indict people inside the company on criminal charges.

State Attorney General Bill Lockyer made the disclosure on public television's Lehrer News Hour. He left no doubt that the investigation has uncovered knowledge by HP of the illegal gathering of the phone records of board members and nine journalists.

Last week, Lockyer speculated that the company's defense would be that it didn't know what its outside contractor was doing.

But today, he said ``We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people both within Hewlett Packard as well as contractors on the outside." Lockyer gave no names, job descriptions nor characterizations of the rank of the people inside HP.

An HP spokesman said, ``We are cooperating fully with the attorney general's investigation."

The company says it hired an outside investigative firm, which in turn hired another contractor. That contractor apparently used a practice known as ``pretexting" -- essentially lying and impersonating others -- in order to obtain the phone records of HP's board members and nine reporters.

Board Chairwoman Patricia Dunn has said she didn't know the contractors used pretexting to obtain the phone records.

Also investigating are the U.S. Justice Department, the House Energy & Commerce Committee's investigations subcommittee, the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Securities & Exchange Commission.

Lockyer May Indict In Hewlett-Packard Investigation (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, September 13, 2006

Sept. 12 (Bloomberg) -- California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said he has enough evidence to indict Hewlett-Packard Co. officials and contractors over the methods they used to gain access to telephone records of directors and journalists.

``We currently have sufficient evidence to indict people, both within Hewlett-Packard as well as contractors on the outside," Lockyer said today in an interview on ``NewsHour with Jim Lehrer" on public television station PBS.

Investigators hired by Hewlett-Packard broke the law by using false identities to obtain phone records of directors and reporters, Lockyer said. His comments underscored the seriousness of the scandal hours after Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, who hired the investigators, said she would resign to take responsibility.

U.S. lawmakers, the Justice Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are all looking into whether the Palo Alto, California-based company's tactics broke the law.

Dunn, named chairwoman in February of last year after the ouster of Carly Fiorina, hired an outside consultant to find out who had revealed information about the company's strategy and board deliberations leading up to Fiorina's departure.

`Pretexting'

The consultants hired another firm, which used fake identities to obtain phone records of directors and nine reporters, a method known as pretexting. Hewlett-Packard said it initially thought the practice was legal, then was advised that it may not be. Dunn, 53, will continue as a director after stepping down as chairwoman in January.

``Unfortunately the investigation, which was conducted with third parties, included certain inappropriate techniques," said Dunn, who is vice chairwoman of Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco, in a statement. ``These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologize that they were employed."

Lockyer said in the PBS interview that ``Crimes have been committed" and ``people's identities were taken falsely."

Lockyer didn't name the Hewlett-Packard officials or contractors who may be indicted or say when charges would be brought. Tom Dresslar, his spokesman, said Lockyer had ``nothing to add."

The comments indicate Lockyer ``believes he has that kind of evidence -- that someone knew about, or someone intended to commit, or have someone else commit a criminal act," David Shapiro, a former U.S. attorney in San Francisco, said today in an interview.

No Comment

Hewlett-Packard is cooperating with Lockyer's investigation, spokesman Ryan Donovan said. He said the company won't comment on the PBS interview.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard fell 27 cents in extended trading. They earlier rose 56 cents, or 1.5 percent, to $36.92 at 4:20 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd will take over as chairman of the world's second-largest personal computer maker in January. George Keyworth, who admitted to giving information to the media, resigned as a director of the company.

``Unfortunately the investigation, which was conducted with third parties, included certain inappropriate techniques," Dunn, who is also vice chairwoman of Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco, said today in a statement. ``These went beyond what we understood them to be, and I apologize that they were employed."

Boston Private-Investigation Firm Is Tied To H-P Boardroom Probe (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman, Steve Stecklow And John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

For the past week, Hewlett-Packard Co. has refused to identify private investigators the company retained to investigate leaks by its board of directors. People familiar with the matter say H-P has told them one of the investigators connected to the case is Ronald R. DeLia, from a small Boston firm called Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. that says it specializes in corporate-security investigations.

H-P, a Palo Alto, Calif., computer and printer maker, has said that it hired a private-investigation firm to carry out its inquiry; that firm then hired a second entity that used so-called "pretexting" to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists. Pretexting involves impersonating an individual for the purpose of obtaining phone or other records. People familiar with H-P's leak probe say the company's private investigators also dispatched monitors to attend at least one director's speeches and to see if this board member met with journalists afterward.

An H-P spokesman declined to comment on the possible use of surveillance by the company's leak investigators.

Mr. DeLia couldn't be reached for comment.

According to its Web site, Security Outsourcing Solutions "was formed to provide small- to medium-size corporations and institutions with the same level of security currently available only to Fortune 1000 companies." At one time, it published a newsletter called "Corporate Homicide: Life in a Global Economy." In a 1999 edition of the newsletter, Mr. DeLia warned that "identity theft is becoming a major law-enforcement problem about which consumers can ill afford to become indifferent." The newsletter said the Internet had made it easier for identity thieves to obtain addresses and Social Security numbers for a fee.

Massachusetts state records show that Security Outsourcing Solutions was formed in 1998 and lists its registered agent as Mr. DeLia. His wife, Caroline F. DeLia, is listed as president, treasurer, secretary and director. The records list the company's principal address as a residential home in Needham, Mass., a suburb west of Boston.

Security Outsourcing Solutions' Web site was registered in 1998. It originally listed Mr. DeLia as the company's managing director. In 1999, it called the company, which was formed only a year before, "one of the foremost security-management outsourcing firms dedicated to helping companies address and properly respond to internal and external security concerns in an efficient, cost effective, and service-oriented manner."

Answering the front door of the two-story house in Needham yesterday, Mrs. DeLia declined to comment and referred all questions to her husband, who she said wasn't home. A woman who identified herself as a relative said Mr. DeLia performed work for H-P but declined to elaborate. She referred all questions to Mr. DeLia.

Records show Mr. DeLia managed a Boston restaurant called the Grill and Cue before starting Security Outsourcing Solutions. The Grill and Cue, a 6,000-square-foot upscale billiards club and restaurant, opened in 1995 and went out of business in 1997, records show.

Security Outsourcing Solutions' Web site says the firm could help corporations whose internal-security departments "do not have the in-house expertise and or resources to address all of their organization's security concerns. We offer these companies the ability to access a world wide cadre of qualified security and investigative professionals on an as needed basis."

The firm's specific services range from helping with "physical security" to providing "comprehensive investigative services," the Web site says.

In an October 2005 story on the Web site of Government Security magazine, Mr. DeLia said, "Our business has changed dramatically. It's a global economy, and we have affiliations all over the world. We are not 'gumshoes' any more. We use a lot of computer-based tools."

U.S. Revisits Rewarding Firms That Waive Rights In Probes (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid criticism from business and legal groups and even some of its own former officials, the Justice Department is revisiting its policy of rewarding companies that agree to waive certain legal protections in criminal investigations.

But a senior official said any changes that would chill cooperation "would not be a good thing."

DOJ_NMG_0062402

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that corporations are eager to cooperate with federal prosecutors and expect to be rewarded for doing so, with or without an explicit federal policy to that effect. He later said the Justice Department is open to changes that "improve the process we have," but he raised concerns about inhibiting executives from sharing information with prosecutors.

Business and legal groups have been critical of the Justice Department policy, outlined in a 2003 memo on business prosecutions by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Thomas Donohue told the panel that the Thompson memo "emboldened federal prosecutors" to demand that companies and employees forgo rights, including the right to confidential discussions with lawyers, if the company wants credit for cooperating in an investigation.

American Bar Association President Karen Mathis said the policy has eroded basic constitutional protections and is discouraging firms and individuals from talking to lawyers. The ABA complained in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this spring, and a bipartisan group of 10 former Justice Department officials did the same last week, calling for a revised policy telling prosecutors that waiving attorney-client privilege and work-product protections "should not be a factor" in determining whether a company has cooperated with the government in an investigation.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) agreed that federal prosecutors should be neutral on corporate cooperation, saying he doesn't think anyone should get credit for waiving a constitutional right or be penalized for asserting it. He urged the Justice Department to revise its stance, saying he would like to see "if we can solve the problem without legislation."

Mr. McNulty called the Thompson memo a nonbinding statement meant to help prosecutors decide whether to charge a company, with cooperation one of nine factors to be considered. He said federal prosecutors chiefly are interested in obtaining reports of internal corporate investigations into wrongdoing, not confidences shared with lawyers. "I really don't see this as the kind of coercive practice that is being described," he said.

Still, because fighting criminal charges can lead to death sentences for companies, the government's policy to reward cooperation gives enormous leverage to federal authorities, testified Andrew Weissmann, former director of the Justice Department's Enron Corp. task force and now a partner with the law firm Jenner & Block LLP in New York. He said the policy isn't interpreted uniformly, with some prosecutors seeking waivers of privileges only as a last resort, while others demand blanket waivers at the start of corporate probes as a shortcut to information they could get through other means.

Justice Department Defends Policy On Corporate Prosecutions As Fair (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press

AP, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON – A top Justice Department official on Tuesday defended a policy that critics say unfairly pressures companies to disclose their confidential communications with attorneys. He said it helps deter corporate fraud.

At a Senate hearing, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said the department would take another look at the 2003 policy in light of public criticism. But he added that there were no plans to change the guidelines, which reward companies if they cooperate with prosecutors in investigations such as by handing over confidential documents.

“We see nothing wrong in asking a corporation to disclose to us the results of their internal investigation to assist us in investigating a corporation's claim of innocence,” McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee. “Indeed, we believe it is good practice because it conserves public and private resources.”

An array of business and legal groups such as the American Bar Association as well as former top Justice officials have come out against the policy, saying it coerces companies to waive the attorney-client privilege and deters employees from getting critical legal advice.

“Lawmakers must intervene and abolish the provisions that rob executives and employees of their right to candid and confidential consultation with their attorneys,” said Tom Donohue, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Sens. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., both expressed concern that the Justice Department policy was unduly coercive and abrogated a fundamental right. They said prosecutors should be neutral in taking into account waivers of attorney-client privilege when considering charges to ensure fair representation.

McNulty responded that the policy was not coercive because prosecutors are instructed to consider waiver of the privilege as just one factor in determining charges. More critical factors include the degree to which a company CEO is involved in potential wrongdoing, he said.

“I support our prosecutors in their charging decisions,” McNulty said, while allowing that a second look at the policy may be in order. “The guidance is consistent with long-standing charging practices and is fair to corporations under investigation.”

Justice Department Is Reviewing Corporate Prosecution Guidelines (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 12 — A top Justice Department official on Tuesday defended the tactics used by federal prosecutors after Enron to combat corporate wrongdoing, but he also indicated that the agency might consider changes to the guidelines.

The comments by the deputy attorney general, Paul J. McNulty, before the Senate Judiciary Committee, were the first public response by a senior Justice Department official to mounting criticism from companies and lawyers that the tactics are being used as a bludgeon to force companies to cooperate with investigations.

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the panel's ranking Democrat, said the prosecution practices were coercive and called on Mr. McNulty to have them modified.

But Mr. McNulty said, "I really don't see this as the kind of coercive practice being discussed." He noted that the tactics had helped federal prosecutors to rein in fraud by more than 1,000 companies, like WorldCom and Adelphia Communications, since 2002.

The Justice Department's guidelines for prosecutors, as outlined in a 2003 document known as the Thompson memorandum, describe nine factors that prosecutors must consider when weighing whether to indict a company for corporate misconduct. Among them are whether a company has demonstrated cooperation with prosecutors by disclosing legal communications to investigators, and whether it has stopped paying legal fees to employees caught up in investigations.

Companies that do not demonstrate cooperation face a greater risk of indictment — which can be a death sentence, as it was for the accounting firm Arthur Andersen in 2002.

Any changes to the guidelines could alter the way prosecutors pursue companies and white-collar defendants.

The guidelines in the Thompson memorandum, Mr. McNulty said, "are nothing more than a structured recitation of what common sense would lead a prosecutor to consider."

Nonetheless, he said that amid the recent criticism, "we are giving thoughtful consideration to everything," and that "we'll have new guidance if, and that's the key here, if something should be identified that would improve the process." He said that the Justice Department would consider making the guidelines nonbinding for prosecutors.

Later, Mr. McNulty told reporters that "it may be necessary to look at what the prosecutors understand of the policy" and that "we have to decide what is wrong with our policy, if anything is wrong with our policy and how to fix it." He declined to provide details or a schedule for any decision on a new policy.

But he added that any "changes in a policy that would discourage cooperation would not be good, in our perspective."

The Thompson memorandum was written in 2003 by Larry D. Thompson, then the deputy attorney general and now general counsel at PepsiCo. It has come under sharp criticism in recent months.

Former top Justice officials have criticized the guidelines, as has the federal judge overseeing the trial of former employees of the accounting firm KPMG over tax shelters. The investigation of KPMG — which first capped legal fees to employees under investigation and then cut them off — has been cited as a prime example of the coercive tactics employed by prosecutors.

Critics say that practices encouraged by the Thompson memorandum infringes on defendants' right to legal counsel and the presumption of innocence. Critics also contend that the guidelines undermine long-established legal doctrines — the lawyer-client privilege and work-product privilege — protecting the confidentiality of communications between lawyers and their clients and of documents created as part of the development of a legal position.

The committee also heard from Edwin Meese III, who was attorney general during the Reagan administration. He said that the Justice Department should eliminate the two guidelines on the disclosure of legal communications and the termination of legal fees as factors for avoiding indictment. Otherwise, Mr. Meese said, Congress should pass legislation to protect those rights.

With Congressional elections just weeks away, the hearing was not likely to lead to any immediate action by lawmakers, but it laid down a marker in a growing debate over white-collar prosecution practices.

Other witnesses at the hearing, all opposing the guidelines, included Andrew Weissmann, a lawyer who is a former director of the Justice Department's Enron task force, and top American Bar Association officials.

In defending the Justice Department guidelines, Mr. McNulty began by citing what he called "five realities." They were, he said, the duty of prosecutors to hold companies and individuals accountable for wrongdoing, the desire by firms for a quick resolution of investigations, the willingness of firms to cooperate with investigators to speed resolutions, the disclosure of legal secrets as "one of the best ways" to speed an investigation, and a desire by corporations "to receive credit" from prosecutors for turning over any internal reports.

DOJ_NMG_0062404

"The irony of the attacks on the Thompson memo is that the federal criminal justice system would be a much harsher, less predictable and less transparent environment for corporations and their counsel in the absence of this guidance,'' he said.

Mr. McNulty called the guidelines indicative of a "just the facts, ma'am" approach. "Some attorneys assert privilege like that famous scene of Lucille Ball gobbling chocolates off of a conveyor belt," he said.

Mr. Specter, the committee chairman, asked if Mr. McNulty would consider President Bush's frequent assertions of executive privilege during the confirmation hearings of Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. to be an example of noncooperation, in the same vein as companies that do not disclose legal communications.

Mr. McNulty said that he did not.

Paulson Backs Sarbox Study (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, September 13, 2006

US treasury secretary Hank Paulson on Tuesday threw his weight behind a new group of US businessmen and academics formed to study why US capital markets are losing ground to foreign rivals amid concern over the effects of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation.

The 17-member Committee on Capital Markets Regulation is the second such high-profile group to be formed since the US Chamber of Commerce launched a similar initiative last year.

They are a sign of increasing clamour in the US business community for a re-examination of SOX, whose Section 404 internal audit control provisions have been widely criticised as being too onerous.

The new committee will be directed by Hal Scott, Nomura Professor at Harvard Law School, and co-chaired by Glenn Hubbard, dean of Columbia Business School, and John Thornton, chairman of the board of the Brookings Institution.

It will "assess the degree to which US public markets are losing ground to foreign and private markets, the causes of this decline, and its impact on the financial industry and the economy".

Its brief reflects concerns that the ability of foreign jurisdictions to attract capital by offering "lighter touch" regulatory environments may permanently erode America's lead in "capital formation" – a phrase that encompasses stock market listings to derivatives trading.

The desire by executives to escape SOX rules is also cited as one of the factors encouraging many companies recently to accept bids from private equity firms.

Prof Scott said: "We are witnessing a crucial moment in economic history--the movement of US capital markets abroad, and the growth of private markets at the expense of public ones. "

SOX has been blamed for driving new company listings abroad to London and Hong Kong as companies seek to avoid US-style regulation.

In his inaugural speech as treasury secretary last month, Mr Paulson dropped a clear hint that he was ready to support reform of SOX rules, which he warned were threatening American competitiveness.

On Tuesday, he said: "I am pleased to learn [the committee], an independent group of highly respected business, financial, investor and corporate governance, legal, accounting and academic leaders, will examine the competitiveness of the US public capital markets.

"This issue is important to the future of the American economy and a priority for me. I look forward to reviewing their findings and ideas."

The idea of revising SOX has not yet gained any traction in congress, partly because politicians have been reluctant to suggest changes to a law that is widely perceived as having helped clamp down on corporate wrongdoing in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom financial scandals.

A Democratic takeover of even one chamber of Congress would make action on this front even more difficult, with several liberal Democrats poised to become chairmen of key committees.

Mike Zuppone, chair of the securities practice at law firm Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker, said: "Any fundamental regulatory reform can't lose sight of the key goal of securities legislation here in the US which is investor protection."

But he added there was no reason why a review of the competitiveness of the US capital markets could not result in some "fine-tuning" of SOX "in a manner that accommodates that investor protection goal".

The committee will in November produce "interim recommendations" on:

· Liability issues affecting public companies and gatekeepers (such as auditors and directors) with a focus on securities class action litigation, criminal enforcement and federal versus state authority;

· The Sarbanes-Oxley Act, with major emphasis on Section 404, which requires auditors and senior managers to certify the adequacy of internal controls;

· Overall regulatory processes to allow the United States to do a better job of evaluating changes of law and regulation, prospectively, initially and on an ongoing basis; and · Shareholder rights.

Its members include Charles Holliday, CEO of DuPont; Cathy Kinney, chief operating officer of the New York Stock Exchange; Ken Griffin, CEO of Citadel Investment Group, a Chicago-based hedge fund and Ira M. Millstein, partner at Weil, Gotshal & Manges.

Next week, the US Chamber of Commerce's Commission on the Regulation of Capital Markets in the 21st Century will hold the first of a series of "town hall" style meetings in Chicago.

Panel Of Executives And Academics To Consider Regulation And Competitiveness (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

A committee filled with business leaders and academics was created yesterday to consider changes in the Sarbanes-Oxley Act and other laws and regulations governing securities markets and companies, with the intention of improving competitiveness for American markets.

The group, called the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, has no official status but the announcement of its creation included praise from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., who said that the issue of American competitiveness "is important to the future of the American economy and a priority for me."

Hal S. Scott, a Harvard law professor who will be the committee's director, said in an interview that he had begun working a year ago to form the group because he was concerned that American markets were losing competitiveness. He said its members had been chosen by himself and the two co-chairmen, R. Glenn Hubbard and John L. Thornton.

Mr. Hubbard is dean of the Columbia Business School and a former chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers. Mr. Thornton is board chairman of the Brookings Institution and a former president of Goldman, Sachs, where he reported to Mr. Paulson.

Among the issues to be considered are whether laws need to be changed to limit both civil and criminal liability for companies, auditors and directors. One matter Mr. Scott cited is the proper role of state governments in financial market issues, including the cases brought by Eliot Spitzer, the New York State attorney general.

The committee will consider whether Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which requires audits of internal controls at corporations, should be changed. Critics say that such audits are too expensive and have kept foreign companies from listing their securities in the United States.

Mr. Scott said the committee would also review whether the Securities and Exchange Commission needed to adopt better procedures to weigh the costs and benefits of its regulations, and whether some other government agency should be charged with reviewing those decisions.

The final area to be discussed, he said, is shareholder rights, including the efforts of hedge funds to force changes in corporate policies, and whether shareholder approval should be required for takeover defenses.

While the committee includes many officers of companies that are subject to regulation by the S.E.C., it includes no former agency chairmen or commissioners, or people who held major S.E.C. staff positions.

"We generally tried not to include regulators," Mr. Scott said. "We would not want to put people in the position who had formulated these rules in the past. They may have a lack of objectivity."

He noted that one member, Robert Glauber, a visiting professor at Harvard Law School and a former chairman of NASD, did have experience in regulation.

"Anybody on this committee is in the real world and will bring with them real-world perspectives," he said.

Mr. Hubbard said the committee would be knowledgeable about regulation. "Many of these people have S.E.C. interaction on a regular basis," he said, adding that the academics involved, either as members of the panel or as advisers, were experts in many areas of securities law and regulation.

Among the committee members are Samuel A. DiPiazza Jr., chief executive of the accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers, and Donald L. Evans, the former commerce secretary who is now chief executive of the Financial Services Forum, a lobbying group for major insurers, banks and investment banks. Mr. Paulson is a former chairman of the group.

There are also chief executives of DuPont, Office Depot and the CIT Group, and top officers of mutual fund companies, Lehman Brothers and the New York Stock Exchange. William G. Parrett, chief executive of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu, another major accounting firm, is also a member, as is Ira M. Millstein, a leading corporate lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0062406

Accounting firms have been seeking legislative relief from liability suits over failed audits, a matter the committee will consider. Asked if the chairmen of such firms might lack objectivity, Mr. Scott said that they might also oppose some issues the committee planned to consider. “These big auditing firms have been the big beneficiaries of 404,” he said. “We are thinking of changing 404.”

The group plans to have an interim report in November, a date Mr. Hubbard said Mr. Paulson had requested. That could allow its recommendations to be considered at post-election meetings of Congress, although Mr. Scott said he thought the idea was to have proposals ready for the new Congress in January.

Mr. Scott said that academics would prepare papers for the committee, and that those papers could form the basis for parts of the report. Luigi Zingales, a professor at the University of Chicago business school and a committee member, will prepare a report on the overall issue of competitiveness.

Robert E. Litan of Brookings will report on liability matters, Mr. Glauber will discuss the regulatory framework and Andrew Kuritzkes of Mercer Oliver Wyman, a consulting firm, will assess the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

Allen Ferrell of Harvard Law School will report on shareholder rights, John C. Coffee Jr. of Columbia Law School on securities class-action suits, and Kenneth E. Scott of Stanford Law School on federal-state conflict in regulation.

Reinier H. Kraakman of Harvard Law School will report on liability issues involving directors and investment banks, and John K. Villa, a criminal defense lawyer and a partner in the firm of Williams & Connolly, will discuss criminal enforcement of securities laws.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Sen. Reid Asks For Polygamy Task Force (AP)

AP, September 13, 2006

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - The U.S. Senate's top Democrat called Tuesday for a federal investigation into the activities of polygamists in Western states.

Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that a task force should be formed to look into interstate activities of polygamists. He also asked the Justice Department to help state prosecutors dealing with polygamist sect leader Warren Jeffs.

``For too long, this outrageous activity has been disguised in the mask of religious freedom," Reid said. ``But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated."

Reid, a Mormon, added that Jeffs is part of a sect that broke away from the Mormon Church more than a century ago and has been disavowed by leaders and mainstream members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

A reporter's call to the Justice Department's after-hours command center was transferred to the department's press office, where there was no answer.

Jeffs, 50, is charged with two felony counts of rape as an accomplice, accused of arranging a ``spiritual marriage" between an underage girl and an older man. Each count carries a penalty of five years to life in prison.

The leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints was arrested Aug. 28 by the Nevada Highway Patrol during a traffic stop and is being held without bail. He had been on the run for about a year-and-a-half when he was arrested.

Besides the Utah charges, Jeffs is facing two felony charges in Mohave County, Ariz., for a similarly arranged marriage involving an underage girl. He is expected to be prosecuted there after Utah proceedings have concluded.

Polygamist communities have tended to gather in remote areas of the West, where they can avoid the attention of authorities and larger society more easily. Plural marriage is illegal in all 50 states, but authorities have found it difficult to find witnesses who will come forward and enable them to prosecute.

'Girls Gone Wild' Cuts Plea Deal (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, September 13, 2006

The California company responsible for the successful "Girls Gone Wild" series of videos has pleaded guilty to violating a federal law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children, the Justice Department announced today.

Mantra Films Inc. of Santa Monica pleaded guilty to charges that it failed to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers in sexually explicit films that it produced and distributed. The company also failed to label its DVDs and videotapes as required by federal law, the Justice Department said.

DOJ_NMG_0062407

Mantra Films entered its plea agreement today before U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak in Panama City, Fla. A second related company, MRA Holdings LLC, also entered into an agreement.

The companies, founded and owned by Joseph Francis, agreed to pay $2.1 million in fines and restitution. Of that, $1.6 million is to be paid by Mantra and MRA, and $500,000 by Francis.

The case is believed to be the first to be filed under a federal law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children, the Justice Department said.

"This case sends an important message about the Justice Department's commitment to protecting children from all forms of sexual exploitation," Assistant Atty. Gen. Alice S. Fisher said in a statement. "Today's agreements ensure that "Girls Gone Wild" will comply with an important law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of minors and puts other producers on notice that they must be in compliance as well."

"This prosecution makes clear that those who seek to enrich themselves at the expense of our children's innocence in violation of the laws intended to protect them will be held to answer in federal court," U.S. Atty. Gregory R. Miller of the Northern District of Florida said.

Aaron S. Dyer, of Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman LLP, who represents Francis and his companies, said steps have been taken to correct the problem.

"This plea resolves past issues relating to the recordkeeping procedures of the company several years ago," Dyer said in a telephone interview. "This case does not involve the intentional exploitation of minors, but rather the lack of safeguards to protect against participants who misrepresented their age in order to be filmed.

"The company takes these charges and the obligations and responsibilities as a record-keeper very seriously. We have implemented state-of-the-art compliance and procedures to insure that this never occurs again," he said.

The "Girls Gone Wild" series is based on young women exposing themselves during the frenzy of spring break and at other times in hot locales. There is binge drinking, hookups and frantic exhibitionism.

By packaging and dispersing the videos, people close to Francis told the Los Angeles Times recently that the company does as much as $40 million a year in sales.

In the court papers distributed by the Justice Department, " 'Girls Gone Wild' admitted filming performers and producing and distributing sexually explicit video materials during all of 2002 and part of 2003 while violating the record keeping and labeling laws."

Specifically, Mantra Films pleaded guilty to three counts of failing to keep the required records and seven labeling violations.

MRA Holding entered into deferred prosecution agreement concerning the information filed in court charging the company with 10 labeling violations. As part of that agreement, the government will dismiss the charges at the end of three years if MRA Holding abides by all of its obligations, the Justice Department said.

MRA Holding also agreed to employ an independent outside monitor selected by the government and provide the monitor complete access to the books and records, production facilities and other locations required to ensure the company's compliance with federal law, the federal agency said.

Girls Gone Wild Company Pleads Guilty In Sex Exploitation Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The company that produces the "Girls Gone Wild" tapes of young women baring their breasts and acting in other sexual situations pleaded guilty Tuesday to federal charges and agreed to pay fines totaling $2.1 million (â‚¬1.65 million).

Mantra Films Inc., based in Santa Monica, California, made the plea in U.S. District Court in Florida on charges of failing to maintain proof of age and indentification for its young performers in sexually explicit films. It also failed to label its DVDs and videotapes properly as required by federal law.

A second company owned by Mantra's founder, MRA Holdings LLC, entered into a deferred agreement on charges of improper labeling. Under that agreement with prosecutors, the charges would be dismissed after three years if MRA Holdings cooperates with future government prosecutions, admits wrongdoing and pays fines.

The two companies and their founder, Joseph Francis, will pay $2.1 million (â‚¬1.65 million) in fines and restitution, the Justice Department said.

Separate state charges in Florida alleging that two 17-year-old girls were videotaped by a "Girls Gone Wild" cameraman in sexual situations remain pending against Mantra and Francis.

"Today's agreements ensure that Girls Gone Wild will comply with an important law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of minors and puts other producers on notice that they must be in compliance as well," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher.

An attorney for Mantra, Aaron Dyer, said the company would clean up its record keeping.

The charges involved "serious record-keeping issues that occurred several years ago," he said. "Mantra takes these issues very seriously and has done everything it can to make sure this never occurs again."

According to court papers, Mantra Films admitted to violating record keeping and labeling laws while distributing the videos during all of 2002 and part of 2003.

Founded in 1997, Mantra released 83 different titles and sold 4.5 million videos and DVDs in 2002, according to Hoover's Inc., a business data firm in Austin, Texas.

'Girls Gone Wild' Producers Fined $2.1 Million (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The entertainment company that produces the "Girls Gone Wild" films and its founder pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges they failed to document the ages of female performers in sexually oriented productions.

Mantra Films of Santa Monica, California, entered a plea agreement in a federal court in Panama City, Florida, the Justice Department said.

Authorities said Joseph Francis, founder of Mantra Films and a related company, MRA Holdings, also agreed to plead guilty to charges to be filed later in Los Angeles, and to pay fines and restitution totaling $2.1 million. (Read the agreement -- pdf)

The "Girls Gone Wild" videotapes -- often featuring young women heavily partying and baring their breasts -- are widely advertised on some cable television channels.

Mantra Films specifically pleaded guilty in Florida to charges that it failed to create and maintain age and identity documents for performers. The company also admitted it failed to label its videotapes and DVDs as required by federal law.

Court documents say the alleged violations occurred during productions titled "Ultimate Spring Break," "Girls Gone Wild on Campus Uncensored," "Totally Exposed Uncensored and Beyond," and "Girls Gone Wild College Girls Exposed/Sexy Sorority Sweethearts."

The Justice Department said the case is the first filed under a law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of children.

The law, which prosecutors call Section 2257 -- is intended to protect minors by requiring producers to create and maintain age and identity records for every performer in sexually explicit movies and other media.

Distributors also must label their tapes and discs with the name of the custodian of the records and their location, prosecutors said.

"Today's agreements ensure that Girls Gone Wild will comply with an important law designed to prevent the sexual exploitation of minors and puts other producers on notice that they must be in compliance as well," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher.

Officials said Francis will pay $500,000 and his firms, Mantra and MRA Holdings, will together pay $1.6 million.

An attorney for Mantra, Aaron Dyer, told The Associated Press that the company would clean up its record keeping.

The charges involved "serious record-keeping issues that occurred several years ago," he told the wire service. "Mantra takes these issues very seriously and has done everything it can to make sure this never occurs again."

The case does not shut down "Girls Gone Wild."

Under terms of the deal, the Los Angeles charges against MRA will be dismissed after three years if the company fully complies with the record-keeping laws and fully pays the fines.

Justice Department Gone Wild? (B&C)

By John Eggerton

Broadcasting & Cable, September 13, 2006

The Justice Department wasn't too wild about Girls Gone Wild.

The company, whose videos showing women baring most or all in settings like Spring Break and Mardi Gras have been a cable network staple for years, has agreed to pay $2.1 million to settle a lawsuit with the Department.

Justice had sued under a law that requires the makers of sexually explicit videos to keep records of the ages of the performers in those videos. According to the department, Girls Gone Wild admitted violating the record-keeping requirements in 2002 and 2003.

In addition to paying the fines, the company has agreed to admit criminal wrongdoing. In addition the charges will be dropped only if the company remains in compliance for the next three years. It has also agreed to allow a government-approved monitor to assure that compliance.

Judge Won't Order New Trial For Safavian (AP-Y)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, September 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal judge declined Tuesday to throw out a conviction or order a new trial for a former Bush administration official convicted of lying about his relationship with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was convicted in June of making false statements and obstruction. It was the first trial to emerge from the scandal surrounding Abramoff.

His attorneys argued that the charges didn't meet the legal standard for conviction. They also said U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman improperly admitted into evidence e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian. The e-mails discuss two pieces of GSA-controlled property that Abramoff wanted for himself or his lobbying clients.

Many of the e-mails were written around the time that Safavian accepted a weeklong trans-Atlantic golfing trip from Abramoff.

Friedman rejected that argument, denying the request for a new trial. He said the e-mails were properly admitted and noted that Safavian discussed the e-mails when testifying in his own defense.

The judge also rejected Safavian's argument that his conviction should be overturned because government officials never warned him about the consequences of lying. Friedman said such warnings are not required.

Safavian faces up to five years in prison on each count. He resigned from his White House post last year as the federal government's chief procurement officer.

Judge Won't Order New Trial For Safavian (NBC)

NBC News, September 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal judge today denied former top White House procurement official, David Safavian a new trial. Safavian, a friend of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, was found guilty in June of three counts of making false statements to investigators and one count of obstruction of justice surrounding a 2002 golf junket to Scotland. Also accompanying Safavian on the golfing trip with Abramoff, were Congressman Bob Ney (R-Oh), Ralph Reed, Neil Volz, and two aides to Ney.

Judge Paul Friedman writes, "This Court concludes that there are no grounds for granting either defendant's motion for judgment of acquittal on any of the counts for which he was convicted, or his motion for a new trial."

The trial also provided new details of the lavish golf trip, as well as photos taken on the historic St. Andrews course of Ney with Abramoff and others. Volz, a longtime Ney loyalist who went to work for Abramoff's firm in 2002, pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges. Volz was a star prosecution witness in the Safavian trial.

Story continues below ? advertisement

Volz detailed the Scotland trip as a fete of eating and drinking and telling funny stories on the plane ride overseas. He said playing golf on the fabled Old Course totaled $400 per round. And, as far as he knew, Volz said, none of the public officials on the trip, including Ney and Safavian, ever paid for golf rounds or entertainment in Scotland. Ney has been the subject of a Justice Department investigation, but has not been charged.

Abramoff emails

Safavian's attorneys had argued that including hundreds of e-mails between him and Abramoff as evidence constituted hearsay that might have prejudiced jurors.

Safavian attorney, Barbara Van Gelder wrote, "The e-mails remain hearsay since the truth or credibility of the matter asserted must be weighed by the jury."

Abramoff was never called to testify at the trial, but hundreds of his e-mails to Safavian were read into the court record during the trial.

Today Judge Friedman writes the e-mails could not be hearsay because Safavian himself testified about them, "Safavian took the stand at trial and testified about many of the e-mails in question, including the numerous e-mails between himself and Jack Abramoff. In doing so, Mr. Safavian frequently testified what meaning he gave to the e-mails he both sent and received, what effect they had on his actions, and what import they had to him."

Golf, lobbying connections

The Scotland golf trip came at a time when e-mails between Abramoff and Safavian show the lobbyist was interested in securing leases on two GSA controlled properties. The e-mails indicate that Safavian assisted Abramoff with information on the Old Post Office, and a former Naval Surface Weapons facility, White Oak, in suburban Maryland.

The judge asserts, in denying Safavian a new trial, that Safavian "falsely stated" that Abramoff "did not have any business with GSA at the time Mr. Safavian was invited on the trip to Scotland, when in truth and fact, Mr. Safavian well knew, prior to the August 2002 Scotland trip that Mr. Abramoff was seeking to lease or purchase GSA-controlled property."

Safavian is scheduled to be sentenced in October. He could be imprisoned for 20 years on the four counts, although federal sentencing guidelines suggest he will face a much lighter sentence.

Volz is awaiting sentencing. He could get up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine but hopes for a much more lenient sentence by cooperating.

Abramoff is also waiting to be sentenced in the Washington influence peddling scandal. He has already been sentenced to five years and 10 months in prison for his role in the Suncruz casino cruise line case along with his partner Adam Kidan.

Tom Noe Sentenced To 27 Months In Federal Prison For Funneling Donations To Bush (ABJ)

By John Seewer

Akron Beacon Journal, September 13, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio - A federal judge sentenced a GOP fundraiser at the center of an Ohio political scandal to two years and three months in prison Tuesday for funneling $45,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign.

Tom Noe, a former Toledo-area rare coin dealer whose large donations made him a powerful political figure, apologized for scheming to give friends money to donate to Bush to fulfill Noe's promise to generate $50,000 at a fundraiser.

"I recruited others to make contributions to the campaign," Noe said in court. "I knew it was wrong to do so. I alone accept responsibility."

Noe said he arranged the scheme because "in 2003 I was pressured by Bush-Cheney officials to become a Pioneer," a name the campaign gives to people who raise $100,000.

Federal prosecutors say Noe wanted perks such as invitations to the White House and the president's ranch in Texas, and he wanted to impress various state officials.

The money-laundering scheme was the largest prosecuted under the 2002 campaign finance reform law, which set limits on donations, prosecutors said last October.

U.S. District Judge David Katz said Noe was trying to feed his ego and made a stupid decision.

"He has risen in the past to positions of respect and power and he violated the trust of those who placed him in those positions," Katz said.

Noe pleaded guilty to three charges, including exceeding federal campaign contribution limits. Federal sentencing rules called for a term of up to 2 1/2 years, but prosecutors last week said Noe, 52, should get up to four years because he schemed to corrupt the election process.

Craig Morford, first assistant U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Ohio, said Tuesday that prosecutors were satisfied with the sentence Noe got.

"He's going to jail for the next two-and-a-quarter years, plus facing the additional charges for his other conduct," said Morford, whose office prosecuted the case.

Noe still is charged with stealing at least $1 million from an ill-fated $50 million rare coin investment that he managed for the state workers' compensation fund. Investigations into the coin investment led to Gov. Bob Taft's no contest plea and conviction last year to charges the he failed to report gifts, such as golf outings.

The coin investment, first reported in April 2005 by The Blade newspaper, has been a major embarrassment for Ohio's ruling Republicans and given Democrats a better shot at winning state offices this year, including the governor's office that has been under GOP control since 1991.

Noe, who also was fined $136,200 Tuesday, will not have to serve his prison sentence for the Bush donations until after the conclusion of the coin investment case, which is set for trial next month. He has pleaded not guilty to 46 charges.

Katz said he would recommend that Noe serve his sentence in Florida, where the coin dealer now lives.

Federal prosecutors did not indicate during the sentencing whether the coin money was used for the donations. They could have sought a stiffer penalty if they thought the state money had been used.

Prosecutors said Noe gave $45,000 directly or indirectly to 24 friends and associates, who made the Bush campaign contributions in their own names, allowing him to skirt the $2,000 individual contribution limit.

DOJ_NMG_0062411

Noe's lawyer, Jon Richardson, argued that his client should be sentenced to community service instead of prison time because he already has been shamed publicly, but he said Noe was treated fairly.

Noe, who appeared serious in court and spoke with an unfaltering voice, was in a jovial mood when he arrived at the courthouse, playfully waving his umbrella to shield his face from photographers outside.

Noe wrote several checks just under the $2,000 cap to avoid suspicion, according to prosecutors. All the checks were written in the eight days leading up to a fundraiser in October 2003 at a downtown Columbus hotel.

Authorities said Bush's campaign committee was unaware of the alleged contribution scheme and unknowingly submitted a false campaign report to the Federal Election Commission.

Noe personally contributed more than $105,000 to Republicans including Bush and Taft during the 2004 campaign. The Bush-Cheney campaign donated $6,000 it received from Noe and his wife, Bernadette, to charity. The rest of the money donated at the Bush fundraiser remains with the Republican Party.

Sue Metzger, who worked with Noe at his coin shop in suburban Toledo and was among those who received money to donate at the Columbus fundraiser, said after the hearing that the public trust has been violated.

"There is a victim and that's the voter," she said.

Noe Sentenced To Prison, Fined For Election Gifts (CLPD)

By John Caniglia, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, September 13, 2006

He blames pressure from Bush campaign

Toledo -- Tom Noe's zealous quest to be a Republican kingmaker ended in a cramped courtroom Tuesday, far from the Beltway spotlight he once craved.

A federal judge sentenced an apologetic Noe to 27 months in prison and fined him $136,200 for making $45,400 in illegal campaign contributions to President Bush's re-election campaign. Authorities called the case the country's largest fundraising scandal in recent years.

Noe, however, will not go to prison until after his trial next month in Lucas County Common Pleas Court, on unrelated state charges of racketeering and stealing nearly $2.3 million from a $50 million investment in rare coins that he managed for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation.

If convicted in that case, he could receive decades in prison.

"This was an ego-feeding and a stupid act by Mr. Noe," said U.S. District Judge David Katz.

"And I think he realizes that today," added Katz, who imposed the sentence.

Noe told Katz that pressure from the Bush-Cheney campaign to raise $100,000 and gain "Pioneer" status led him to break the law.

"I knew it was wrong, and I alone accept responsibility for what I did," Noe said.

Dressed in a blue suit, Noe looked upbeat before the hearing.

The coin dealer who had made so many friends by doling out campaign contributions and political influence across Ohio walked into Katz's courtroom with about 25 friends and family members, including his wife, Bernadette, and his daughters.

He chatted briefly with his attorneys and seldom looked around.

About two hours later, he looked ashen, though composed. His wife and family members were in tears.

Noe, 52, formerly of Maumee, pleaded guilty in May to three charges of skirting federal election laws involving contributions to Bush at a fund-raiser in Columbus in 2003.

Prosecutors said Noe pledged to raise $50,000 at the fund-raiser. When he asked two dozen friends for money, many said they couldn't afford it or couldn't attend the event.

So Noe told the contributors he would reimburse them, prosecutors said. Noe told them to tell people the money was a loan if anyone asked.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Seth Uram and John Pearson said Noe abused the public's trust.

They said that he should have known better, as a key fund-raiser for Bush, and that he had failed to accept responsibility for overseeing "a systematic scheme."

"He didn't hesitate to turn his closest friends and associates into criminals," Uram said at the sentencing. "This wasn't something that he fell into. . . . He was meticulous in committing the crime and in concealing the crime."

Noe faced 24 to 30 months in prison, according to federal sentencing guidelines. Katz rejected three requests by prosecutors to increase the sentence and allowed Noe to remain free on bond until his state trial is done. Katz also rejected Noe's request to sentence him to community service in South Florida, where he now lives.

Noe's attorney, Jon Richardson, had pushed for leniency, claiming that Noe already had suffered enough from the humiliation of his fall from political grace.

He urged Katz in documents to give Noe probation. He said the $45,400 in illegal contributions was quite small compared to hundreds of millions of dollars raised in the presidential campaign.

"There's nothing that Tom Noe did that shook the public's confidence in the election process," Richardson said in court.

One of the people Noe used to make his contributions, Susan Metzger, showed up for the sentencing and got a hug from Noe outside the courtroom. Metzger, who worked for Noe at his coin shop, said she had trusted Noe and didn't think she had done anything wrong until authorities started investigating.

After embracing Noe, she sat down in the hallway and said: "That's hard. It didn't have to be this way. This is a sad thing. It's been a rough year for me.

"I made some decisions at the time that I thought were OK. Do I feel used? Definitely. I think anyone involved in this whole thing feels the same way."

Noe has said he pleaded guilty to spare his family and friends the embarrassment of a trial. One of Noe's friends, Richard Iott, wasn't worried about the embarrassment. He said Noe duped him. In a letter to Noe's attorney, Iott blasted his former friend.

"Tom accomplished many things," Iott said in the letter, which he gave to The Plain Dealer.

"He brought national news media attention to northwest Ohio; he put Toledo and Ohio on the map for crooked politics; and he single-handedly virtually destroyed the Republican Party in Toledo and Ohio. And did I mention that he was a thief?"

Democrats had pushed for a harsh punishment, saying Noe was the poster child of wayward politics in Columbus.

"He wanted power. He wanted prestige, and he wanted to be close to the president," said Chris Redfern, the Ohio Democratic Party chief.

Republicans, who once eagerly courted Noe for his largess, now back away from speaking of him.

"We believe that the media and the Democrats are the only people interested in Tom Noe," said John McClelland, an Ohio GOP spokesman.

"As soon as we learned that he deceived people, we began to distance ourselves from him. Right from the start."

Ex-Leaders To Oppose FBI Raid (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 13, 2006

Former Speakers Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and Tom Foley (D-Wash.) and former House Minority Leader Bob Michel (R-Ill.) have notified an appeals court that they will intervene in the legal challenge by Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) to the May 20 FBI raid of his Capitol Hill office.

Gingrich, Foley and Michel submitted a notice with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that they will be filing an amicus brief arguing that the FBI search of Jefferson's office was unconstitutional and a violation of the separation of powers between the legislative and executive branches.

Separately, Abner Mikva, former chief judge of the D.C. appeals court and a five-term Democratic Representative from Illinois, also will file an amicus brief on Jefferson's behalf.

In addition, a bipartisan group of former House general counsels, including Charles Tiefer, Stanley Brand, Steven Ross and Thomas Spulak, as well as Congressional scholars Norman Ornstein and Thomas Mann, have notified the appeals court of their intentions to weigh in on the case.

Former House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.) was asked to join with his three former colleagues but declined to do so, several sources said.

The two former Speakers, House Minority Leader and Congressional experts will not defend Jefferson, who is the target of an ongoing corruption probe by the Justice Department, but will argue that the Justice Department overstepped its bounds when it searched Jefferson's office.

Justice Department officials have defended their actions as necessary in light of the Louisiana Democrat's refusal to comply with subpoenas directing him to turn over materials and documents sought by federal investigators. Two of Jefferson's accomplices in a long-running bribery scheme already have been sentenced to lengthy prison terms.

The Justice Department also notes that a federal judge approved a search warrant for Jefferson's office and that special techniques were employed so that privileged legislative documents and materials were not seized by FBI agents.

However, the appeals court in late July ordered Chief Judge Thomas Hogan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, who approved the original search warrant for Jefferson's office, to allow the lawmaker's attorneys to have access to the seized documents and computer hard drives.

The process of assembling that material for Jefferson has bogged down the corruption probe, according to sources close to the case. It will be several more weeks before an official appointed by Hogan to oversee the transfer to Jefferson completes his work, and then Jefferson will be allowed to file legal motions claiming Speech or Debate Clause protection for the materials. Hogan will then have to rule on the motions, some of which could succeed. Only at that point would the case return to the appeals court and a briefing schedule be laid out.

In the meantime, the Justice Department is unlikely to take any criminal action against Jefferson since to do so would mean that none of the materials in his office, which prosecutors currently cannot review, were necessary to charge him with wrongdoing. One source estimated that it could be "four to six weeks" before all the seized materials are available for Jefferson, which means that the Louisiana Democrat may not face any legal charges before the Nov. 7 elections.

But even with all the confusion over the contested materials, Jefferson continues to gain new allies in his ongoing court fight with the Justice Department.

Already, a bipartisan group of House leaders that included Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) filed an amicus brief before Hogan when he initially considered Jefferson's request to declare the search unconstitutional, although Hogan rejected the group's arguments. That group may file a similar amicus brief with the appeals court, although the two party leaders have not agreed yet on whether they will do so.

With the appeals court's 60-day filing deadline for non-governmental parties about to expire, Gingrich, Foley and Michel declared their intention to enter the case on Tuesday, as did the others.

Gingrich has been particularly vocal in expressing his displeasure over the FBI search, publicly decrying it as a violation of separation of powers between the two branches of government.

Much like Hastert and Pelosi, Gingrich did not seek to protect Jefferson but instead insisted that Congress cannot allow such a precedent, because it could be abused by a future administration in a political battle with Capitol Hill, to stand.

Gingrich was not available for comment on Tuesday, but he made his feelings about the case known in a June 8 opinion piece in Roll Call.

"But what is not firmly settled, and what is a dramatic departure from established practice, is the executive branch's bold assertion that it can direct the FBI to raid a legislative branch office, with a judicial warrant, without consultation or cooperation from legislative branch leaders, as it did for the first time in the history of the American republic on May 20," Gingrich wrote.

In an interview, Michel said he had not seen a draft of the amicus brief that will be filed by the three former lawmakers but had agreed to sign onto the motion.

"All I did was agree to at least participate," said the former Illinois Republican. Michel said the brief was being drafted by lawyers at the firm Bingham McCutchen.

Ornstein, a Roll Call contributing writer, said the case has implications far beyond Jefferson's own legal and political future.

"This is a real question of legislative integrity in the face of an executive branch that has every interest in intimidating them from time to time," Ornstein said.

Brand, who served as House general counsel from 1976 to 1983, said Congress must defend itself from intrusions by the executive and judicial branches on its authority.

"I just thought that when you get the four former [House] general counsels all on side, hopefully it adds some weight to the consideration of a longstanding issue that directly affect the House and its Members," Brand said.

Lawmaker: Panel At Impasse On Cunningham (AP-Y)

By Erica Werner

AP, September 13, 2006

The leaders of the House Intelligence Committee are at an impasse over whether to subpoena jailed former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham as part of an investigation into his actions on the committee.

The disagreement threatens to end chances for a bipartisan outcome to the investigation, Rep. Jane Harman of California, the panel's top Democrat, said in an interview Tuesday with The Associated Press.

"We've hit a problem, and I hope we can get past it and come up with a joint report," Harman said. "That is my preference, my strong preference, and I don't know if that's possible. It may not be possible."

"I think it's fair to say we're at an impasse," she said.

Jamal Ware, a spokesman for committee chairman Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, had no immediate response to Harman's comments.

Harman believes the panel's investigation can't be complete without interviewing Cunningham, the San Diego Republican who resigned from Congress last November after admitting taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. But Hoekstra has not agreed.

A congressional aide, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation, said Hoekstra wants to hear from Cunningham but doesn't want to issue a subpoena only to have him invoke Fifth Amendment protections and refuse to testify, as his attorney has warned the committee he would do.

Cunningham served on the Intelligence Committee starting in 2001 and for part of last year chaired the panel's subcommittee on terrorism and human intelligence. The panel is looking into whether he abused his position to slip provisions favoring certain contractors into classified legislation, where it would be difficult to spot.

Harman said she supports a subpoena even if Cunningham does refuse to testify, and would not support granting him immunity. Cunningham is cooperating with prosecutors in an ongoing federal corruption investigation.

"Mr. Cunningham has voluntarily produced all documents requested by the committee whenever they have made such requests and has also indicated a willingness to be interviewed on a voluntary basis at the conclusion of the criminal investigation," Cunningham's attorney, Lee Blalack, said Tuesday. "But we will not permit him to give testimony to the committee without a grant of immunity in the midst of the ongoing criminal investigation with which he is cooperating."

Harman and Hoekstra also haven't agreed on releasing the unclassified version of the report by an outside investigator the committee hired to look into Cunningham's committee actions. Harman supports releasing the unclassified report by investigator Michael Stern.

With just a few weeks left in the legislative session before Congress goes into recess to campaign for the November election, Harman said there needs to be a resolution soon.

"I would prefer to resolve this amicably. I think that window is closing," Harman said. "What we may end up with is (Hoekstra's) statement and my statement, and they may disagree."

"But the answer is this has to close, it can't be left open-ended into a future Congress."

Harman declined to reveal contents of the report, but congressional officials have told AP that the document concludes that Cunningham took advantage of secrecy and badgered congressional aides to help slip items into classified bills that would benefit him and his associates.

Harman said she had no reason to believe there was criminal behavior by anyone on the committee or committee staff other than Cunningham.

Animal Rights Advocates Given Prison Terms (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, September 13, 2006

TRENTON, Sept. 12 — In a courtroom crowded with animal rights supporters, a federal district judge on Tuesday sentenced three people to prison terms of four to six years for their roles in a campaign of threats and harassment against a company that runs an animal testing laboratory.

The three were described at their trial as coordinators of a group dedicated to shutting down Huntingdon Life Sciences, a British company with a laboratory in New Jersey. The company's employees, their families and people who did business with Huntingdon were threatened and their property vandalized as part of the group's campaign.

"All they talk about is how pure their intentions are, about saving animals," Charles McKenna, an assistant United States attorney, said after the sentencing. "These people victimized some of the witnesses in this case in ways no one should ever have to deal with."

The defendants' group, Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty, maintained a Web site that listed potential targets and served as a platform for sharing harassment techniques.

The case has drawn international attention, not only because Huntingdon Life Sciences is the largest contract animal testing laboratory in Europe but also because the convictions were the first under the federal Animal Enterprise Protection Act.

The law, enacted in 1992, aims to curb aggressive tactics by animal rights groups against testing laboratories, fur farms and related enterprises. A stronger version of the law, the Animal Enterprise Terrorism Act, was introduced in Congress this summer and has wide support.

Dr. John D. Young, the chairman of Americans for Medical Progress, a biomedical research organization, said the sentences assured that "our nation's law enforcement system will not tolerate terror tactics that include threatening e-mails, telephone calls, vandalism and attacks on the privacy of researchers' homes."

DOJ_NMG_0062415

The judge, Anne E. Thompson, sentenced the former president of Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty, Kevin Kjonaas, 28, of Minneapolis, to six years in prison. Lauren Gazzola, 26, of Connecticut, the group's former campaign coordinator, was sentenced to four years and four months. The Web site coordinator, Jacob Conroy, 30, of Oakland, Calif., received a four-year sentence.

The organization itself was convicted and ordered to pay $1 million in restitution, although the lawyer representing the group said it no longer exists. Three other defendants are to be sentenced, one on Wednesday and two next week.

The defendants were convicted in March of conspiracy and stalking, but not with carrying out any destructive acts. Their lawyers argued that they were socially conscious young people who were carried away by their beliefs. Judge Thompson acknowledged receiving hundreds of letters urging leniency in her sentencing.

Mr. Kjonaas told the judge: "I'm utterly humbled. I came here with my mother. This has been a traumatic experience, a learning experience, and I don't know what more I could say."

But Judge Thompson recalled a taped conversation in which "anyone who listened would recognize a sense of glee, almost, in wielding power."

Ms. Gazzola, who taught test preparation courses for law school applicants, told the judge that even in prison she would not give up her own hope of becoming a lawyer. Near tears, she said, "The decision to pursue law school is something I chose two weeks before I was arrested."

An unofficial spokeswoman for the defendants, Andrea Lindsay, said all three planned to appeal their convictions. Ms. Lindsay, who came from California, bristled at the prosecutors' complaints that the defendants did not express remorse. "They're not going to roll over and apologize for illegal acts of others," she said.

Ms. Lindsay was among at least 100 supporters, including others from Florida, Pennsylvania and New York, who spilled out of the courtroom. Watched by a contingent of Trenton police officers and federal officers, the largely young crowd exchanged news of the sentences among themselves.

Ms. Lindsay said that "it's sad for all of us to see our friends go to prison, but at the end of the day, it's six individuals, and there are hundreds, thousands of people campaigning against Huntingdon."

Animal rights groups say the company kills hundreds of dogs, monkeys and other animals each day in its testing of consumer products at its laboratories in Britain and East Millstone, N.J.

3 Animal-welfare Activists Going To Prison For Inciting Threats (AP)

By Beth Defalco

AP, September 13, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. - Three animal-rights activists convicted of using their Web site to incite threats and harassment against a company that tests products on animals received prison sentences ranging from four to six years Tuesday.

They were also ordered to pay a total of $1 million in restitution to the company and people they terrorized. All three said they planned to appeal their convictions and requested they receive vegan meals while in prison.

Three other members of Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty are awaiting sentencing within the next two weeks.

Along with the organization itself, the six activists were convicted in March of using a Web site to incite threats, harassment and vandalism against Huntingdon Life Sciences, a company that tests drugs and household products on animals.

Huntingdon Life Sciences general manger Mike Caulfield said the company "was grateful that justice was served." He said as a result of the threats and harassment, the company's health insurer and other firms severed ties with it.

"It generally made the cost of doing business with us more expensive than our competitors during that time," he said.

And that was the point, prosecutors said.

"This was a conspiracy to shut down Huntingdon Life Sciences," said assistant U.S. Attorney Charles McKenna.

The government charged that the group waged a five-year campaign against the company, posting on the Web site the names, addresses and phone numbers of Huntingdon employees and those who do business with the company, and personal information such as where they go to church and where their children attend school.

Many of those people saw their homes vandalized and received threatening e-mails, faxes and phone calls.

The group, based in Philadelphia, maintains its actions were protected under the First Amendment.

The defendants, all in their late 20s or early 30s, were not accused of directly making threats or carrying out vandalism but were convicted of animal-enterprise terrorism, conspiracy and interstate stalking.

The three sentenced were the president of SHAC, Kevin Kjonaas, 28, of Minneapolis, Minn.; campaign coordinator Lauren Gazzola, 25, of Connecticut; and Web site manager Jacob Conroy, 30, of San Francisco. Kjonaas was sentenced to six years in prison, Gazzola to four years and four months, and Conroy to four years.

"None of it's fair," Conroy said after the hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0062416

Though defense attorneys tried to portray their clients as well-meaning animal-lovers who committed a "crime of compassion," prosecutors said the group, and especially its leader, allowed good intentions to become perverted.

"Mr. Kjonaas was drunk with the power that he could push around multinational companies with his Web site," McKenna said.

Gazzola wept as she addressed U.S. District Judge Anne E. Thompson, telling the court how she feared her dream of becoming an attorney vanished with her felony conviction.

But Gazzola, as well as the other two, never apologized for their actions and Thompson asked why.

"As an advocate for any cause," Gazzola responded, "you change your idea of the best way to use your talents."

Each activist asked to serve their sentence in a prison near their hometown and asked to receive vegan meals. All three said they planned to appeal the case.

"I'm pretty confident I won't be serving (that long) in prison," Kjonaas said after being sentenced. "There are a ton of appealable issues."

"I'll be OK," he said, "I'll be back."

3 Animal Activists Get Jail (PHI)

By Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 13, 2006

They all were described as talented, educated young people, who turned their energies toward a misguided - and illegal - campaign to stop laboratory testing on animals.

One, Lauren Gazzola, a former New York University student, tearfully said she was two weeks away from taking the LSAT for law school when she was arrested.

Now, the three leaders of Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty are considered domestic terrorists, and each has just 30 days to report to prison to begin serving years-long sentences.

Gazzola, former SHAC president Kevin Kjonaas, and SHAC Web site manager Jacob Conroy yesterday became the first defendants to be sentenced in this landmark case, heard in federal court in Trenton.

The SHAC organization and six individual members were convicted earlier this year of violating the federal Animal Enterprise Protection Act.

SHAC - described yesterday as virtually defunct - was placed on a form of probation. The remaining defendants will be sentenced at hearings today and Tuesday. All of them will be liable for $1 million in restitution to the victims.

"At this point in my life, I am utterly humbled," said Kjonaas before he was sentenced to six years in prison. "I've come here with my mother. This has been a traumatic experience and a learning experience."

After the hearing, Kjonaas, a 29-year-old from Minnesota, said a prison term would not deter him from his cause.

"Others have gone through worse things," he said. "The history of social-justice movements is filled with people who went to jail... . I'll be OK. I'll be back."

Gazzola, 26, of Connecticut, received 52 months in prison, and Conroy, 30, of California, got 48 months.

"They had good homes, they had good parents, they had good schools," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles McKenna. "They chose to throw it all away."

The so-called "SHAC 7" were the first defendants ever charged under a federal law designed to criminalize the stalking, vandalism and other tactics of militant animal-rights organizations.

But SHAC members characterized the trial as a test on the limits of free speech, saying the defendants never broke any laws with their admittedly "obnoxious" protests, directed mainly against Huntingdon Life Sciences, an East Millstone, N.J., animal-testing firm.

For a typical protest, SHAC, which was based for a time in Philadelphia, would post the home address of a Huntingdon employee on its Web site. Protesters then would gather outside the employee's home chanting slogans and calling the employee a "puppy killer."

Although the Web site said SHAC did not support illegal tactics, the page often contained anonymous boasts of criminal vandalism and other acts.

During the trial, several Huntingdon employees gave emotional testimony about receiving threatening phone calls and letters and having their cars tipped over and the windows of their homes smashed out.

DOJ_NMG_0062417

Huntingdon general manager Mike Caulfield, in court yesterday, said these types of protests have diminished since the convictions - but not ended.

"On behalf of the dozens of victims whose lives were turned upside down by these criminals, we're gratified justice was served," he said. "We are profitable. We are growing. We are still in business."

Andrea Lindsay, an animal-rights activist, said that home protests would continue, including two this week in New Jersey that have been "well-publicized" on a new Web site.

"The reality is that there are animal-rights activists across the globe... and they're going to continue to campaign against Huntingdon Life Sciences," she said.

She maintained again that the defendants were legitimate activists who did nothing wrong, and said the sentences only encouraged "underground" activists who break the law.

But McKenna said the defendants were committed to violence, not peaceful protest, as he made note of their defiance.

"I'm struck by the fact that we've been through three sides of the sentencing and so far we haven't heard anyone say, 'I'm sorry,' " he said. "And there are victims here today who perhaps would like to hear them apologize."

Reputed Israeli Mob Enforcer Sentenced (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 13, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A reputed enforcer for an Israeli crime group was sentenced to more than 10 years in federal prison for racketeering.

Hai Waknine, 35, pleaded guilty in June to using extortion and threats of violence to help an organized crime syndicate known as the Jerusalem Group launder nearly $2 million in embezzled funds. Authorities say the syndicate enriched itself through loan sharking, extortion, money laundering and illegal gambling in Israel, Europe and around the U.S.

Waknine, an Israeli national who lives in Marina del Rey, asked for leniency during sentencing Monday. But U.S. District Judge Manuel Real, citing Waknine's extensive criminal history, gave him 13 months in prison beyond the nine years that prosecutors recommended.

Prosecutors alleged that Waknine kidnapped debtors, aimed handguns at them and threatened their families to make them pay up.

"That was Waknine's role, a shakedown collections guy," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas P. Sleisenger. "There are a lot of people in the Israeli community who will sleep better tonight because he is behind bars."

Dig 'high Priority' In FBI Corruption Probe (BOSH)

By Casey Ross, Boston Herald Reporter

Boston Herald, September 13, 2006

The federal investigation into the $15 billion Big Dig has mushroomed into a "high priorty" public corruption probe focused on project financing and whether officials ignored requirements to conduct crucial inspections, Boston's FBI chief said yesterday.

"We've got a lot of agents assigned to it and there are several avenues to the case," said Ken Kaiser, special agent in charge of the Boston FBI. "Basically it's looked at as a public corruption investigation, which is the highest criminal priority we have."

Kaiser said his office is working with the federal Department of Transportation and has devoted six to eight agents to investigate the mammoth highway project, which is being blamed for the death of motorist Milena Del Valle. Del Valle, 38, died July 10 when concrete ceiling panels collapsed in the I-90 Seaport Connector Tunnel.

Kaiser said top FBI officials in Washington are monitoring the investigation and have pledged additional rescources if necessary. The federal probe is running parallel to a state investigation being led by Attorney General Tom Reilly, who is expecting to convene a special grand jury Oct. 3 to pursue criminal charges in the death of Del Valle. Reilly's office is also pursuing potential civil litigation and the recovery of money wasted on faulty construction practices.

Federal officials have been probing the Big Dig for years, but the intensity of their investigation increased dramatically following a scandal over I-93 tunnel leaks and the subsequent I-90 collapse.

Kaiser said agents are examining a broad range of issues including materials used, construction methods and whether officials followed requirements to conduct regular inspections. "What if those inspections were never done?" he said.
